Provided, That from and after the 1st day of January, 1875, the salaries of the district judges of the districts of California, Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, northern, southern, and eastern districts of New York, eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania, the district of New Jersey, the district of Maryland, northern and southern districts of Ohio, northern and southern districts of Illinois, district of Indiana, eastern district of Michigan, district of Iowa, district of Kentucky, eastern and western districts of Missouri, district of Louisiana, and district of Rhode Island, shall be $5,000 each; and the salary of every other district judges shall be $4,000 each.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I renew the point of order on the amendment. I understand that under the rule which has been read the practice has been to entertain as in order a motion to increase a salary for the current year or for the coming fiscal year. Such an amendment does not change the existing law; the law stands the same as it was before. But a provision which is to stand as a permanent change of salaries, to be followed thereafter, is not in order under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Were the question entirely new the Chair would rule an amendment increasing salary was as much out of order as one decreasing it, for after careful study he has not been able to see the logic or reason why the House may increase under this rule and yet may not decrease. Still the matter has been so often ruled upon, and the rulings have been so steadily reaffirmed, the Chair feels bound to follow in the line of precedents and admits the amendment as offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I wish to move an amendment to the amendment to include the judges of the eastern and western districts of Virginia, and I wish to submit some remarks on that amendment when in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is first entitled to the floor, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia when his amendment is in order.

Mr. DUELL. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, no argument is needed in favor of the amendment I have sent to the Clerk's desk and which has been read. While we have made very ample provision for the salaries of the district judges, justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of the circuit judges, we have made no advance whatever in the salaries of the district judges of the United States. Under the law as it now stands, with three or four exceptions, the salaries now paid to the district judges of the United States are in the main $3,500. When I state here that you have fixed the salaries of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia at a much larger sum than that, and when you have fixed the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims in this city at $4,500 each, it will be seen that, while an ample salary is given to the judges in the other courts, the salaries paid to our district judges are far below what should be paid to them under the circumstances.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no class of our country's public servants who are entitled to more consideration than these district judges of the United States, and it seems to me the time has arrived when their salaries should be increased so as to make them correspond with the salaries paid to other judicial officers under the Government.

Take the southern district of New York. The salary of district judge in that district is $4,000 per year, and yet you pay and have provided by general bill that the salary of the district attorney for the same southern district shall be $6,000, and you add a certain amount of fees, making the office worth from twenty to thirty thousand dollars a year. That is a single instance of the inconsistency into which we have fallen in times past, and it seems to me the time has arrived when we should make this increase. I have a statement here, showing the salary paid to the judges in the different districts, which I ask to be incorporated with my amendment.

The statement is as follows:

Statement showing the salaries of the district judges of the United States as now fixed by law.

District of Alabama	$3,500
Eastern district of Arkansas	3,500
Western district of Arkansas	3,500
District of California	5,000
District of Connecticut	3,500
District of Delaware	3,500
Northern district of Florida	3,500
Southern district of Florida	3,500
District of Georgia	3,500
Northern district of Illinois	3,500
Southern district of Illinois	3,500
District of Indiana	3,500
District of Iowa	3,500
District of Kansas	3,500
District of Kentucky	3,500
District of Louisiana	4,500
District of Maine	3,500
District of Maryland	4,000
District of Massachusetts	4,000
Eastern district of Michigan	3,500
Western district of Michigan	3,500
District of Minnesota	3,500
District of Mississippi	3,500
Eastern district of Missouri	3,500
Western district of Missouri	3,500
District of Nebraska	3,500
District of Nevada	3,500
District of New Hampshire	3,500
District of New Jersey	4,000
Northern district of New York	4,000
Southern district of New York	4,000
Eastern district of New York	4,000
Eastern district of North Carolina	3,500
Western district of North Carolina	3,500
Northern district of Ohio	3,500
Southern district of Ohio	4,000
District of Oregon	3,500
Eastern district of Pennsylvania	4,000
Western district of Pennsylvania	4,000
District of Rhode Island	3,500
District of South Carolina	3,500
District of Tennessee	3,500
Eastern district of Texas	3,500
Western district of Texas	3,500
District of Vermont	3,500
Eastern district of Virginia	3,500
Western district of Virginia	3,500
District of Virginia	3,500
Eastern district of Wisconsin	3,500
Western district of Wisconsin	3,500

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman has consent to print the statement with his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the salaries of these district judges ought to be increased beyond what they are now. If the district attorney for the southern district of New York gets twenty or thirty thousand dollars a year, it is too much. It certainly is no argument why we should raise the salary of judges up to that figure. We had vacancies in the office of district judge in New England and the very best talent was anxious to assume the position. It was so in the districts of Connecticut.

Many of these district judgeships are easy, comfortable places, occupying but a small portion of time. In a few districts there may be more labor than in others, but I regret very much to see these district judges, who have so little to do, put above men upon the supreme bench in the States who have four times as much labor to perform. It is no argument certainly for increasing the salaries of the district judges that the salary of the district attorney for the southern district of New York is from twenty to thirty thousand dollars a year. If his salary be so large then he ought to have his perquisites taken away. I hope the amendment to increase these salaries will be voted down.

I yield to the gentleman from Michigan for two minutes.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I have this to say to the committee: By the statement which will be published in the RECORD in the morning I understand it will appear that some of these judges get over $5,000 a year, in some districts not over $3,000, and in others $4,000. I have not been able to look over and see exactly what the result of the adoption of this amendment would be, but it seems to me before we act finally on the subject we should inquire whether it will not result in a reduction in the aggregate expense for these judges.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote.

Mr. CONGER. O, no. Do not let us have a vote; let us have a talk. I do not wish to be deprived of my two minutes. I send to the reporters, to be printed in connection with the report just ordered to be printed, a statement of the number of suits brought in several of these districts, and the amount of business done there, so that members may see that in districts where there is the smallest salary there is the greatest amount of business. I ask that that statement may be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

Abstract from Attorney-General's report (pages 26 to 33) for 1873, showing the amount of business in the United States district courts in the districts named below for the year ending June 30, 1873.

[The New York districts are, of course, far ahead of all others and are omitted. The northern district of New York, however, is not reported.]

SUITS COMMENCED DURING THE YEAR.

	Massachusetts.	Eastern district of Pennsylvania.	Maryland.	Southern district of Ohio.	Eastern district of Missouri.*	Northern district of Illinois.	Louisiana.	California.	Eastern district of Michigan.
Admiralty	112	99	58	20	.....	87	192	61	184
Bankruptcy	86	187	77	105	.....	254	90	184	110
Criminal, pending July 1, 1873	114	78	14	23	.....	15	69	62	54
Total	312	364	149	148	.....	356	351	307	348

SUITS DISPOSED OF DURING THE YEAR.

Admiralty	100	62	53	23	.....	65	83	39	109
Bankruptcy	38	113	13	78	.....	122	14	56	29
Criminal	80	81	66	58	.....	2	36	61	110
Total	218	256	132	159	.....	189	133	156	248

* Not reported.

Abstract from Attorney-General's report (page 34) showing aggregate amount of judgments in admiralty cases for the year ending June 30, 1873.

Massachusetts	$38,294
Eastern district of Pennsylvania	13,277
Maryland	9,486
Southern district of Ohio	9,658
Eastern district of Missouri, (not reported.)
Northern district of Illinois	16,526
Louisiana, (not reported.)
California	93,412
Eastern district of Michigan	128,433

NOTE.—The foregoing abstracts include only district-court business proper, and as to that they do not include chamber business.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. I beg to say a very few words on this amendment. It seems to me that it is entirely correct. The salary of $5,000 will only support in a very economical way the judge and his family. I know very well that the judge in the State of New Jersey would not be able to hold that office if he were not a man of some property and had not some revenue besides what he receives from the Government of the United States. He has some admiralty business to perform and a large amount of patent business. The internal revenue has created a great amount of business. There is the business also under the bankrupt law, besides the ordinary business of the court in that district.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. How much of the time is he occupied?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. All the time; and he cannot perform his duties then.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. How often does he hold his court?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. Every month of the year except July and August.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. How much of the time is he occupied?

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. He is engaged all the time.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Then his is a remarkable instance.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. He is engaged all the time, and even then is not able to perform his duties.

Mr. GARFIELD. Once more I call the attention of the committee to the danger that is now confronting them. We are appealed to on behalf of a class of most deserving men. There are no men with better, purer, or higher characters known in our country than our judges. Yet if you put up these salaries it must necessarily be the signal for a general raising of salaries all round. And we cannot now, just at the heel of the day and just at the heel of a long bill, after we have refused to raise other salaries—except a few in our own House—we cannot do this with any relative justice. I appeal to the Committee of the Whole not to let this paragraph pass, and I ask for a vote.

The question being taken on Mr. DUELL's amendment, there were—ayes 38, noes 108.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Massachusetts informs me that we have left out one retired judge for the district of Massachusetts. I ask that after the word "Wisconsin," inserted in line 1520, the words "of the district of Massachusetts" be also inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Court of Claims:

For salaries of five judges of the Court of Claims, at $4,500 each; the chief clerk, $3,000; and assistant clerk, $2,000; bailiff, $1,500; and messenger thereof; in all, $29,840.

For stationery, books, fuel, labor, and other contingent and miscellaneous expenses, $3,000; for reporting the decisions of the court, clerical hire, labor in preparing and superintending the printing of the ninth volume of the Reports of the Court of Claims, to be paid on the order of the court, $1,000.

For new cases for the files in the clerk's office, desks, and repairing old desks and tables there and in the court-room, $1,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the paragraph which has just been read:

To pay judgments of the Court of Claims, $1,000,000.

The estimate sent to the committee in the Book of Estimates was $2,000,000. The amount appropriated last year was $400,000. The committee left out this appropriation at first that we might have an opportunity to examine the subject more fully.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us rise upon that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I propose to do so. But I wish to lay a statement before the committee that it may be printed in the RECORD. In order to be able to give the matter a full examination the Committee on Appropriations required a statement of the whole number of cases pending before the Court of Claims, and a statement of the amount per cent. that was usually awarded in the cases that are acted upon one way or the other. We found that there were about $4,000,000 pending in cases before the court. Ordinarily not quite half of all the amounts pending in any given group are passed favorably through the court. But we found still further that after they had passed through this court and were appealed a considerable percentage of those passed favorably were beaten in the court above, the Supreme Court. And after full consideration of the case and consultation with the court the committee came to the conclusion that we could cut down the estimate one-half, and make the appropriation one million instead of two million dollars.

But I wish gentleman to have a full opportunity to consider this We are now very nearly through the bill. I think half an hour or three-quarters of an hour in the morning will enable us to complete it, and I move that the committee rise.

Pending that, I ask that the papers I have referred to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection.

[The papers referred to by Mr. GARFIELD are as follows:

UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 4, 1874.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry, I have to state that the estimate for judgments for this court was based on the amount claimed in cases pending in the court which may be brought to trial during the present term. The amount is something over $4,500,000 and the estimate is $2,000,000, which supposes a reduction of more than half. In case judgments should be rendered for $2,000,000, judging from the past, appeals will probably be taken in cases covering a considerable portion of that amount, from a quarter to half I should think, though it is impossible to estimate closely. The unusually large amount claimed this year is owing very much to iron-clad claims specially referred by Congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ARCHIBALD HOPKINS,
Chief Clerk.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations.

Statement showing all the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims for the year ending December 2, 1872, the amounts thereof, the parties in whose favor rendered, and a brief synopsis of the nature of the claims upon which said judgments have been rendered.

Names of claimants.	No.	Amount claimed.	Amount awarded.	Date of judgment.	Nature of claim.
Delaware River Steamboat Company	6119	$13,080 00	Dismissed by claimant.	Dec. 5, 1871	For balance due by defendants under charter-party for use of steamboat John A. Warner.
Henry W. Fisher	5956	200 00	Dismissed by claimant.	Dec. 7, 1871	For $100 bounty under section 4, act of March 3, 1865, and $100 additional bounty under section 12, act of July 28, 1866.
John Costigan	5958	376 00	Dismissed by claimant.	Dec. 7, 1871	For back pay from July 1, 1863, to January 14, 1865, and bounty under section 5, act of July 22, 1861, and subsequent acts; and additional bounty under section 13, act of July 28, 1866.
Jane H. Hart	6016	720 00	Dismissed by claimant.	Dec. 7, 1871	To recover pension-money to which she claims to be entitled under the Navy pension laws.
Mrs. C. L. Ames, administratrix of Horatio Ames.	6250	86,188 64	Dismissed by claimant.	Dec. 7, 1871	For balance due by defendants under contract for manufacturing eleven wrought-iron rifled cannon.
Catharine Peterson, administratrix of Samuel Peterson.	3086	513 00	$390 99	Jan. 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Jean Sauvestre	2937	4,218 75	1,158 95	Jan. 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Dolway B. Walkington	2485	29,079 60	17,150 00	Jan. 22, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Mary E. Ross, administratrix Meshack Ross	2616	50,000 00	*Dismissed.	Jan. 22, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Henry H. Clapp	6279	495 00	Dismissed.	Feb. 5, 1872	For additional compensation as a clerk in the office of Congressional Printer, under act of Congress of July 28, 1866.
Anson N. Thompson	6281	643 00	Dismissed.	Feb. 5, 1872	For additional compensation as a clerk in the office of Congressional Printer, under act of Congress of July 28, 1866.
George M. Fillmore	6280	525 00	Dismissed.	Feb. 5, 1872	For additional compensation as a clerk in the office of Congressional Printer, under act of Congress of July 28, 1866.
Oliver H. Long, guardian of Lida Moore	3422	8,850 00	6,640 50	Feb. 5, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Gustav A. Wirth	2900	4,200 00	4,200 00	Feb. 5, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
William J. Patton	6275	1,000 00	1,000 00	Feb. 5, 1872	To recover amount deducted from claimant's salary as a collector of internal revenue.
William S. Shewsbury	5222	72,000 00	*Dismissed.	Feb. 5, 1872	For damages under contract of claimant with the Quartermaster's Department for transportation of military stores.
Michael Daily	6365	350 00	350 00	Feb. 19, 1872	For the recovery of 5 per cent. additional commission under section 161 of the internal-revenue act of June 30, 1864, on the first $500 in each of fourteen purchases of stamps made between April 1 and October 1, 1870.
John V. Sevier	3218	13,500 00	5,181 48	Feb. 19, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Matilda L. Bush, executrix of David Bush	3540	14,060 51	11,203 20	Feb. 19, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Joseph Block	2810	29,376 00	22,848 00	Mar. 11, 1872	For proceeds of cotton and tobacco captured by the United States military forces.
William Hunt	2799	9,384 81	4,952 54	Mar. 11, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
James Wilde, jr.	2649	2,322 28	862 82	Mar. 11, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Samuel H. Talbot, Peter S. J. Talbot, James R. Talbot, Loring F. Talbot, Albert Brown, George W. Simpson, and Job Small, owners schooner Keokuk.	6293	3,768 00	2,128 00	Mar. 11, 1872	For one month's service of steamer Keokuk, and also for damages sustained by said vessel while in the employment of the defendants under charter-party.
Abraham Morrell	6285	3,199 16 in coin, and 1,617 30	3,199 16 in coin, and 1,617 30	Mar. 11, 1872	To recover the value in gold of three bonds of the government of Texas assumed by the United States, and also to recover the difference between coin and currency on thirteen bonds of $500 each paid the claimant in currency April 29, 1870, and before suit was brought.
James Christian	6123	2,048 56	2,048 56	Mar. 11, 1872	For a decree under act of May 9, 1866, directing the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to allow claimant a credit, as an assistant commissary and an additional quartermaster, in the settlement of his accounts.
Charles H. Adams	2916	23,400 00	*2,080 00	Mar. 11, 1872	To recover compensation for 18,000 bushels of corn which claimant alleges was sold and delivered to Government.
Harry Haym	2679	89,131 25	72,853 98	Mar. 11, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Marmaduke Hamilton, executor of John F. Hamilton.	2678	20,568 75	16,293 79	Mar. 11, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
James Foley	2676	1,645 50	1,402 64	Mar. 11, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
James H. Johnson	2927	33,241 93	20,765 65	Mar. 11, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Edmund H. Martin	3235	Not set forth in claimant's petition.	7,427 52	Mar. 11, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Charles E. Bowles and Fannie A. Coryell, administrators of Thomas D. Coryell.	6191	32,768 00	Dismissed.	Mar. 11, 1872	To recover damages for alleged breach by the defendants of a contract for the survey of a certain tract of land in the State of Kansas known as the "Osage trust-lands."

*Appealed.

Statement showing all the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims for the year ending December 2, 1872, &c.—Continued.

Names of claimants.	No.	Amount claimed.	Amount awarded.	Date of judgment.	Nature of claim.
Wolfe Barnett	2780	$7,010 05	$4,421 86	Mar. 11, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Corporation of Roman Catholic Clergymen, of Maryland.	6258	29,363 34	Dismissed by claimant.	Mar. 13, 1872	For property of said claimant taken and destroyed by the Federal Army in the years 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865.
Oliver P. Cobb, James W. Christy, Lewis M. Foulk, Thomas Folbre, and Peter W. Williams, under the name of O. P. Cobb, Christy & Co.	5968	155,343 00	154,107 84	Mar. 25, 1872	For breach of two contracts made by the Government with the claimants for the delivery of six hundred thousand bushels of grain.
Eide F. Torck	3092	1,340 23	1,340 23	April 1, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
William W. Worthington	3327	45,188 10	45,177 00	April 1, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Asher Ayres	2545	105,178 00	36,643 92	April 1, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Melvin B. Wilbur	3349	1,812 60	1,173 07	April 1, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Leon Queyrouze, administrator of Simon Queyrouze.	3392	25,290 90	14,592 00	April 1, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
William and Robert McIntire	2785	7,320 25	5,072 67	April 1, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
John Quinlan, C. Cavaroc, Michael J. Brenan, and Jos. T. Maybury, executors of Dominick O'Grady.	3159	104,328 00	72,450 00	April 1, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Daniel L. Ferguson	2653	20,458 51	15,343 88	April 1, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Federick Z. Salomon	6130	4,116 20	*659 01	April 1, 1872	To recover on a quartermaster's voucher, delivered to claimant by a certain Captain Turnley, dated October 15, 1865.
William H. Greene	3076	10,885 67	10,885 67	April 2, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
James J. Waring	2738	3,428 12	2,629 95	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
James K. Reilly	2692	12,341 25	10,519 80	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Nancy M. Pullen, executrix of Albert Johnson and Franklin Pullen, for the use of Martin Tally, assignee.	3102	3,250 00	421 96	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
William Lightfoot and David Flanders	2842	36,450 00	14,201 73	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
George W. Anderson	2715	8,227 50	6,026 54	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
William Hunter	2702	4,113 75	3,506 60	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Daniel H. Baldwin	5741	15,083 75	12,974 42	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
James Cantwell	2584	26,068 00	10,817 39	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Theodore B. Marshall and George S. Marshall.	2697	17,956 25	14,727 72	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Levi DeWitt and Richard Morgan	2710	15,083 75	11,880 79	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Patrick J. Coogan	2923	2,821 50	Dismissed.	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Alexander Abrams	2721	2,056 87	1,577 97	April 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Esadore Cohn	3039	18,115 00	6,044 50	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Abram Minis, William Hunter, and George L. Cope, executors of Edward Padelford.	2644	4,467 30	3,476 85	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Abram Minis, William Hunter, and George L. Cope, executors of Edward Padelford.	2645	21,000 00	9,467 82	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Chandler H. Smith	2652	30,000 00	26,650 16	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Erastus Henry	2796	6,595 40	5,687 78	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
John C. Schreiner, S. A. Schreiner, and Herman L. Schreiner, under the firm of John C. Schreiner & Sons.	3066	25,000 00	7,539 19	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Samuel F. O'Neil	2571	4,113 75	3,155 94	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
James W. Lathrop and Harvey W. Lathrop	2665	12,341 25	9,039 81	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
John Stevenson	2736	2,742 50	1,928 63	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Ezekiel E. Simpson and William J. Keyser, administrators of John A. Simpson.	3113	12,630 42	12,630 42	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of sale of $21,407.49 of Bank of Louisiana notes, being the amount of claimants' deposit with said bank at the date of the seizure of same under order of General Banks, August 17, 1863.
Ezekiel E. Simpson	3092	28,380 13	28,380 13	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of sale of $48,111.57 of Bank of Louisiana notes, being the amount of claimant's deposit with said bank at the date of the seizure of same under order of General Banks, August 17, 1863.
Elie Coté, for the use of John C. Martin and John W. Gradon, assignees of Graydon & McCready, Clapp & Kent, Dowd, Baker & Whitfield, Tracy, Irwin & Co., Cumming, Simpson & Armstrong, Martin & Morrison, D. B. Babcock & Co., Reynolds & Smith, Muir, James, Rothschild & Co., Hersh & Rich, assignees.	2902	12,831 42	10,483 71	April 15, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Desiré Godet	3348	6,422 50	5,760 00	April 16, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Salmon B. Colby	2225	35,726 00	Dismissed by claimant.	April 16, 1872	For timber taken from claimant by the Government in 1863, for completing the defenses of Washington and for fuel.
George C. Freeman, administrator of Henry C. Freeman.	2659	89,131 25	58,284 89	April 17, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Charles W. Howell	6148	2,119 35	2,119 35	April 22, 1872	For a decree under act of May 9, 1866, directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow claimant, as a disbursing officer, a credit in the settlement of his accounts.
Andrew Low	2695	562,212 50	474,685 89	April 22, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Adolph B. Weslow	2776	10,224 30	5,785 89	April 22, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Lawrence de Give	3405	4,400 00	2,317 90	April 22, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Jane Parker, administratrix of H. Parker	3271	7,903 80	5,600 00	April 22, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Andrew J. Gill (No. 1)	6195	4,226 40	*Dismissed.	April 29, 1872	For damages for alleged violation by defendants of contract for delivery of 1,200 cords of wood at Fort Lyons, Colorado Territory.
William Syphax	6389	2,180 00	2,180 00	April 29, 1872	For additional pay heretofore withheld from claimant, to equalize his compensation with that of an assistant messenger of the Interior Department.
William H. Lender	3239	5,825 00	Dismissed.	April 29, 1872	For the alleged breach of verbal contract for the hire and keeping in repair of the sloop Amelia.
Abram Minis, William Hunter, and George L. Cope, executors of Edward Padelford.			18,058 79	April 29, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Edwin Parsons	2634	40,000 00	5,417 61	April 29, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
George Parsons	2634		3,611 78	April 29, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Edwin Parsons	2635	40,000 00	10,940 60	April 29, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
George Parsons	2635		7,293 72	April 29, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Sarah A. Richmond, administratrix of Henry A. Richmond and Samuel Wilmot.	2669	34,281 25	19,006 78	April 29, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Charles Weile	6316	23,250 silver soles, or their equiv. in U. S. coin.	*Dimissed.	April 29, 1872	To recover balance of an award made by the joint commission of the United States and Peru, in pursuance of treaty of July 6, 1869.
Anthony Fernandez	2793	31,212 40	20,688 94	April 29, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Michel Castille	3391	23,535 25	18,240 00	April 29, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Henry S. Bulkley	6189	60,864 21	*Dismissed.	April 29, 1872	An action upon an Army transportation contract, for damages.
Ralph Meldrim	2783	8,212 00	2,717 61	May 6, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Margaret Doyle, administratrix of James Doyle,	2783		Dismis'd.	May 6, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Julius Witkowski	3559	150,000 00	92,547 00	May 6, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Henry and I. Meinhard	2819	19,597 50	10,430 55	May 6, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Pierre E. Broulatour and Hypolité Norés	6164	620 48 in gold & in.	620 48 in coin.	May 6, 1872	For recovery of balance of deposit, made with the collector of the port of New Orleans, to cover amount of import duties, then and there estimated to be due and payable on merchandise owned by claimants.

*Appealed.

Statement showing all the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims for the year ending December 2, 1872, &c.—Continued.

Names of claimants.	No.	Amount claimed.	Amount awarded.	Date of judgment.	Nature of claim.
Joseph A. Ware	6089	$86 07	$86 07	May 8, 1872	For amount due claimant on his compensation as a clerk in the Treasury Department, and deducted for absence occasioned by sickness.
Alfred Austell	2518	28,302 00	12,385 88	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Gallus Kerchner	6185	12,754 50	1,377 50	May 8, 1872	For balance alleged to be due from defendants, under contract for delivery of stone for the erection of the main arsenal building at Indianapolis, Indiana.
Hibernia Armstrong	3070	26,471 55	*23,097 72	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Edward W. Wilcox, use First National Bank, Pomeroy, Ohio.	6198	1,845 00	1,845 00	May 8, 1872	To recover a balance withheld from a number of quartermaster vouchers given for horses, bought for the military service of the United States.
Andrew J. Fleming, use First National Bank, Pomeroy, Ohio.	6197	195 00	195 00	May 8, 1872	To recover a balance withheld from a number of quartermaster vouchers given for horses, bought for the military service of the United States.
William B. Adams	2672	34,281 25	22,439 20	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Abraham Backer	2673	57,592 50	44,610 91	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Luke Christie	2716	5,485 00	4,733 91	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
William Lattimore	2743	959 87	701 32	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Edward Lovell	2742	8,913 12	6,736 80	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Edward Lovell, Nathaniel Lovell, and William Lattimore, under the firm of Lovell & Lattimore.	2749	7,541 87	5,557 05	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Hermann Bulwinkle	2574	18,654 95	8,541 31	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
A. Oldham, intervenor	2499	9,361 80	7,000 00	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Lucy H. Carroll, administratrix of G. W. Carroll	3139	110,772 00	93,353 65	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Edw. C. Anderson, executor of Aaron Wilbur	2740	27,425 00	17,883 66	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
John R. Wilder	2683	23,996 87	15,969 84	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Edwin M. Price	3154	103,901 25	68,712 93	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Simon Witkowski	2963	55,524 00	20,688 94	May 8, 1872	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.
Bessie Elgee Gaussen, executrix of J. K. Elgee.	....	.....	*137,882 62	May 8, 1872	Conflicting claims for the proceeds of a quantity of cotton seized by one Camp, acting as Treasury agent for the United States, on Buffalo Bayou, in the State of Mississippi, in April, 1864.
Cornelius V. Woodruff and Adolph Bouchard, under the firm of C. V. Woodruff & Co., for the use of Charles S. Lobdell.	....	.....	*72,365 95	May 8, 1872
Cornelius V. Woodruff and Adolph Bouchard under the firm of C. V. Woodruff & Co.	2157	366,170 83	*155,922 26	May 8, 1872
Julia Nutt, executrix of Haller Nutt	3496	.....	*Dismissed.	May 8, 1872
Mary Ann Wells and others, children and representatives of J. K. Elgee.	3152	.....	*Dismissed.	May 8, 1872
William Lindon	2731	2,331 12	1,803 81	May 13, 1812	For proceeds of cotton captured by the United States military forces.

*Appealed.

The question being taken on Mr. GARFIELD's motion that the committee rise, it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODFORD reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

The bill (H. R. No. 2206) to grant an American register to the bark Azor;

The bill (H. R. No. 1763) to permit Edward Savage, of Minnesota, to enter one quarter-section of the public lands or any legal subdivision of the same; and

The bill (H. R. No. 363) for the relief of Lucius A. Rountree.

The message also informed the House that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 1935) for the relief of William J. Scott, late aid-de-camp on the staff of General Spear.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 482) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Willamette River at Salem, in the State of Oregon; and

A bill (S. No. 464) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes;" approved June 30, 1864, and the several acts amendatory thereof.

TWENTY-FIVE MILLION REDISTRIBUTION.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to give notice that on Monday I shall ask leave to introduce and ask the House to pass a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870. I may state that this is what is known as the twenty-five million redistribution bill.

DUTIES ON MANUFACTURED ARTICLES.

Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3096 to repeal the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced the duties on certain manufactured articles 10 per cent.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. PIERCE for ten days; to Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan, for two weeks; to Mr. HUNTON for one week, and to Mr. CLYMER until Tuesday next.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ARTHUR: The petition of W. F. Maddux, Peter Newkirk, George Stoller, E. Matlock, Thomas Matlock, W. O'Neal, Gustavus A. Foster, and Richard H. Jones, to have refunded certain moneys alleged to have been illegally collected from them as commutation money, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BASS: The petition of importers of wrest-pins for pianos, for the imposition of a specific duty on every one thousand pins, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ELKINS: The petition of Charles Probst, of Santa Fé, New Mexico, to be paid for commissary supplies furnished the militia of said Territory, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GOOCH: The petition of Sarissa B. Cole, of Boston, Massachusetts, for arrears of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Henry County, Illinois, for congressional aid to a double-track freight railway from New York to Council Bluffs, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. LAWRENCE: The petition of W. R. Smith, of New Carlisle, Ohio, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LOWNDES: The petition of steel workmen in Cumberland County, Maryland, against a duty on tea and coffee, and for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1874, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of John Hudson, of Philadelphia, late of Company A, Twenty-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. READ: The petition of citizens of Larue and Hart Counties, Kentucky, that A. Blakely be permitted to distill apple and peach brandy without license, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SCUDDER, of New York: The petition of citizens of Flushing, New York, for an appropriation for the survey and mapping of Flushing Harbor and inlets, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WHITEHOUSE: The petition of Charles G. Dickinson for extension of letters-patent, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. WOODFORD: The petition of D. C. Stoddard and 60 others, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1179) granting increased pensions to disabled soldiers, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 25, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. BROMBERG. I ask that an order be made for the printing of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the accompanying documents relative to the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I object to any such order as that asked for by the gentleman from Alabama being made.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I object to any order to print that report, and I desire to make a statement about it.

Mr. BROMBERG. I object to the gentleman making any statement unless I am allowed to answer him.

The SPEAKER. This proceeds by unanimous consent, and the Chair will hear the gentleman from Connecticut if there be no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I only wish to say that the papers in relation to this matter are all already in the hands of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Is this matter before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have called for the regular order that the appropriation bill may be disposed of.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I only desire to say that all these papers are in the hands of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that the report sent in yesterday was referred to that committee, and if that committee should in its discretion think it necessary for the public interests that it should be published they will undoubtedly ask the House to do so. The gentleman from Alabama can be heard before the committee, and has already been there. He can see every paper that is there.

Mr. BROMBERG. The House is certainly entitled to see these papers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will indicate to the gentleman from Alabama in what way he can attain his object. He can make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BROMBERG. Very well. I submit the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered, and the gentleman can call it up at any time.

PORTLAND, DALLES AND SALT LAKE RAILROAD.

Mr. HURLBUT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 2745) providing for the construction of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad, and for the performance of all Government service free of charge; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the amendments, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the following communications; and the same were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught of a bill to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes;" and

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught of a bill for the relief of certain tribes of Indians in the northern superintendency.

DISTRIBUTION OF CURRENCY.

Mr. MERRIAM, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House, as early as practicable, how much of the $54,000,000 in notes for circulation has been issued under the provisions of section 1 of the act approved July 12, 1870, entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," and to what banking associations the same were issued, giving the names and localities of such associations, the amount issued to each, and the date of issuance, with the date of application for the same; if any applications for circulating notes have been made to the Comptroller of the Currency which have not been granted, to state by whom, when, and where, what respective sums, and also to state what would be the distributive share of the $354,000,000 of circulating notes provided for by the act approved June 3, 1864, entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," and by the first section of the said act of July 12, 1870, accruing to each State and Territory under the principle of distribution declared in the act approved March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,'" and in the said first section of the act of July 12, 1870; and to inform the House whether the Comptroller of the Currency has made a statement showing the amount of circulation in each State and Territory and the amount to be retired by each banking association in accordance with the provisions of the sixth section of said act of July 12, 1870, and, if so, transmit to the House a copy of the same; also, to inform the House of the aggregate amount of applications for currency on file in the Comptroller's office, and the amount not assigned on each 1st of January and July after July 12, 1870, to date hereof.

CHARGES AGAINST OHIO FOR ARMS, ETC.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

STATE OF OHIO, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Columbus, April 23, 1874.

SIR: In accordance with the instructions thereof, I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, relating to sums of money charged against the State for arms, &c., during the late war.

Very respectfully,

W. ALLEN, Governor.

Hon. H. B. BANNING,
House of Representatives, Washington.

Joint resolution relative to sums of money charged against the State for arms, &c., during the late war.

Whereas large sums of money were charged against the State of Ohio for arms, &c., furnished during the late war, and other States equally as populous had no charges made against them during the same period, and it is probable that error occurred in keeping the accounts with this State, which does great injustice to it, but which the Ordnance Department of the United States has no authority to correct. The principal if not all of the issue which was made to this State during the war was to it for the maintenance of the General Government, and should have been charged as arms and stores issued to the volunteers of the United States, and not to the State of Ohio. Whereas the indebtedness of the State of Ohio to the General Government for arms, &c., charged is about $127,000:

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use all honorable means to secure the passage of the bill introduced into the House of Representatives, January 29, 1872, entitled "A bill making provision for arming and equipping the whole body of militia of the United States, and for other purposes," whereby the said indebtedness may be canceled.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to forward a copy of the above preamble and resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

GEORGE L. CONVERSE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
ALPHONSO HART,
President of the Senate.

Passed April 16, 1874.

THE STATE OF OHIO,
Office of the secretary of state:

I, A. T. Wikoff, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution therein named, adopted by the General Assemby of the State of Ohio on the 16th day of April, A. D. 1874, taken from the original rolls on file in this office.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed the seal of this office, at Columbus, the 17th day of April, A. D. 1874.

[SEAL] A. T. WIKOFF,
Secretary of State.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 2868) to render available an unexpended balance of appropriation for collection and payment of bounty, &c., for colored soldiers and sailors.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the security of the foundation of the Washington monument; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Washington Monument.

PAYMENTS FOR PROPERTY CAPTURED OR ABANDONED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting a statement showing payments made under acts of April 9, 1816, and March 3, 1817, for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the United States service; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

UTE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to an agreement concluded with certain Ute Indians, September 13, 1873, in accordance with the act of April 23, 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

TELEGRAPH LINE BETWEEN SANTA FÉ AND TUCSON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to a proposed telegraph line between Santa Fé and Tucson; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JURISDICTION OF GENERAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draught of a bill giving to general courts-martial jurisdiction of the crimes of murder, manslaughter, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLIES FOR DESTITUTE PERSONS ON THE LOWER MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting estimate of an appropriation for the purpose of furnishing food to destitute persons on the Lower Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF JUDICIAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the necessary expenses of the investigation of the Judiciary Committee into the charges against Judge Storey, of the western district of Arkansas, be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the rules be suspended and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the pending appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WOODFORD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending amendment, which was to insert the following:

To pay judgments of the Court of Claims, $1,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Attorney-General:

For compensation of the Attorney-General, $8,000; Solicitor-General, $7,500; three Assistant Attorneys-General, at $5,000 each; one Assistant Attorney-General of Post-Office Department, $4,000; Solicitor of Internal Revenue, $5,000; Naval Solicitor and Judge-Advocate-General, $3,500; examiner of claims, $3,500; law clerk, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,200; stenographic clerk, $2,000; two law clerks, at $2,000 each; six clerks of class four; additional for disbursing clerk, $200; one clerk of class two; five copyists, at $900 each; one messenger; two assistant messengers; two laborers; and two watchmen; in all, $79,760.

Mr. GARFIELD. It has been found necessary to move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting, before the words "five copyists," the words "one clerk, who shall be telegraphic operator, $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For contingent expenses of the Department, namely: for furniture and repairs, $1,500; for care of and subsistence of horses, $1,400; repairs to carriages and harness, $600; for law and miscellaneous books for the library of the Department, $3,000; for the same for the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, $1,000; for stationery, $2,500; for miscellaneous expenditure, such as telegraphing, fuel, lights, and other necessaries, $6,000; in all, $16,000.

Mr. NESMITH. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out the words "for care of and subsistence of horses, $1,400; repairs to carriages and harness, $600." I believe that this estimate is an innovation. I believe there has been no definite estimate of that kind offered heretofore for this Department. I do not perceive the necessity of an appropriation of $2,000 for the purpose of transporting anything connected with the Department of Justice about this city. If this item of $2,000 is stricken out I fancy it will be that much saved to the people who pay the taxes. I observe that in other portions of this bill, which were passed when I was not present, there is appropriated for the Postmaster-General for a similar purpose $1,200 and for the Secretary of the Interior the same sum. Now, if it is proper and necessary to make such appropriations for the heads of the Departments, there should at least be equality among them. I do not understand why the Attorney-General should have $800 more appropriated for the use of private horses and carriages than is appropriated for the other members of the Cabinet.

I do not know if my amendment is adopted that it will be a saving to the Treasury. I see that heretofore, when no appropriation of that kind was made, the contingent fund has been used for a similar purpose. I hold in my hand copies of vouchers for moneys paid out of that fund. They are as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 27, 1872.

United States Department of Justice, to Andrew J Joyce & Co., Dr.
To one landaulet, No. 94, $1,600. Received payment.
ANDREW J. JOYCE & CO.

BALTIMORE, July 29, 1872.

United States Department of Justice, bought of Coblens & Kaufman, one pair of bay horses, $750. Received payment.
COBLENS & KAUFMAN.

WASHINGTON, July, 1872.

United States Department of Justice, to Andrew J. Joyce & Co., Dr.
One pair stitched pole-straps and gold slip-buckle, $8; new silk lining in landaulet, $35.75; painting and varnishing landaulet, $42.50; various other items same nature, $124.88; total, $211.13.

Then in November last there was another bill for repairs of landaulet, and again in December, making in all over $800. The landaulet seems to have been repaired from June, 1872, to December last to the amount of about $1,100. It must have been that it was not a good landaulet when it was purchased, though costing $1,600, to require that amount of repairs.

Now I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who is supposed to be laboring here in the interest of economy and who the other day struck out the enacting clause in a bill which provided for a small appropriation to remunerate widows and orphans who have been made such by lack of protection on the part of the Government, which permitted the Indians to massacre their natural protectors. The occupant of the office, the Attorney-General, has the honor to be a constituent of mine; and I desire to see all my constituents treated equally well. I do not believe in giving $2,000 for private purposes to a man who is already drawing a salary of $8,000, while you refuse to compensate widows and orphans for property destroyed by the Indians through your own neglect.

I do not believe that it is under any circumstances legitimate to appropriate money to the heads of these Departments for the purpose of transporting them about this city. Why not make a similar allowance to members of Congress? Why not make an appropriation of the same kind for the benefit of the judges of the Supreme Court? Why not make the system equal and uniform everywhere? This constituent of mine is the only one who indulges in this gorgeous oriental splendor of riding in a sixteen hundred dollar landaulet. Why, sir, lawyers of my State of his caliber ride upon the outside of a fifty-dollar mule, and think they are doing well at that. But, sir, there is a Spanish proverb, I believe, "Put a beggar on horseback and he will ride to the devil." Now, I have no objection——

Mr. NEGLEY. I object to the remarks of the gentleman in reference to a Cabinet minister.

Mr. NESMITH. I am discussing a public appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] will desist for a moment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] will state his point of order.

Mr. NEGLEY. My point is, that the gentleman has referred to a Cabinet officer of this Government as a "beggar placed upon horseback."

Mr. NESMITH. No, sir; I have not. That was not my language.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask that the Clerk read the remarks as taken down by the reporter. I submit that such remarks are not proper with reference to a Cabinet officer of the Government.

Mr. NESMITH. I think I have said sufficient on this subject. The gentleman objects to the discussion of a public appropriation bill——

Mr. NEGLEY. No, sir; I do not object to that; but I do object to the offensive remarks of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon will continue his remarks, being careful to proceed in order.

Mr. NESMITH. Well, sir, without making any direct reference to anybody, I say it is a Spanish proverb, "Put a beggar on horseback and he will ride to the devil." I have no objection to the termination of this journey in that direction, but I do not want the people to pay for the transportation.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations one question in regard to this item. I have been appointed a member of a sub-committee to investigate the contingent expenses of the Department of Justice since its establishment in June, 1870; and I expect in two or three days to make a report upon the extravagance growing out of the contingent fund of this Department; but for the present, regarding it as inappropriate to make any statement as to what will be the substance of that report, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations how many horses are provided for in this appropriation "for care of and subsistence of horses?"

Mr. GARFIELD. We limit it only by the amount appropriated; we have nothing to do with the number.

Mr. DURHAM. That is not answering my question. How many horses are provided for in this item?

Mr. GARFIELD. I answer the gentleman, that we say nothing about the number. There will be, I presume, so many as can be provided for (including the carriage) with this amount of money.

Mr. DURHAM. Then I put this further question to the gentleman: Whether it will take $1,200 to keep one horse or two horses or three horses; and I renew the question, how many horses are provided for in this item?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can get all the echoes he may desire in answer to his question as to the number. I do not know the number, and do not undertake to state it.

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman is not answering with fairness and candor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not the information upon which to answer, and therefore I do not undertake to do so. I will only say that the Committee on Appropriations required from the Attorney-General a full and detailed statement of his contingent expenses during the past year; and instead of appropriating in a lump, as has hitherto been done, we have made the appropriation in detail, as has been done in regard to the Treasury Department. In the latter case we covered two pages and a half of the bill in order to itemize all the contingent expenses. In this case we have also itemized closely and carefully and have put down what seemed to us a reasonable sum for contingent expenses.

Mr. DURHAM. Then I still put to my distinguished friend the question, whether he has the items to show how many horses there are in use by that Department?

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman has made a careful investigation as one of a sub-committee, and has his report inchoate and almost ready to launch, he certainly ought to be able to answer that question better than I can.

Mr. DURHAM. I can answer so far as the past is concerned; but in this bill we are providing for the future. I will answer that there have been three horses in use by that Department in the past. Now, how many are there to be in the future, for the year ending June 30, 1875?

Mr. GARFIELD. The number of horses in the future is something I suppose that would require a prophet to predict; but if the gentleman——

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman understands my question. How many have the committee provided for in this bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, I am utterly incapable of furnishing brains for the understanding of a statement, in addition to making it. I have made the statement plainly that we have limited the amount of money to be used in the care and keeping of horses, the repair of wagons and carriages, and everything pertaining to the stable.

Having made that limitation, if there can be a thousand horses kept on that it is not my look out. If gentlemen of the House consider that amount too much let them move to cut it down.

Mr. DURHAM. If I have not got the brains to answer, I have the candor and honesty to answer; I will say that much. If my distinguished friend, who stands at the head of this Appropriation Committee, and who ought to know the purpose of this appropriation of $1,200 for taking care and for the keep of horses will not have the fairness or the candor to answer on the floor of this House, then I leave it to the House to judge between him and myself.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no need of heat about this matter. My friend here inquired concerning this matter, and he said he had a report nearly ready to make. I was glad to have any information on the subject. I understood his sub-committee was examining this whole matter.

The Committee on Appropriations have put in what they considered enough to maintain the expense of what now exists. The gentleman says that is three horses and carriages. I should suppose three horses, one for relay in case of accident, would not involve an extravagant amount, provided we proposed the heads of Departments shall have the employment of horses and carriages.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Attorney-General said this to the committee: that he is compelled in his office not only by his assistants to run the Court of Claims on the Government side of it, but all the cases of the United States in the Supreme Court, and that there is not a day in which he does not require the use of a horse and carriage. Whether it should be by what the Government owns or what they may hire makes no difference. If gentlemen want the Attorney-General to walk to the Supreme Court on foot, or to ride in the cars, or to go wherever else he goes as other citizens, if the gentleman wants to break down the habit of years and sweep away all arrangement for horses and carriage, very well. That is a policy I have no quarrel with, except to say it has not been the custom for the last seventy-five years.

Mr. NESMITH. I beg to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not here defending what has been done, but only stating what is, and the Committee on Appropriations have reported what they deemed reasonable simply for keeping up for public use alone a sufficient amount of transportation for the heads of Departments.

Mr. NESMITH. Permit me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. NESMITH. Does he believe there is any more necessity for providing these Departments with expensive horses and a sixteen hundred dollar carriage than the judges or members of Congress? And in connection with that, does the Attorney-General go every day to the Supreme Court? And another question in the same connection: Are these Departments being run by horse-power?

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt there are abuses. I know there have been abuses in regard to horses and carriages in the various Departments. These are abuses, if not as old as the Government, older than any member of the House. There has been no Attorney-General from the foundation of the Government who was not furnished with horses and a carriage by the Government as a part of his official outfit for the performance of his duties. There is no hour of the day when the heads of the Departments are not liable to be called upon to meet the President in Cabinet to consult with each other, and it is a matter of common decency in the transaction of business they should have it. I know that some of the heads of Departments have, because of what has been said in public concerning it, expressed their preference that it should be wiped out, and hereafter they should either have their own or hire hacks on the stands as they may, rather than be subject to the imputations which are constantly made in regard to them.

Now, I believe that in regard to the Attorney-General there has been purchased for him an expensive carriage that ought not to have been purchased. I believe there was an improper use, an indefensible use of the contingent fund that none of us will think of defending or approving. That was, however, done, as the committee were assured—for they inquired into it—not by the Attorney-General in person, but by his subordinates, who always had the management of his contingent fund.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman answer me a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. In a moment. The Attorney-General said to the committee the management of his contingent fund had never been personally attended to by him; that it had been the habit of the office to leave it to be managed by the chief clerk or some subordinate. The Attorney-General so far as he was personally concerned had not known of the methods of expenditures, and he regretted it had been done without his personal supervision.

My own impression is that, while the occasion has furnished us with an opportunity to correct this thing in the future, it is somewhat ungenerous, and somewhat unkind to take a special case of what has been an old habit, perhaps I should say an old abuse, almost from the foundation of the Government, and to throw all the burden of it upon the shoulders of one man. Common fairness, that sense of Anglo-Saxon fair play which resides I know in every breast in this Hall, will see that we ought to treat it in a general way rather than throw the whole burden on a single case and a single officer. I am here to extenuate nothing and to conceal nothing, but to state what I understand to be the facts, and to appeal to the judgment of the House as to what ought to be done. If the amount which we propose here to appropriate is too large, cut it down. If gentlemen think it ought all to be wiped out, cut it all out. But let us do it as a matter of general management, and not in a spirit of persecution of one officer. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] for a question.

Mr. MAYNARD. The question I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is this: We all of us have a general idea of the manner in which the positions of heads of these Departments ought to be filled, and the style and manner of living as the sense of propriety, usage, and the public expectation require. Now, assuming that the gentleman has given attention to this question, as I am satisfied that he has, I wish to ask him whether he thinks from the investigation he has given it that the present emoluments, incidental or other including carriage, horses, and everything else, are or are not adequate to sustain an officer properly in that position, so that a poor man who had no fortune of his own could properly fill it?

Mr. GARFIELD. I hardly think the granting of a carriage for the use of the office ought properly to be considered an emolument of the officer. I would not vote thus to increase his salary indirectly. If the office of the Attorney-General needs, for the proper discharge of the business, the employment of a pair of horses and a carriage, then we ought to vote it to the office and not to the man; and it is on the ground that the proper discharge of the duties of the office requires such an outlay that the Committee on Appropriations have reported this. If the salary is inadequate, let it be made adequate.

Mr. MAYNARD. We undertook in the last Congress to increase the salaries of these officers, and I wish now to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether the further investigation he has given the subject satisfies him that these positions are properly and adequately provided for, so that, as I have said, a poor man could possibly fill them?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not believe there is a man in the United States who is fit to be Attorney-General whose professional services would not bring him a far greater sum than the salary of Attorney-General now gives him.

Mr. WOOD rose.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] has been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me for a moment while I make an apology to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM.] I addressed an expression to him which I wish to withdraw. The gentleman had several times repeated a question to me which I thought I had answered, and I said testily what I regret.

Mr. DURHAM. I would not have said what I did if the gentleman had responded to my question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought I had done so.

Mr. DURHAM. I accept the apology of the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee if he means to have it understood from the tenor of the interrogatories which he addressed to the gentleman from Ohio that we should eke out the salaries of our public officers by any such indirection as carriages, perquisites, and the use of public property? We have considered carefully and candidly what we ought to pay our public officers. We have fixed their salaries, and I suggest to my friend from Tennessee that to say to the country that there is any justification for the appropriation of public property indirectly on account of any insufficiency of a salary that we have fixed by law and maintained by law for these many years is a reflection upon the administration of public affairs that I should think my friend from Tennessee would defend the administration against rather than throw upon it.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman asks me a question and I will answer it. We have been told here that if the Attorney-General wants to ride let him ride in his own carriage or hire one as other people do. Now we know, if we know anything about it at all, that he is compelled by the duties of his office to go from his official office to the court under such circumstances that he cannot walk, but is obliged to ride. Now, if the salary is inadquate——

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further.

I do not understand that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations undertakes to justify the appropriations which he has reported in this bill for carriages and horses for the Department of Justice. But he rather defends it upon the ground that it is an abuse of long standing. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, if his statement with reference to the past were true it would be no excuse for or justification of the continuance of a very shameful abuse in the expenditures of that Department. But, sir, I take issue with him and with his statement of the fact. It is not true that the practice to which we now take exception is of long standing in this Government, or is of any standing whatever prior to the incumbency of the gentleman who now fills the office. My memory, sir, goes back for a long period, not only with reference to the office of the Attorney-General of the United States, but with reference to all the Executive Departments; and I declare here that it is a practice of recent and modern introduction that any head of a Department, that any executive officer of this Government, shall seek to be carried through the streets of Washington at the public expense.

Sir, the Chief Justices of the United States, including John Marshall and Roger B. Taney, never traveled at the expense of the Government, either from their homes to Washington, or from their residences in Washington to the Capitol here, for the purpose of attending to their official duties. It is entirely a mistake to suppose that this is an old practice. It is an attempt to justify by an erroneous statement, founded upon a misapprehension, this system of having public coaches for the use of officials, bought by the money of the people wrung from the industries of the nation. Sir, it is entirely unnecessary that the public money shall be devoted to this purpose, and in my judgment it is a scandal.

But, sir, let me call your attention to figures to show the gradual increase of expenses in recent times with reference to the administration of justice. In the bill of last year we appropriated for the United States courts, district attorneys, marshals, &c., $379,850, while the present bill appropriates $401,750; an increase of about $20,000. Then, sir, we find that in the Department of Justice, of which this officer is the head, the appropriations in 1868 amounted to but $723,378.57. The expenditures have increased from 1868 until in 1873 they reached the enormous aggregate of $3,826,131.77, and every year from 1868 to 1874 has shown a stealthy, regular, unaccountable, remarkable, and, in my judgment, dishonest increase of the appropriations for this Department of the Government. And, sir, we are continually met when we raise objections to these extravagant expenditures by arguments like that which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] used in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] by evasion, by refusals to explain, by subterfuge and sophistry, and we are deprived of the opportunity to look into the facts and figures upon which these amounts are based.

Now I do hope that the time has at last come when the majority which has the power in this Congress as well as in the Executive Departments of the Government will remember the responsibility that rests upon them, and that they will be prepared to put on the brakes so far as public expenditures are concerned, to make a retrograde movement, and in this time of paralysis of trade and industry that we shall not continue to expand here while everybody at home is obliged to contract.

I repeat that I regret that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has been unable to give us any explanation of why he proposes to appropriate $1,400 for horses. He does not tell us whether it is for two or three horses; but we are bound to assume that this round sum is based upon some particular number. Sir, the whole thing is wrong.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question if he will permit me.

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. The gentleman has perhaps had longer experience in this House than any other member present, and has been here during many administrations in which his own party was in power. I would ask him whether he recollects an instance of the passage by Congress of a bill similar to the one now under consideration in which there was not an appropriation as large or larger than this made for this same purpose?

Mr. WOOD. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure. I remember when the lately deceased ex-President, Millard Fillmore, was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and reported these appropriations, and upon every occasion that gentleman was prepared to answer every question addressed to him with reference to the smallest item in any appropriation bill, and I know of no instance, such as the gentleman has referred to, in which there was not the strictest integrity and economy in every appropriation bill and in every Executive Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I desire to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from New York has been arraigning the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for his failure to make a direct answer to a direct question. I call attention to his answer to my question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.]

Mr. WHEELER. I wish simply to say that I think this matter of carriage hire by officials has been greatly abused, and in the Army appropriation bill which passed the House a few weeks ago I think safeguards were put against further abuses, at least by Army officials.

Now I want to correct my colleague [Mr. WOOD] in one respect. He says virtually that this matter of carriage hire is a new one in the Executive Departments. I say that the republican party inherited this abuse from the democratic party, and I want simply to read here a copy of a voucher which I found in the War Department in working up the Army bill: "The United States (for the office of the Secretary of War) to Andrew J. Joyce, Dr., May 11, 1859"—that was in the good days of Buchanan rule and in the most virtuous days of John B. Floyd in the office of Secretary of War—"to difference between fine Germantown carriage and old wagon, $200."

That was when the democracy was getting beyond the days of its simplicity, and when it was becoming necessary to discard old wagons and ride in fine Germantown carriages.

Mr. WOOD. I want to correct my colleague, [Mr. WHEELER.] That was not for the purpose of carrying about the Secretary of War, but for the business of the Department.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes, for the business of the Department, which it seems could not be done in an ordinary wagon, but had to be done in a fine Germantown carriage. This voucher goes on to state—

Approved:
Received, Washington, May 13, 1859, from John Potts, disbursing clerk of the War Department $200 in full for above account.

ANDREW J. JOYCE.

This was for "the difference between a fine Germantown carriage and an old wagon."

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise simply for the purpose of saying that I do not stand here to justify any abuse in regard to the matter of carriages for the Departments, and do not believe any appropriation should ever go for carriages for private use. But it is only an act of justice and "necessity for the public business," as the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] has just admitted, that these carriages should be provided suitable for public business, according to a practice of long continuance. And as we have provided in this bill for carriages for the other Departments, I think it a very small business to strike out a necessary appropriation for the public business for the last one of the Departments provided for in this bill. I think the good sense of this House will honor the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] for his manly speech on this subject to-day. It is small business for us to bring up a thing of this kind every time we get an opportunity, to defeat a necessary appropriation simply because there has been an abuse in one instance, owing to the folly of a subordinate of the Department, as is claimed, in sustaining the purchase of a carriage, when no other Department has been charged with being guilty of that abuse at the present time. A necessary carriage to do the public business is one thing; an extravagant carriage for private use is quite another thing.

We have had a bill referred to our committee, introduced by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN,] requiring every one of these Departments and Bureaus to have "a good spring-box wagon" made to take the place of these carriages. I do not know but this may be a job for some wagon-maker in Maryland; I do not know how that is. But I know this: after having my attention called to the subject, I want to bear testimony to the fact that I have looked at several of the carriages of these departmental bureau officers, and in almost every case I have found that the carriage was a small one-horse covered carriage, sufficient to enable a Bureau officer to come to the Capitol when a committee sends for him, upon a rainy day like this, and not to be soaked in "a box-wagon."

Mr. WOOD. How about the landaulet?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not justify that landaulet, if what has been said is true. But these are not landaulets that I am talking about; they are plain, ordinary vehicles. If the gentleman will keep quiet I will state what they are. He says it is not true that these carriages were employed in the Department of Justice before this Administration came into power. Sir, he was never more mistaken in his life in any figures he has given. There were two carriages there when this Administration came into power. The carriages employed by the Departments are not, unless with rare exceptions, extravagant carriages. In almost every instance, certainly in the Bureaus where carriages are necessary, they are single, one-horse top-carriages, in which a man can go about, rain or shine, and attend to the business of his Department.

I do hope that this committee will put its foot on this miserable attempt to defeat necessary appropriations to do the public business, and throw discredit upon people who are not guilty of any extravagance because there has been extravagance in one case, for I do not believe the people of the country desire us to cut off necessary appropriations to carry on the public business. They do not care about this matter if there is no abuse connected with it; and an ordinary carriage necessary for official work is not an abuse. It becomes an abuse when a carriage is procured for or converted to private use.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not agree with my friend from Connecticut

[Mr. KELLOGG] that this is a small business. I take it that the question whether any officer of the Government makes a private use of the public property of the Government, or of the services of any person paid by the Government, is one of the most important questions which can come before us. We ought to devise every possible legal safeguard to prevent such an abuse from either beginning or growing; and those safeguards should be applied to every civil and military officer of the Government, from the President of the United States down to the groom who gives oats to his horses.

The question whether the public service requires the use of a horse and carriage by the Attorney-General of the United States is a separate question from that. The Attorney-General is sometimes bound to repair immediately to the President of the United States and bring with him the most important and the most secret papers of the Government. Every moment is of importance. He may be compelled to go to the President, or to go to the Supreme Court, taking himself away from twenty waiting members of Congress, all of whom have public business of importance to transact with him, and to all of whom every moment is of great value for the public service. Now, he must have a carriage and a driver under his control who can convey him from his house to the White House or to the Supreme Court with the papers or books which it may be necessary to have with him. I believe Congress would not grudge a reasonable and decent conveyance for that purpose. I do not think my friend from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH,] if he will permit me to use that phrase, would like to have the Attorney-General go down Pennsylvania avenue on the back of a fifty-dollar mule, with the public treaties and other papers stuffed in his pockets and dropping out along the street as he proceeds. I am afraid we have had some gentlemen in the office of the Attorney-General who would not be capable of keeping their seats on a fifty-dollar mule.

Mr. NESMITH. He can do it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have obtained leave of the House to move an amendment, which I shall offer to come in at the end of this section, prohibiting absolutely the use by any civil officer of the Government of any public property for any private purpose, or the receipt of any perquisite or compensation beyond such salary as is expressly fixed by law. If that amendment shall be adopted, then if the Attorney-General of the United States has an official carriage especially appropriated to his use, or if the President at the White House has the services of any person to care for the White House or to serve in his family, the appropriation must be distinctly made so as to be fully understood by the people.

Now, I hope the committee will pass upon this question which is now up with reference to their belief of the necessity of such a provision for the public business, and that they will adopt at the end of the section the clause which was read the other day and which will put an end to any abuse that may exist.

Mr. KELLOGG. I want to correct a misapprehension of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] He seemed to think that I justified the use of horses and carriages by officials for private purposes. I say that such a thing is an abuse. I would only justify the use of an ordinary carriage for the public business of these officers. When the use goes beyond that it is an abuse.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understood my friend from Connecticut to say that this use of public property by officials for private purposes was a small matter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWES. I do not participate in any of this personal criticism in connection with these carriages; I take no interest in it at all. It must be very evident to any one who understands the necessities of these Departments that horses and wheeled carriages of some kind are necessary for the proper carrying on of the business and the duties of these several Departments; and they should be provided for. The amendment which my colleague [Mr. G. F. HOAR] proposes draws the distinction properly; and after that shall have been adopted no use of horses or carriages for any other than public purposes will be sanctioned by our appropriations.

The debate grew up from an intimation on one side that this was a very proper way to eke out a scanty salary, and on the other side that this was the way salaries were eked out to such a sum that men could "condescend" to occupy the positions. That was wrong on both sides. There is no ground for the accusation of such a thing as a general rule, or for the attempt to justify it in any exceptional case. What is necessary in the form of carriages or horses let us provide for either by a standing law or by a specific appropriation; and what is unnecessary let us declare unlawful, without spending our time here in attempting to justify exceptional cases because some of us are unhappy over the fact that the salaries of officials cannot be raised consistently with public sentiment, and others of us are equally unhappy because we cannot find more cases than we do as fit subjects for criticism.

The line is properly drawn by the amendment offered by my colleague. What is necessary for carrying on the Government this House I am sure will make appropriation for, and so make it that my distinguished friend from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] with his eagle eye and his microscope, will hardly find opportunity or occasion for criticism. Nor will this House be induced, I think, to raise the salaries of officials, either directly or indirectly, to any such figures as will make anybody "condescend" to take a place that he cannot afford to occupy at the established salary.

Mr. NESMITH. I wish to say only one word in reply to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and to one or two questions which have been incidentally addressed to me in this debate. I do not desire to prolong the discussion. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations referred, I thought, in a rather disingenuous manner to me for having brought this matter up. He asked, "Why let this abuse run on for years and attack it now?" I desire to say in response to that gentleman that this is the first opportunity I have had to attack these abuses; and I intend to attack them hereafter wherever I find them.

My friend from New York [Mr. WHEELER] has referred to a peculation to the amount of $200 under a democratic administration. That may have occurred; I do not undertake to dispute the gentleman's statement; but it seems the spirit of peculation has been going on in rapidly increasing ratio, so that from a peculation of $200 we have now got up to $1,600 for a carriage. The question is not one as to the necessary transportation for the Department; it is not, as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] has intimated, a matter of a cheap one-horse carriage to ride in during rain or sunshine, but it is a question of $1,600 for a magnificent landaulet. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR]—and I take great pleasure in being designated and recognized by him as a "friend"—asked whether I would see the Attorney-General ride through the streets on a mule. Sir, I have often seen as good men as he ride on a mule; and I have so ridden myself. Why, sir, it is related that Philip the Second, of Spain, when he went to marry Mary, rode through Madrid on an Andalusian mule; and sacred history gives us an account of a better man than either of us riding through the streets of Jerusalem upon one of these useful animals, who have no pride of ancestry and no hope of posterity.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I wish to occupy but a single moment in referring to a remark which fell from my friend from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] in regard to a bill which I had the honor to introduce, and which I believe was the incipiency of the discussion of this whole question, at least in the House of Representatives. I do not know what will become of that bill under the charge of the gentleman from Connecticut; but I desire to say that the great evil which I attempted to strike at by the provisions of that bill has not been touched in the course of this discussion. I have no particular objection to the spending of a few hundred dollars by a gentleman in charge of a Department of the Government in the hire or even the purchase of a horse and carriage for the performance of his public duties; but what I desired to interfere with was a growing evil, which has had its origin, I believe, within the last few years, the practice on the part of gentlemen in charge of Bureaus or Departments of the Government taking their subordinates in office and assigning them to menial or household service.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, obtained the floor and said: I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.]

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, I was very much astonished to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] state, as I understood him to state, that the expenses of the Attorney-General's office have been steadily and dishonestly increasing since 1868. He has since stated to me privately that he did not intend so to say, but referred to the whole expenses of the judiciary. I happen to have some personal acquaintance with the expenses of that office from March, 1869, to June, 1870—not quite a year and a half. During that time there was a discussion on this floor in regard to the increase of expenses in the various Departments; and my exceedingly bland, amiable, and excellent colleague [Mr. DAWES] gratified my feelings on that occasion by saying in this House, when he was making a general onslaught upon expenditures of that kind, that there was one exception in the "poor and unpopular Attorney-General." Now, with the record at that time that there was then no increase in the expenditures of that Department—none proposed and none existing—I was somewhat astonished to hear the remark of the gentleman from New York, that these expenses had not only increased but increased dishonestly during all this period.

Mr. DAWES. My colleague [Mr. E. R. HOAR] knows that I did not mean to say that it was through any lack of merit that the Attorney-General in 1869–'70 was not popular.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I trust the House will permit me to make a statement on the merits of this matter, upon which I think I can give some information.

The CHAIRMAN. By consent of the committee this will not be deducted from the time of the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, I agree entirely with the proposition, and intend to support it when public property shall by any officer of the Government be devoted to his private emolument.

When this Administration came into power there were belonging to the United States for the use of the Attorney-General's Department two carriages, one of them rather old and unfit for going in stormy weather with safety to the health of the occupant. There were two horses that drew the carriage for the Attorney-General. The carriage which was ordinarily then in use was purchased by my predecessor in office from the contingent fund. It was a carriage of reasonable and moderate cost for any person to ride in. It did not cost as much as the average cost of hacks in Washington for the purpose. There was no carriage purchased during that year and a half. When one of the horses got lame there was a sale of the pair of horses and the purchase of another, which was a good purchase, as the United States could have sold them for more than they cost when I last saw them.

As to the necessity for the Attorney-General's office having a carriage and horses, there has been very great change in the duties of that officer. Instead of, as in the old times, in the days of Wirt, there being one, two, or three cases possibly on the docket of the Supreme Court under the charge of that officer, there is a long list; and the Attorney-General's office, while the Supreme Court is in session, has to keep about as active an eye on that court and in constant readiness to attend on it as any practicing lawyer in the country when his county court is in session.

The distance is such that being required to attend Cabinet meetings, being frequently and rapidly summoned to attend to public business before the court here, it was an absolute necessity there should be a carriage for the use of the Department.

How long it continued before I was acquainted with it I do not know, but for a good many years I understand. Papers had to be transferred, books had to be carried, and the time the Attorney-General was going in that carriage to and from the court was a part of his most valuable time for looking at papers and books, and frequently the only time in which it could be done.

During the first six weeks of this Administration, while the pressure for office was on the Executive and this Congress was in session, almost the only time the Attorney-General could get to read his official mail was while he was going back and forth in that carriage, and it was a part of the Attorney-General's office for the necessary transaction of public business.

At that time the expenses of the courts were not in the Attorney-General's office. They were in the Department of the Interior; that Department settled the marshals' accounts and district attorneys' accounts. Since that time they have been transferred to the new Department of Justice, of which the Attorney-General is head.

When the Solicitor-General's office was created he was required to assist in the charge of cases in the Supreme Court and in the Court of Claims, in which the Government has to be constantly represented.

The law officers of the other Departments were put under the head of this, and the necessity for frequent communication existed; and it appears there has been procured for the Solicitor-General's office a carriage with one horse, in which he can go from place to place in the discharge of his official duties.

I desire to say to the House I think these are reasonable and proper provisions, as much so as stationery or law-books, as much so as office or fuel; and that if you have your capital on so large a scale and have officers whose duties require them to go from place to place, you ought to provide some mode in which that necessary expense can be defrayed, which is not personal but is absolutely official.

Now, if any officer has taken these public provisions and availed himself of them, and procured for private use of himself or family either servants, or carriage, or furniture, or fuel, or anything else, it is a flagrant abuse, which Congress ought to check. But I do not think when the committee recommend what nobody is able to say is an unreasonable appropriation for a necessary expense in attending to official duty we should bring into that discussion any question of this kind. I am glad to know that some legal provision to prevent any abuse hereafter is to be offered.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. The discussion of this proposition has taken a wide range. I do not propose to follow it very far. It has furnished food for a good deal of wrath. It may furnish and ought to furnish food for reflection. It is conceeded on all hands to be an evil. If I understood the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations aright, he said the carriage was illegally purchased by a subordinate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not say that.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. At all events, if I heard him aright, he does not defend the original purchase. I have heard gentlemen who have been longest on the floor denounce it. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] stated that we did not inherit this evil from the democratic party. And yet gentlemen whom I revere and respect, and whom I have long looked up to as the leaders of the party to which I belong, stand up and defend it. When they do this I can hardly imagine that I am in the midst of the American Congress which is controlled by the party to which I belong, pledged to reform under any and all circumstances. And yet they are here defending what is stated on all hands to be a wrong act and an improper appropriation of the public moneys, and a practice which may lead to still greater evils.

I am met by the objection that if we correct this evil it ought to be done by a general law instead of by an attack made on a particular Department. I do not wish to attack any particular Department; but where am I to commence, or where is any man on this floor to commence, unless we strike at the evil in the place where we have the chance to strike at it, which is in this bill? I am not here to wink at this. We came here instructed to put our salaries at the lowest possible point. We have cut off our own transportation, so far as mileage is concerned. And yet it is insisted that we shall furnish carriages for the employés of the Government. I am opposed to any such thing.

I have no attack to make particularly on the Attorney-General or on his subordinates. I attack the whole system from beginning to end. And when gentlemen tell me that this is a small business, that this is a small affair, I answer that, be the abuse small or great, I will make the fight on it whenever it is presented to me. And I insist that we shall know distinctly whether the American Congress shall continue to recognize this admitted evil, or whether we shall strike it from our appropriation bills wherever it appears.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out "$6,000" in the last item of this paragraph and inserting "$3,000."

I wish to call the attention of the committee to a fact which has been overlooked in the discussion of this question. It is that there has never been an appropriation for such a purpose as this in any act that has ever passed this Congress. I state that very distinctly, after having looked through a number of previous appropriation bills. This is the first time we have had occasion to pass directly on such an appropriation; for the first time it is sought to make Congress responsible for such an appropriation of money. Heretofore the Committee on Appropriations, who examined the items which made up the miscellaneous appropriations, were alone responsible. Now for the first time the responsibility comes fairly upon this House; for until this session of Congress it has never been suggested that as a perquisite of office carriages, elegant carriages, such as are adapted to the uses of private and social life, should be furnished by the Government to its officers.

Let us look at the previous appropriation bills. The gentleman from Massachusetts was right in stating that up to 1870 there was no extravagant expenditure of the contingent fund. It only reached $10,000. But the increase of these perquisites, as has been stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] has been steadily going on from that time to this. Let me call the attention of the committee to the appropriations which were made by the act of 1872 for contingent expenses of the Department of Justice. They are as follows:

For fuel, labor, stationery, and miscellaneous items, $15,000; for rent of building, $15,000; for furnishing law books, $6,000.

Not a word about landaulets. Not a word about horses and carriages. No items of that kind ever appeared in your appropriation bills before this session of Congress.

Now the question is whether you will appropriate, not to buy carriages and horses, but merely to keep the carriages in repair and run them, the enormous sum of $2,000.

So in the appropriation bill of the following year there is no such item. Here, for the first time in our history, Congress is called upon to appropriate money directly and specifically for horses and carriages and their superintendence for the Departments. We are asked for the purpose of maintaining a couple of horses and a carriage for the Departments, even after the property has been purchased, to appropriate the enormous sum of $2,000. To keep the carriage and harness in repair we are asked to appropriate the sum of $600. I think most of the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations would find that among their constituents at home $600 would be regarded as an ample sum for the purchase of both horses and carriage.

This is for keeping carriage in repair and harness, $600. What an elegant carriage it must be that requires $600 a year to keep it in repair and provide harness! Sir, I am glad that for the first time Congress becomes directly responsible for this kind of appropriation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURROWS. I can say, Mr. Chairman, all I desire on this question in a moment. It is contended that the use of a horse and carriage is necessary in order to properly conduct the affairs of this office. If that be true, and I shall not stop to inquire into that point, the only question of any importance, it seems to me, is this: shall the Government furnish these or shall the party who occupies the office provide himself with them? That is the vital question, and, in my judgment, the only one. I object to the Government providing them out of pity, I might say, to the men who occupy the office. As a matter of justice, as a matter of self-protection to the occupants of the office, I believe as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has said that they would much prefer if the salary was sufficient to furnish themselves. I believe that no man can use a carriage appropriated by the Government without subjecting himself to the charge that he is using it for private purposes. It constantly lays the foundation for such a charge, and we are called upon to have committees appointed for the purpose of investigating the conduct of this or that officer who has the use of one of these carriages.

Now, so far as I am individually concerned, I would have nothing of this kind attached to these offices, but I would appropriate a salary sufficient to cover the expenses of the office, and if the salary as now fixed is meager and inadequate I would make it large enough; I would make it sufficient to bear all the necessary expenses of the office. For that reason I am in favor of striking out this appropriation, and if the salary of the officer is too small let us make it large enough not only to afford him sufficient compensation but to provide for a carriage if one is necessary, or for whatever is necessary to conduct the affairs of the office with efficiency and dispatch. Let us make the compensation large enough to pay all expenses, and then no officer will subject himself to this charge of using that which he has no right to appropriate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I should not detain the House a moment to make a remark upon this question but for the fact that I think I voted once this session upon a collateral question of investigation under a misapprehension. While I would probe all these questions to the very bottom where investigation is necessary to expose abuse of official trust, I do think that if there is anything unkind and cruel it is to attempt to make the incumbent of this particular office or of any other a scape-goat for a too common abuse, which has grown up here, as we are told, from long usage, and which ought to cease.

Sir, I do not think it is a question of the cost of a carriage and horse. In every State institution in the land, if it be necessary to have a horse or horses and carriage to transact its business, the people do not object to it or complain. Take, for instance, your hospital for the insane here, or any similar institution distant from the city, and who will say that horses and vehicles should be dispensed with or should not be attached to such institutions? The people of this country are not going to complain about the expense of a carriage if necessary to transact the public business. It is the abuse that the people query in regard to, not the cost, and I would sooner have the matter defined by law, have horses and carriages provided for by specific appropriations, than to have this matter of transportation governed by any sliding-scale for car-tickets and hack-hire. I like the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] I believe it is high time that this abuse should be corrected, and that men, if they have innocently fallen into it, should be relieved from censure, but not otherwise.

Wherein, then, does this question become important? I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, wherein I think it becomes of the very last importance. Every man in this country, in the East, in the far-distant West and South; every youth in your colleges, your schools, your farm-houses, your frontier cabins, has his ideal statesman in public life. We stand here in the focal light of the nation.

Mr. SHANKS. Will the gentleman define the difference between the thing and the abuse?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I was going to do so. I said every man, every youth in the land has his ideal statesman. He reads your speeches; he repeats your arguments; he scans your public acts; and if you fill up the measure of his ideal, he almost worships you. Now, it is just these little abuses, this disposition to smuggle in a few perquisites here and there, that shatters this ideal, shocks confidence, shrivels true manhood, and disgusts the people. It is right here that a damage is done which no amount of money can repair. It is an end to these things, once and forever, that the people of this country are hungering and thirsting for, even as they thirst for freedom itself, and it is from charges of this character that I would see our public men relieved by the clear provisions of law. It is for the sake of upholding the old ideal of honor which scorned these little abuses, this peddling business, that the question becomes fundamental. Though it proves sometimes, and often, a delusion, let us hold fast to the ideal still; teach our children to believe in it; strike down these abuses here and now, and strike them down forever.

Mr. SHANKS. I want the gentleman to define the difference between the thing and the abuse. That is what I want to know.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I should say the difference was this: whether the carriage and horse were used for the purpose of private display or the public business.

Mr. SHANKS. How can you determine by an appropriation bill whether the horse was driven for the display of a man or for public business?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I think the gentleman is drawing the line too closely and finely.

Mr. SHANKS. No, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I have spoken of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] which I think clearly defines the difference.

Mr. SHANKS. I asked the gentleman to define the difference between the thing and the abuse, and he cannot do it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Early in this Congress no one point was more strongly insisted upon by gentlemen than that the Committee on Appropriations should as far as possible cut off everything vague about our appropriation bills, that we should introduce the habit of itemizing. The committee have undertaken to meet the demand, in which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] shared as much as any other man on this floor, to make everything specific. Hitherto, from the beginning of this Government, contingent funds have been given in the lump; in the appropriation of so many thousand dollars for contingent expenses of a Department or Bureau. Now, when the Committee on Appropriations at last have carefully itemized all these contingent funds, have limited them, defined them, restricted them, so that each particular appropriation is made for its own particular purpose, the very gentleman who more than any other has helped bring about that state of things (and I honor him for it) now gets up here and berates the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee of the Whole for having now for the first time proposed to legislate in favor of the horse and carriage abuse.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no; I honor the committee for doing this, so that Congress might know for what purpose they are asked to appropriate.

Mr. GARFIELD. The precedents from the beginning of the Government until now have been in favor of appropriating in the lump. I took the trouble a few weeks ago—I mention it now as an illustration—to go over the appropriation bills for the first fifteen years after the adoption of the Constitution, bills framed and passed by the fathers. I find that in them they appropriated a round sum for the War Department, a round sum for the Treasury Department, a round sum for the State Department, allowing the heads of those Departments to expend it as they thought the public service required. It was many years before they itemized even a whole appropriation bill. In one single appropriation bill they appropriated so many millions for one Department, so many millions for another Department, all the appropriations for a year being in one appropriation bill.

A single word more. We have cut down this appropriation for contingent expenses $5,000, and for rent $4,000 below the amount appropriated last year for this purpose, and yet gentlemen are not happy. I believe the Committee on Appropriations have put this bill in the best form in which such a bill was ever presented since the Government was founded. It is a limitation, a restriction; and I ask the Committee of the Whole to act upon it in the spirit in which it was prepared.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FORT. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations this question: I understood him to say that the committee did not sustain the purchase of this carriage by the Attorney-General.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not say anything about that. The committee had nothing to do with the purchase of the carriage. I did say that we believed there had been an abuse of the power of using the contingent fund by the purchase of carriages, or the use of them for private purposes. And the Committee on Appropriations propose to add a clause to this bill forbidding the use of any public carriages or horses, or any public property, for any private purpose, and to limit and make definite the amount to be given for each purpose. So far as the past is concerned I did not say. The committee are now acting not for the past but for the future. I admit freely there has been an abuse; and the committee have proposed what they believe would be a protection against such abuses in the future.

Mr. FORT. Allow me to finish my question, which was this: I understood the gentleman to say, when he had the floor before, that this carriage was purchased by a subordinate of the Attorney-General's office.

Mr. GARFIELD. So we were informed.

Mr. FORT. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he has investigated the subject to ascertain who was the subordinate who purchased this carriage, and whether he has been dismissed from the service or in any way reproved for what he has done?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of finishing a sentence which was cut off by the fall of the gavel. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform referred to a bill which I had the honor to introduce some days since. That bill was not in regard so much to the hire or use of a public carriage for private purposes, as it was to the use by the heads of the different Departments of the Government in their private households of the services of persons who are borne on the rolls of the Departments and paid by the Government. I desire further to state that only yesterday I was called upon by a committee of republican officers—gentlemen who are on the rolls of the Departments—who stated to me as a fact, that while Government employés they have been compelled, under the threat of losing their Government employment, to do menial service in the households of some of the chief executive officers of the Government. The bill which I offered was more particularly directed to that abuse.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I hope that if the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] makes charges of that kind against the head of an Executive Department he will specify the officer to whom he refers, and bring the subject before the House in a more proper and formal way than by an amendment to an appropriation bill; I mean by a measure looking to impeachment.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] had understood me properly he would have understood that I made no charge myself. I stated the fact that only yesterday several persons who claimed to be in the employment of some of the Bureaus of this Government alleged to me as a fact, that while engaged as Government employés they had been compelled, under the threat of the loss of their employment, to do menial service in the households of higher officers of the Government.

Mr. HALE, of New York. "Chief executive officers," the gentleman said.

Mr. O'BRIEN. "Chief Executive Departments," I said.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman's language could not be understood as meaning anything less than the head of a Department. If any such officer has been guilty of such conduct, or if the gentleman has information on which he relies which points in that direction, I trust it will be brought to the notice of the House formally and explicitly in the shape of a measure for impeachment, and not as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The committee who waited upon me said that they would submit a statement of the matter in writing on next Tuesday. As soon as I obtain such a statement I will lay the letter before the gentleman from New York, and he may make it the foundation of any charges he pleases I only state facts which have been in the public prints and which have been brought to my attention by these public officers. I asked them to submit their statement in writing, and they promised to do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the committee rise to close debate.

Mr. SPEER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio insist on the motion?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODFORD reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that all debate in the Committee of the Whole on the pending paragraph of the legislative appropriation bill be closed in three minutes after the committee shall resume its session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WOODFORD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to say that in the law organizing the Department of Justice, approved in 1870, there was an omission of the requirement which applies to all the other Executive Departments of the Government except the Department of the Interior. The Attorney-General was not required to report annually to Congress a detailed statement of the expenditures of the contingent fund. It was evidently an accidental omission; for such a provision applies to all the other Departments except the Department of the Interior. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to remedy that omission. If a point of order be made upon the amendment, it will be ruled out because undoubtedly it changes the existing law; but it is so manifestly just and right, so plainly in the direction of public fidelity and official economy, that I trust no member of the committee will raise a point of order upon it. I move to amend by adding at the close of the pending paragraph these words:

And the Attorney-General shall hereafter annually report to Congress in detail the items, amount, and causes of expenditure of the contingent expenses of this Department.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the amendment will be entertained as in order.

There was no objection.

The amendment was adopted.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. NESMITH.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 70, noes 62; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. NESMITH were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 69.

So the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of the portion (three floors) of the building occupied by the Department of Justice, $12,000.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out $12,000, the appropriation for rent. It is to be regretted that the question of our finances had not been settled previous to our being called upon to act upon this vast appropriation bill, because during the present unsettled condition of this vital question in our material progress some men feel that we should exercise a liberality commensurate with the dignity of a great, industrious, and free people, while others feel that with a possible contingency we must be very penurious. Now, whatever may have happened within a few days, I do not believe that the action of this Congress at the present time will authorize an immediate return to specie payments; first, because all history proves that such a step, in the present condition of our finances, would be disastrous to the welfare of our country——

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. MERRIAM. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not raise a point of order. I am coming to the question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist that the gentleman shall confine his remarks to his amendment.

Mr. MERRIAM. I will do so in a moment. This is preliminary.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on it now.

Mr. MERRIAM. I do not believe we are coming to specie resumption before we have, as a prudent people, prepared the way.

Mr. RICE. I object.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. RICE. This only relates to the rent of three floors of this building.

Mr. MERRIAM. This bears directly on the question whether or no we shall be able to pay a rent of $12,000 for this purpose.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. MERRIAM. And to show the committee that we need not expect to come to immediate specie resumption I read from the President's annual message:

My own judgment is——

Mr. GARFIELD. I must insist on my point of order, because if we are to get through with this bill to-day we have to work on it. I know the gentleman wants to make a speech on specie payments.

Mr. MERRIAM. No, sir; I wish to make a speech on the question here at issue, which reaches to the hearths and homes of all our forty million people and determines our ability to pay $12,000 rentals.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair.) The Chair feels bound to say that in Committee of the Whole large liberties have been granted, and the gentleman from New York will confine his remarks as near as possible to the question under consideration.

Mr. MERRIAM. I will do so. The President states in his annual message——

Mr. GARFIELD. The President's annual message has no reference to the rent of the Department of Justice.

Mr. FORT. I hope the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will apply that rule to himself.

Mr. GARFIELD. You can apply the same rule to me; I have not violated it.

Mr. FIELD. I hope the gentleman from New York will not be further interrupted.

Mr. MERRIAM. The President truly said in his annual message, when alluding to the panic of September last:

My own judgment is that, however much individuals may have suffered, one long step has been taken toward specie payments; that we can never have permanent prosperity until a specie basis is reached; and that a specie basis cannot be reached and maintained until our exports, exclusive of gold, pay for our imports, interest due abroad, and other specie obligations, or so nearly so as to leave an appreciable accumulation of the precious metals in the country from the products of our mines.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am compelled to insist on my point of order.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from New York will not be interrupted by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. He has a right to give such reason as he pleases for his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will suspend his remarks.

Mr. FORT. I move that the committee rise in order that the gentleman from New York may be allowed to discuss his amendment in his own way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels bound to say in the discussion of this bill large liberties have been allowed to other gentlemen, and while the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, strictly speaking, is entirely in order and well taken, yet the Chair does not feel it is his duty, in view of the precedents established by the latitude allowed in the discussion of this bill, to decide that the gentleman from New York should be compelled to confine himself strictly and exclusively to the bill under discussion.

Mr. MERRIAM. I will be as brief as possible.

The President further states:

To increase our exports, sufficient currency is required to keep all the industries of the country employed. Without this, national as well as individual bankruptcy must ensue.

Now, my colleague from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] the other day when addressing this House stated in regard to our currency that it was "based on moonshine."

Mr. TREMAIN rose.

Mr. MERRIAM. Wait a moment.

Mr. TREMAIN. I wish to say a word.

Mr. MERRIAM. Wait till I get through, if you please.

Mr. TREMAIN. I hope I shall have leave to reply.

Several MEMBERS. O, yes.

Mr. TREMAIN. That is all I ask.

Mr. MERRIAM. He said our currency was based on moonshine. Now, Mr. Chairman and members of this House, I consider that a slander on every American of our forty millions of people. It is based on the integrity, honor, and all the wealth of the American people. He quotes our good President, and I also wish to quote him. The President says in his annual message:

The experience of the present panic has proven that the currency of the country, based as it is upon the credit of the country, is the best that has ever been devised. Usually in times of such trials, currency has become worthless, or so much depreciated in value as to inflate the values of all the necessaries of life as compared with the currency. Every one holding it has been anxious to dispose of it on any terms. Now we witness the reverse. Holders of currency hoard it as they did gold in former experiences of a like nature.

Mr. Chairman, I see no "moonshine" coming from the President of the United States on this subject. I quote further from the same annual message:

It is patent to the most casual observer that much more currency, or money, is required to transact the legitimate trade of the country during the fall and winter months, when the vast crops are being removed, than during the balance of the year.

And again:

In view of the great actual contraction that has taken place in the currency, and the comparative contraction continuously going on, due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories, and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year. Indeed, if clearing-houses should be established, thus forcing redemption, it is a question for your consideration whether banking should not be made free, retaining all the safeguards now required to secure bill-holders.

During the last four years the currency has been contracted, directly, by the withdrawal of 3 per cent. certificates, compound-interest notes, and "seven-thirty" bonds outstanding on the 4th of March, 1869, all of which took the place of legal-tenders in the bank reserves to the extent of $63,000,000.

During the same period there has been a much larger comparative contraction of the currency. The population of the country has largely increased. More than twenty-five thousand miles of railroad have been built, requiring the active use of capital to operate them. Millions of acres of land have been opened to cultivation, requiring capital to move the products. Manufactories have multiplied beyond all precedent in the same period of time, requiring capital weekly for the payment of wages and for the purchase of material; and probably the largest of all comparative contraction arises from the organizing of free labor in the South. Now every laborer there receives his wages, and for want of savings-banks the greater part of such wages is carried in the pocket or hoarded until required for use.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MERRIAM. Thanks to my amiable friend. If the employés of this Government who receive their salaries in our currency are to be taught it is "moonshine," we can expect only demoralization and damage to public interests from an unwillingness of men and women to give the sweat of their brows in exchange for the luxury of a little "moonshine."

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DAWES. The rule requires the gentleman from New York to speak on the other side during the next five minutes.

Mr. MERRIAM. I will leave it to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts to do that, unless we convert him from the error of his "Ways and Means."

Mr. BLAND. We will take the gentleman; let him come over to us.

Mr. MERRIAM. If our employés are taught that the money they receive is but "moonshine," you demoralize them. In other words, it can only tend to bring about anarchy in their work. I will leave that especial point to these men who find fault with the President of the United States. I do not; because I believe that when the country asked for bread through a financial measure the Senate bill gave it only a stone. And I believe that when they take up the bill that was matured in this House, and put on the section unfortunately voted down to cancel annually a portion of the legal-tenders, the people of this country will get what they want. In regard to this question of rent my idea is that if we are to come down to specie payments before this great country is prepared to maintain them, we are paying too much; but not believing that this great nation will rush into this experiment wildly and without preparation, I do not know that it is too much. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. TREMAIN rose.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Is not debate on the amendment exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment is pending, to strike out the last word. On that amendment there has been one speech, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] now rises to oppose it, and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TREMAIN. My honorable colleague [Mr. MERRIAM] has deemed it fitting and proper to refer to an impromptu observation which I made in the discussion on the question relating to the salary of clerks in the assay office in New York. Let me recall to my colleague and to this House the circumstances under which that observation was made, to show how slender a foundation there was for any such criticism upon that remark.

My distinguished and good-natured friend from the West, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER,] cast some intimations or aspersions in a good-natured way upon the gentlemen from New York who had voted against what they regarded as inflation measures. What was said was in kindness. And although my friend from New York who has spoken was not included because he did not vote for those measures, I who voted for them was included. Will anybody suppose my friend was in earnest when he said in substance—I do not remember his precise words—that we had already entered upon the era of specie payments? That he was in earnest when he said that, according to the declarations of his friends from New York, that on the 1st of July, when this bill took effect, specie payments would be resumed? Was it necessary for him to have said for the information of any gentleman of sound body and sound mind upon this floor that this was a joke?

I responded in the same good-natured tone, and as the gentleman had gone to the extreme himself in saying that we had gone to the extreme of specie payments, I antagonized him by saying in an off-hand and pleasant manner that our present currency—a moonshine currency—must continue instead of specie payments. But did anybody fail to understand that that was a good-natured remark? Did not even the gentleman from the West, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] with that severe frown upon his brow which in the case of those who do not know him induces them to think that he is cross when he is not—did not even he say, in answering the gentleman from New York [Mr. MELLISH] yesterday morning, that his remark made in the same connection was a good-natured pleasantry? Was there any reason for making this good-natured observation a foundation for criticism or a lecture?

But I am glad my colleague has alluded to it. For now, when he has made a serious matter of it, I take occasion to say that I would be the last man to make an assault on the currency as it stands. These $400,000,000 of legal tender I have had occasion to defend not only before the people, but in my professional character before the highest court of the State of New York.

When war was raging, and I believed the Government could not be sustained except by the issue of legal-tender notes, I had the honor to be associated with eminent gentlemen in maintaining before the court of appeals of New York the constitutionality of the law under which they were issued. And when the decision was rendered upholding that law I sent a dispatch to Hon. Salmon P. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury, announcing the result, and afterward received his congratulations on a decision in support of what was regarded as a measure essential to the preservation of the Union.

But I never dreamed when I was deriving from the war powers of Congress, under the Constitution the power to pass such a law that it was to become our daily bread in time of peace. If it had been said that we should issue legal-tenders in time of peace, I should have answered as Mr. Lincoln did when the Albany convention sent resolutions to him denouncing him for arbitrary arrests and when it was urged that the danger was that when peace came these arbitrary arrests would be chronic and that the precedent established would be followed in time of peace. He answered in a good-natured manner, in his plain, old-fashioned, common-sense mode of dealing with questions, and said: "As to your apprehensions that there is danger that this thing will be continued in time of peace, I think there would be just as much danger that a sick man who has taken calomel and jalap when sick will continue to take them when health is restored."

I believe our currency is good. I take occasion to say for the benefit of my honorable colleague from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] that I think it is the best irredeemable currency that has ever existed. It is only 12 or 14 per cent. below par, while ordinarily in the history of the world the value of irredeemable currency has gone down to zero. And so would ours now but for the pledges that are behind it and the honorable obligations which are connected with its issue.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TREMAIN. Allow me just a moment longer. My colleague has referred to the President. Perhaps I ought not to complain that I am criticised when brought into such good company. My friend no doubt wanted a text for his speech, and it was a matter of taste whether his text should be moonshine or a text from the Bible. In this case the President has made remarks on an entirely different issue from the one presented to him when he employed the vetoing power; and a passage is selected to show inconsistency. Why, sir, you might prove from the Bible by wresting a passage away from its context that there is no God. For is it not said in the Bible that "the fool hath said in his heart there is no God?"

Mr. MERRIAM. I have not said there was any inconsistency.

Mr. TREMAIN. If my colleague had read a passage in the message which he omitted, I think he would have found that the President then occupied the same position which he occupies to-day in his veto message. In his annual message, just beyond the point where my colleague read, he says:

Undue inflation, on the other hand, while it might give temporary relief, would only lead to inflation of prices, the impossibility of competing in our own markets for the products of home skill and labor, and repeated renewals of present experiences. Elasticity to our circulating medium, therefore, and just enough of it to transact the legitimate business of the country, and to keep all industries employed, is what is most to be desired. The exact medium is specie, the recognized medium of exchange the world over.

Again he says, near the conclusion of that portion of his message:

These suggestions are thrown out for your consideration, without any recommendation that they shall be adopted literally, but hoping that the best method may be arrived at to secure such an elasticity of the currency as will keep employed all the industries of the country, and prevent such an inflation as will put off indefinitely the resumption of specie payments, an object so devoutly to be wished for by all, and by none more earnestly than the class of people most directly interested—those who "earn their bread by the sweat of their brow."

I will say here, lest I should be misunderstood, that I still stand by the remark I made in the observations I submitted upon this question, that I sympathize with the honest desire of the West and South to obtain more currency. Is there anything in the veto message which shows that the President occupies any different position from that which he took in his annual message? Is there anything in the veto message that shows that he is unwilling to sanction a measure for more currency, provided it shall be based on a sound and substantial basis?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. TREMAIN. I hope the gentleman will allow me two or three minutes more.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I object.

The question was taken on Mr. GARFIELD's motion, and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. TYNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HOSKINS reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that all debate on the pending paragraph be closed in half a minute after the committee shall resume the consideration of the same.

Mr. BECK. I hope the gentleman will allow ten minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think we ought to go on with the bill. We have had a speech on each side.

Mr. BECK. I have a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency complaining of something I said yesterday, and I want to have it read.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can get it in when we reach the next paragraph.

The motion to close debate was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield the half minute to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SAYLER.]

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] whether his arraignment of the majority in this House, from the West and South, for its lack of patriotism, intelligence, and honesty was also in a spirit of pleasantry? There is that in his remarks the other day which if it was uttered in earnest is a reflection that I regret to hear come from any gentleman. He says:

> Unfortunately the same commanding majority from the West and the South that have demanded that we should have an expanded currency remain unbroken in this House. And unless that majority can be influenced by the good, sound arguments of our patriotic and honored Chief Magistrate, General Ulysses S. Grant, who has proved himself equal to the emergency, we shall have no return to specie payments, and all we can expect is to hold on to what we have got, an inflated currency, payment in irredeemable greenbacks and irredeemable bank-notes, and a currency based upon moonshine, with that return to gold and silver long hoped for, but not likely to be reached during the present Administration.

He now says that what he uttered was uttered in a spirit of pleasantry, or, at least, in the heat of debate. I take it, sir, that the majority in this House, whether it be from the West and South or from the East and North, or wherever else, is not to be characterized as unfortunate by one who is in the minority here without his being called to account for it. If it was really said in pleasantry I would be glad to know it; but I take it that whether the majority here is from one section of the country or the other, whatever they may have to say on this or any other subject ought to be treated with consideration, and not with a kind of pity that carries with it rebuke and reproach.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate upon this paragraph has, by order of the House, expired.

Mr. TREMAIN. May I not answer the gentleman's question?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed by order of the House.

Mr. TREMAIN. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I object.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. MERRIAM'S amendment.

Mr. MERRIAM. I withdraw that amendment.

Mr. TREMAIN. I move to strike out the paragraph, that I may have an opportunity of answering the question put to me by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SAYLER.]

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman cannot do that, for debate is closed on the paragraph.

Mr. TREMAIN. Then I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following:

> For official postage-stamps for the Department of Justice, $15,000.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I move to strike out the clause just read. I do not know that I wish to debate this motion. But inasmuch as there has been an order given to our reporters not to interlineate in the debates the words "laughter," "applause," &c., I have been unable as a western man to see where the laughter or irony came in in the speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.] Therefore, I would like to ask him whether we are to understand his last speech in a Pickwickian sense?

Mr. TREMAIN. I wish to say but a word.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. HOSKINS.) The Chair desires to say that one speech having been made in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. COBB,] the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] will be considered as taking the floor to make a speech against it; after which debate upon the amendment will be considered closed.

Mr. TREMAIN. I have heard it said that some artist was so unfortunate in his labors that when he attempted to paint a horse it was necessary to write under the painting, "This is a horse." Now, when my friend from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER,] who opened this discussion, indulged in a playful train of remark it was not necessary that he should say to the House, "This is a joke." And I am very much surprised that any gentleman in this House should have understood that in my remarks there was any reflection upon the honesty or integrity of gentlemen from the West. The report of my remarks as printed in the RECORD will show that I was endeavoring to reply to the remark of my learned friend when he said that we had taken a step in the direction of specie payments. In answer I said that unfortunately I did not so read the signs of the times; for the same majority that passed the currency bill could prevent the resumption of specie payments. Now could any one fail to understand that what I said was in the same tone and temper as were the remarks of my friend?

If, however, there is any misunderstanding about it, I desire to say that while we in the East, many of us, have honestly differed with our friends in the West, yet we know and have always known that they have the same regard for the true interests of the country that we ourselves have; and if in the heat of debate of an impromptu character, where I had no opportunity to consider what I was to say or to review the report of what I had said, I have attempted, according to the custom I have always adopted, to pay my debts as they accrued, without allowing them to become liable to interest, I hope my friends from the West will understand now and forever that while I have differed with them honestly, I know they are sincere, honest, and patriotic. And before this session of Congress comes to a close I hope that we shall be able to strike hands upon some measure, without violating what we believe to be the fundamental principles of honor, duty, and plighted faith, so as to give our friends from the West what they desire.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I could have wished that the gentleman had made these remarks in his speech of the other day.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. HOSKINS.) The Chair feels bound to notify the committee that it is exceedingly desirous that this bill should be passed by the House to-day. The Chair will therefore endeavor to confine members to the discussion of the question before the committee.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I withdraw my motion to strike out.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to insert as a new section before section 2 that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> No civil officer of the Government shall hereafter receive any compensation or perquisites, directly or indirectly, from the Treasury or property of the United States beyond his salary allowed by law, or shall make any private use of such property, or of the service or labor of any person in the employment or service of the United States, which service or labor is paid for by the United States: Provided, That this shall not be construed to deprive any officer of the United States of such fees as are or may be expressly provided by law, in addition to the salary of such officer, or the use of such property as may be expressly by law appropriated to the use of such officer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] to use the phrase "salary or compensation," instead of "salary" only. Some are paid a per diem compensation, which cannot be called a salary.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> That every clerk of the circuit or district court of the United States, United States marshal, or United States district attorney shall reside permanently in the district where his official duties are to be performed, and shall give his personal attention thereto; and in case any such officer shall remove from his district, or shall fail to give personal attention to the duties of his office, except in case of sickness, such office shall be deemed vacant.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I like that amendment, and hope that the committee will give unanimous consent that it may be offered after my amendment has been acted upon, without having it made subject to a point of order. But I would not like to have it offered as an amendment to my proposition, because it might embarrass it.

Mr. FORT. And it relates to a different subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I will ask consent to offer my amendment as an additional section after the pending amendment is disposed of.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Let it be adopted now, and then my amendment can come in. I withdraw my amendment for that purpose.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana one question. Has he any objection to embodying in his amendment a provision that the aggregate salary or fees of the officers named in this amendment shall not in any case exceed a certain sum, say $6,000?

Several MEMBERS. That is the law now.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. No; it is not the law with reference to certain district attorneys and marshals that are covered by the gentleman's amendment. Something came out the other day in reference to district-attorneys in certain parts of the country holding offices worth twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars a year. My amendment is designed to meet such cases.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I would rather have that go in a separate section. I do not want to embarrass my amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the gentleman thinks that this amendment will embarrass his proposition, I will not press it now, although I fear I shall not be able to get in the amendment anywhere else.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I prefer that the gentleman should offer his amendment separately.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, it was agreed to.

Mr. FORT. In the clause appropriating $15,000 for official postage-stamps for the Department of Justice, I move to amend by striking out $15,000 and inserting $500. I have no remarks to make on this amendment. The question has been discussed, and a corresponding amendment has been made with reference to other Departments.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I now renew the amendment I have already offered.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by adding to the amendment just adopted the following:

No payment shall hereafter be made on account of mileage out of any money appropriated by this or any other law beyond the actual individual and necessary traveling expenses of the person to whom such money shall be paid.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am compelled to make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. We have already adopted a similar amendment with reference to the Pension Bureau.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it can be voted on without debate I will not insist on the point.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 66, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RUSK and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to make an observation about this amendment if it is not too late. I thought at first that the proposition was all right, and voted for it; but I see that it will actually cut off the mileage of United States marshals, though it is the only mode in which their compensation is provided for.

Mr. RANDALL. Then let them be excepted.

Mr. GARFIELD. Another objection is that this provision would induce men to run up large hotel bills to be charged as "traveling expenses."

Mr. RANDALL. I modify my amendment by striking out the words "and necessary."

Mr. BURCHARD. I make the point of order that it is too late to modify the amendment, as the committee is now dividing upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. If the modification is objected to, it cannot now be made.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 92.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by adding the following:

No payment shall be made on account of mileage out of any money appropriated by this act beyond the actual individual traveling expenses of the person to whom such money shall be paid.

Mr. RUSK. I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not liable to a point of order. It is merely a limitation on the appropriation. I have changed it so that it will not reach the mileage of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. RUSK. I am not fretting about my mileage.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the amendment changes the law.

Mr. HURLBUT. I make the point of order that the amendment proposes to change the compensation of marshals, deputy marshals, jurors, and witnesses.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. WOODFORD.) The point of order is evidently well taken. The amendment is not entertained.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask consent to offer as a separate section the following amendment already indicated by me, to come in directly after the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from Indiana:

That no officer named in section — of this act shall hereafter receive by way of salaries, fees, or allowances a sum exceeding in all $6,000 per annum.

Mr. BURCHARD. I must make a point of order on this amendment unless it is recommended by the Judiciary Committee. The amendment is evidently imperfect in form as it does not make any allowance for the expenses of these officers, but provides broadly that they shall not receive in any case over $6,000. I think we had better not change laws of this kind without an examination by the Judiciary Committee. I must therefore make the point of order. If the amendment were limited to net compensation I would not object.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The point of order is undoubtedly well taken; I have no doubt about that; but I had hoped that no gentleman would make it. The amendment is directly in the line of legislating with reference to officers who have been put into the bill and with reference to whom other provisions have been made. This is a salary bill. My amendment must at once appeal, I think, to the good sense of members. At any rate it is one on which every member can vote understandingly. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw the point of order so that the committee may vote on the proposition.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to ask a question of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose presently. I have no feeling about this amendment at all. It would not have occurred to me but for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] legislating in reference to the residence of these officials. I did not understand that came from the Committee on the Judiciary. It was a good measure offered by him on his personal responsibility, and the House accepted it, waiving all points of order, and let it in. I did not offer mine as an amendment to that, as it might embarrass it. The same reasons which applied to that amendment also apply to this amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. I rise to a point of order. I do not object to the gentleman from Maine discussing the point of order, but I only wish it to be understood that the point of order is still pending against this amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I understand that the gentleman insists on his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois is reserved.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I understand it, and now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] to ask me a question.

Mr. SPEER. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine is evidently in the right direction, but I wish to know whether he has considered the effect of the words he has used. I ask him whether under existing laws the fees of these clerks and others are not now limited to $3,500, and whether the language used by him, that the fees shall not exceed $6,000, would not by implication increase all those offices to $6,000 a year?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have thought of that in hastily framing the section, and I have no objection to adding proper words to cover the point of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPEER. That is right, and I hope the amendment as modified will be allowed to be acted on.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to add "but this section shall not be so constructed as to increase the salary or compensation of any officer beyond the amount now allowed by law," and to fill the blank with "two."

Mr. BURCHARD. Let the amendment be again read as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That no officer named in section 2 of this act shall hereafter receive by way of salary, fees, or allowances a sum exceeding in all $6,000 per annum. But this section shall not be so construed as to increase the salary or compensation of any officer beyond the amount now allowed by law.

Mr. BURCHARD. The reason I raise the point of order on the amendment is not because I object to limiting the salaries of officers who may receive a net compensation above $6,000, but there is danger in hasty legislation proposed by a member upon the floor who has not considered the effect of the language used, which has been considered by no committee of the House, and which is thrown upon us all at once. It is exceedingly dangerous legislation, in my judgment, to adopt a proposition the scope and effect of which may be greater than is intended. One object that is proposed is to limit the amount received. It does not say the net compensation or the net receipts. There is a law limiting the amount the clerks shall receive to $3,500. My impression is the limitation as to marshals is $6,000. I think that is sufficient. The language of this paragraph, however, does not cover the net compensation, and I think it had better go to the Committee on the Judiciary before it is enacted into a law.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. Is the proposition of the gentleman from Maine before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It was offered by the gentleman from Maine when the gentleman from Illinois rose to the point of order that it changed existing law. By consent the gentleman from Maine was allowed to explain his amendment, and the gentleman from Illinois is now speaking on the point of order he raised.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I understand the gentleman from Maine admits his proposition is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his point of order?

Mr. BURCHARD. I do, for reasons I have given.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to rule the point of order is well taken, and the amendment therefore is not before the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the act entitled "An act limiting the appropriation of certain moneys for the preparation, issue, and reissue of certain securities of the United States, and for other purposes," approved May 23, 1872, and all other acts and parts of acts making permanent appropriations for the expenses of the national loan, are hereby repealed, this repeal to take place on the 1st day of July next; and hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall annually submit to Congress detailed estimates of appropriations required for said expenses; and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary, are hereby appropriated to defray the expenses of the national loan, for the following clerical and other employés, to wit:

In the office of the Secretary of the Treasury: Seventeen clerks of class four; eight clerks of class three; six clerks of class two; four clerks of class one; forty copyists, at $900 each; eight messengers, at $840 each; twenty-one assistant-messengers and laborers, at $720 each; and twenty-two laborers, at not exceeding $2.25 per day; making, in all, the sum of $129,933.50.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to insert in line 15, after the word "Treasury," the words "one clerk of loans and one clerk of currency at $2,500 each," and to strike out "seventeen" and insert "fourteen;" so it will read: "In the office of the Secretary of the Treasury one clerk of loans and one clerk of currency at $2,500 each; fourteen clerks of class four," &c.

Mr. BECK. I rise for the purpose of laying before the committee a communication from the Comptroller of the Currency, addressed to me and received a few minutes ago, in which he states that he thinks I did him an injustice in the remarks I made here yesterday. As he is a public officer and has no right to be heard on this floor on his own behalf, and as he has addressed a letter to me desiring that his views should be laid before the House, though they are perhaps not pertinent to the question now pending before the committee, I ask that his letter be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as part of my remarks, or if there be no objection I should like to have it read.

Several MEMBERS. Let the letter be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, April 25, 1874.

SIR: My attention has been called to a statement in the Washington Daily Chronicle of this morning, said to have been made by you in the House yesterday, as follows:

"Mr. BECK favored the motion to strike out, because he was opposed to the creation of so many Bureaus on which no reliance could be placed. He said they had made a Comptroller of the Currency who had deceived the President, and led him to send a false message, misleading the House and the country. He had represented to the President that four millions of the national-bank currency were not taken when there were one hundred and twenty-eight applicants for it. He had deceived the President and held the circulation to save the $25,000,000 to his friends in the East."

I understand that you called upon the deputy comptroller on Thursday, and regret that you did not find it convenient at the same time to call upon me in the adjoining room, when I have no doubt I could have easily satisfied you that my course in reference to the distribution of the currency has been in exact compliance with law. From the slight acquaintance I have with you I believe that you are incapable of doing an intentional injury to any one, and I therefore request that as an act of justice to myself you will cause to be read in the House the following extract from my last annual report, showing the difficulties in the way of the execution of the act of July 12, 1870:

"The act of July 12, 1870, authorizing an additional issue of $54,000,000, and providing that such notes should be issued to banking associations organized or to be organized in those States and Territories having less than their proportion under the apportionment contemplated by the act of March 3, 1865, and that the bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States to secure the additional circulation should be of any description of United States bonds bearing interest in coin. It also provided that a new apportionment of the increased circulation should be made as soon as practicable, based upon the census of 1870, and for the cancellation monthly of 3 per cent. certificates equal in amount to the national-bank notes issued—the last of these certificates having been finally redeemed during the present year. Of this additional circulation, authorized by the act of July 12, 1870, there was issued November 1, 1871, $24,773,260; in the year ending November 1, 1872, $16,220,210; in the year ending November 1, 1873, $7,357,479; leaving at the date of this report still to be issued to banks already organized and in process of organization, $5,649,051.

"The act of July 12, 1870, further provides that when the fifty-four millions of additional circulation "shall have been taken up," "the Comptroller of the Currency shall, as additional circulation may be required by the banks having less than their proportion, make a requisition for such an amount, commencing with the banks having a circulation exceeding $1,000,000 in States having an excess of circulation, and withdrawing their circulation in excess of $1,000,000, and then proceeding pro rata with other banks having a circulation exceeding $300,000 in States having the largest excess of circulation, and reducing the circulation of such banks in States having the greatest proportion in excess, leaving undisturbed any States having a smaller proportion until those in greater excess shall have been reduced to the same grade, and continuing thus to make the reduction provided for by this act until the full amount of twenty-five millions provided for shall be withdrawn; and the circulation so withdrawn shall be distributed among the States and Territories having less than their proportion, so as to equalize the same."

"In accordance with the provisions of this section, it will be the duty of the Comptroller, as soon as the necessary bonds shall have been deposited to secure the small amount of additional circulation not already issued or "taken up," to proceed to make requisitions upon banks organized in the States which have an excess. It will probably be the duty of the Comptroller during the next three months to make requisitions as provided for by this act upon banks already organized in States which are in excess, for an amount equal to the aggregate amount of circulation called for by the applications on file from the States which are deficient. These requisitions will be made upon the banks located in the following States and cities:

Four in the city of New York	$5,018,000
Thirty-seven in the city of Boston	13,320,000
Twenty-one in the State of Massachusetts	2,659,000
Seventeen in the city of Providence	2,818,000
Fifteen in the State of Connecticut	1,185,000

"This will reduce to $1,000,000 the circulation of all banks in the city of New York having an excess over that amount, and the circulation of all banks in Massachusetts and Rhode Island to $300,000. If these banks do not return the amount of circulation within one year after the requisition is made upon them, it is made the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to sell at public auction, upon twenty days' notice, the bonds deposited by such associations as security for said circulation equal in amount to the circulation to be withdrawn, and not returned in compliance with the requisition. With the proceeds of the bonds the Comptroller is required to redeem the notes of these banking associations as they come into the Treasury. The notes of these banks are so scattered through the whole country that it will be impracticable for them to return their circulation without an expense not contemplated by the act; and it will, therefore, be for the interests of the banks to provide the Comptroller of the Currency with the requisite amount of legal-tender notes with which to redeem their circulation as it comes into the Treasury. To this extent the act may be executed; but the notes to be redeemed will not come to the Treasury for redemption to any considerable amount, and therefore but a small proportion of the twenty-five millions will be placed at the disposal of the Comptroller for redistribution to the banks of the South and West. The result will, therefore, be great embarrassment to the banks to whom the currency has already been issued, without providing any relief for organizations elsewhere, as contemplated by the act. The Comptroller, therefore, repeats the recommendation contained in his previous report, that section 6 of the act of July 12, 1870, be repealed, and that twenty-five millions additional circulation be authorized to be issued and distributed among the States as heretofore provided."

I also request that you will have read the following copy of a letter addressed to Hon. W. W. PHELPS, of the Committee on Banking and Currency, transmitted to him on the 3d day of February last, in which was inclosed a bill prepared by me, for the purpose of promptly withdrawing $25,000,000 of national-bank circulation from the Eastern States, and distributing the same to the West and South:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF CURRENCY,
Washington, February 3, 1874.

SIR: In accordance with your verbal request, I inclose herewith a copy of "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the redemption of 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes,'" which was prepared at the request of Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, and transmitted to the Finance Committee of the Senate yesterday.

In order to carry out the provisions of this bill it will be necessary to withdraw circulation from the States which are in excess as follows:

Maine, about	$729,000
Vermont, about	755,000
Massachusetts, about	15,783,000
Rhode Island, about	2,808,000
Connecticut, about	3,025,000
New York, about	500,000
Pennsylvania, about	1,400,000
Total	25,000,000

A table showing the States in excess and the amount of the excess will be found on page 7 of my last annual report.

The amount of circulation now outstanding of national banks which have failed or have gone into liquidation under section 42 of the act, is $5,451,366. By reference to section 2 of the proposed bill you will find that it provides for the return of these notes to the Treasury for redemption, so that the effect of this legislation will be to place at my disposal in all more than $30,000,000 for redistribution to the States which are deficient in their proportion.

Perhaps a better title for the bill would be "A bill authorizing the redistribution of $25,000,000 of national-bank currency."

Very respectfully,

JNO. JAY KNOX,
Comptroller.

Hon. WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS,
Committee on Banking and Currency,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I will thank you also to have the bill read for the information of the House, and you will further oblige me by introducing the bill in order that it may be printed and considered.

Very respectfully,

JNO. JAY KNOX.
Comptroller.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of an act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes, as provides "that no circulation shall be withdrawn under the provisions of section 6 of said act until after the fifty-four millions granted in section 1 of said act shall have been taken up," is hereby repealed, and it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to make requisition upon national banks having circulation exceeding $300,000 in amount, organized in those States having the greatest excess of circulation under an apportionment made on the basis of population and of wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870, to withdraw and return their circulation in excess of $300,000, in such amounts as shall be required, or to deposit in the Treasury of the United States lawful money sufficient to redeem such circulation; and upon the return of the circulation required on the deposit of lawful money as herein provided, a proportionate amount of the bonds held to secure the circulation of such association as shall make such return or deposit shall be surrendered to it.

SEC. 2. That upon the failure of the national banks, upon which requisition for circulation shall be made, or of any of them, to return the amounts required, or to deposit in the Treasury lawful money to redeem the circulation required within thirty days, the Comptroller of the Currency shall at once sell, as provided in section 49 of the national-currency act, approved June 3, 1864, bonds held to secure the redemption of the circulation of the association or associations which shall so fail, to an amount sufficient to redeem the circulation required of such association or associations, and with the proceeds, which shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, so much of the circulation of such association or associations shall be redeemed as will equal the amount required and not returned; and if there be any excess of proceeds over the amount required for such redemption it shall be returned to the association or associations whose bonds shall have been sold; and it shall be the duty of the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, designated depositaries, and national-bank depositories of the United States, who shall be kept informed by the Comptroller of the Currency of such associations as shall fail to return circulation or to deposit lawful money as required, to assort and return to the Treasury for redemption the notes of such associations as they shall come into their hands, until the amounts required shall be redeemed, and in like manner to assort and return to the Treasury, for redemption, the notes of such national banks as have failed, or gone into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of winding up their affairs; and of such as shall hereafter so fail or go into liquidation.

SEC. 3. That so fast as circulation shall be returned and redeemed, as hereinbefore provided, it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue circulating notes in the manner and proportion now provided by law, to associations organized or to be organized, in those States and Territories having less than their proportion of circulation, under an apportionment made on the basis of population and of wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870: Provided, That the whole amount of circulation withdrawn and redeemed from banks transacting business shall not exceed $25,000,000, and that such circulation shall be withdrawn and redeemed only as it shall be necessary to supply banks in those States having less than their apportionment.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to direct attention to one fact, that the Comptroller, upon the merest technicality in the world, has failed to execute that redistribution law for nearly four years.

Mr. BECK. I ask that the bill accompanying the Comptroller's letter may be printed not only in the RECORD, but for the use of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has no power to order the printing of bills.

Mr. PHELPS. I wish to express my admiration of the magnanimity with which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] acknowledges an error into which yesterday he naturally fell, and which did injustice to a worthy and hard-working officer. It is a pleasure, not a necessity for me to do so, inasmuch as it is no more than what the House expected from a gallant son of a gallant State. But at the same time, in justice to the official I alluded to, I would state that the facts as narrated in the letter which has just been read to the committee are, as far as they have fallen within my knowledge, correct. At the very beginning of this session, recognizing an injustice to the South and West in withholding the twenty-five millions which an act of the previous Congress had sought to take from States having an excess and to distribute to the deficient States, I conferred with the Comptroller of the Currency, and found him ready to sympathize and to assist. At my request the Comptroller of the Currency prepared a bill which was calculated to correct the defects in the bill of the Forty-second Congress and to devise an efficient method by which this twenty-five millions of circulation could be taken from New England and given to the South and the West.

On the 3d of February this bill so prepared was sent to me. This bill, in my opinion, was well calculated to accomplish the object for which it was draughted. It was brought informally before the committee of which I have the honor to be a member. No action was taken upon it by the committee with reference to reporting it to the House, I presume for the reason which operated upon my mind, and it was this: If a bill was passed by which the South and West should promptly receive these twenty-five millions, the desire of this House to remove all restrictions from the business of banking would naturally abate. The Committee on Banking and Currency by a majority, and myself among them, believed that these restrictions were unjust and ought to be removed. We were therefore at that time unwilling to report any bill which would weaken in the House the bill which subsequently was reported, which offered free banking to all.

This is the bill which is already introduced into the Senate. This is the bill which I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will call up for the action of the House on Monday next. And I beg to say now that while I believe that the twenty-five millions should be taken just as fast from New England as it can be——

Mr. STARKWEATHER. And from New York.

Mr. PHELPS. Yes; and from New Jersey—and ought to be given to the South and the West, yet I shall vote against this bill. Why? For the reason which I presume was the reason that influenced the committee not to report it in February last: that the twenty-five millions are only a sop; that to distribute it but props up a system that is faulty and unjust; and that what we want is not twenty-five millions or a hundred millions of fresh currency, but a destruction of the monopoly, and free banking for all citizens and for all States.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Did the Committee on Banking and Currency ever act upon that bill?

Mr. PHELPS. Not formally.

Mr. BECK. I ask to be recognized for a moment that I may correct a statement made by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. After that I shall object to the continuance of this discussion.

Mr. BECK. The statement to which I object, made by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS,] was that I had taken anything back that I said yesterday. I did not do any such thing. I caused a letter to be read which had been sent to me by the Comptroller, because he could not be heard in his own defense; and as a public officer I thought it was due to him that his statement should be before the House and the country. I maintain, what I said yesterday, that he has not administered the law; that the $54,000,000 provided for by the act of 1870 ought to have been distributed to the States that had not received their proportion promptly on application, and the remaining $25,000,000 withdrawn from the East and given to the other sections as fast as they applied. He has not done that, but has held $4,000,000 of that $54,000,000 back for years after it had all been applied for, and ought to have been distributed for the purpose of preventing the West from getting from the East the $25,000,000 it was entitled to; and I will prove it and demonstrate it whenever the proper occasion shall arise.

I want to say a word more. He has, in order to carry out his own views, been sending the speeches of gentlemen abroad at the expense of the Government, or at least has sent them so that members have not been required to pay the postage, as they would have been but for the favor thus shown. He has gone out of his way time and again to favor the rich moneyed aristocracy of the East to the injury of the people of the West and the South, and I will maintain that upon this floor and make it good.

Mr. DAWES obtained the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise for the purpose of making a personal explanation.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. As I said I would object, I must object to the continuance of the debate.

Mr. RANDALL. It is due to myself that I should make this statement.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I will not object to my colleague making a personal explanation.

Mr. RANDALL. On yesterday, when the question as to the sending out of speeches of members of Congress by Mr. Knox was brought up by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD,] I threw as much light on the matter as I could, without individualizing any gentleman on this floor as having speeches sent out. I did not want to individualize. I condemned the practice, and said I thought it illegal, and a subsequent examination of the statute shows that it was illegal on the part of Mr. Knox. This morning I find in a newspaper published in this city a statement to the effect that I have sent out speeches under the official envelope of the Comptroller of the Currency. I merely rise to state that there is not a word of truth in that statement, and I am inclined to believe that the man who wrote it knew it to be untrue at the time he wrote it.

Mr. FORT. Before we pass to the next section I desire to withdraw an objection I made yesterday to a request by a gentleman from New York to go back to the paragraph beginning in line 145. I did not intend to object to going back but to object to debate, and I now withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot entertain that question now, because there is a motion pending to amend the bill.

Mr. FORT. The Chair will allow me to withdraw my objection now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman when we have passed the pending paragraph.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to say a few words in reference to what fell from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] the tone of which, it seemed to me, was calculated to carry the impression to the country that the East was going to resist any attempt on the part of the Government of the United States to withdraw the $25,000,000 excess which happens now to be in that section of the country, and distribute it over the United States. Of course I am not authorized to speak for any one else, but while I speak my own sentiments only, I believe I speak the sentiments of the eastern representatives and of the eastern people.

They came by this excess by no fault of their own. They took up this capital when the South and West had the same opportunity as they had to take it up, and they only took it up in preference to the West and South because the West and South believed that they could invest their money more preferably elsewhere. It so happens that all this capital is now taken up, either in the East or in the West. If it be necessary to a proper distribution of the currency of the United States that $25,000,000 be withdrawn from New England and New York and New Jersey, I do not think that they will be found resisting it here upon this floor. They desire two things. They desire free banking upon a basis of greenbacks at par. They do not desire to bring greenbacks to par by such a contraction as would make the holder of a greenback pay the difference between its present value and its par value. They desire that the Government shall pay that difference. The Government made the promise and forced the people to take that promise. The Government and nobody else depreciated it. The Government and nobody else should pay that difference. The Government has not got the gold to pay the difference. Let the Government, then, do as an honest man would do, and say we will do the next best thing, and exchange for the greenback we have forced you to take a Government bond bearing such interest as will make it par, and then make banking free throughout the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts as being in favor of increasing the interest-bearing debt of the country?

Mr. DAWES. No, I am not; but I am in favor of the Government doing one of two things: either keeping its promises, or else doing the next best thing, and giving an interest-bearing note for the greenback.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DAWES. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CLEMENTS] certainly does not mean to say that he will neither pay his debts nor give his notes for them; I know he is an honest man. Nor will he say that the United States will do any such thing. The United States should either pay the greenbacks in gold, or do the next best thing, promise to pay them in gold. And then you may have free banking and have it safely, just as safely as they had it in New York before the war; just as safely as you can have banking under any system in the world. If that cannot be done, then take your $25,000,000, if you please, from New England, New York, and New Jersey, and distribute it in the West and South. Those in the East who took it because the West could not take it, because the West could more profitably invest its money otherwise, if the West can now as profitably put their money in banking institutions as they can in anything else, those in the East, in New England, New York, and New Jersey, I apprehend, will not resist any such just measure as that. That is all I have to say.

Mr. KELLEY. A question before the gentleman takes his seat.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. WOODFORD.) This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether he has not assisted in voting for propositions by which the greenback has been repudiated by the Government and against propositions which proposed to redeem the greenback by exchanging it for bonds?

Mr. DAWES. I have assisted in voting down a proposition that would exchange greenbacks for 3.65 currency bonds, for the reason that such a proposition would bring the greenbacks down below 80.

Mr. KELLEY. Did the gentleman propose any substitute or amendment so as to save the greenback from its present condition of repudiation by the Government?

Mr. DAWES. I will answer that by saying that I strove, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] knows, when he had charge of his bill, for the floor every day until the last moment in order to introduce a proposition which I now have in my hand to do the very thing which I have suggested to-day.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman explain how the acceptance of greenbacks in exchange for a United States bond will reduce its value?

Mr. DAWES. It will do it in this way: the greenback and the bond will be on a par when they are made exchangeable for each other. A bond bearing gold interest at just such a rate as will make it par in the markets, a bond running for thirty years and bearing 4½ per cent. interest, or running for twenty years and bearing 5 per cent. interest, if exchanged for greenbacks will elevate the greenback to par.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman to explain how the acceptance of a greenback in exchange for a three sixty-five bond will depreciate it. That was his point.

Mr. DAWES. Of course exchanging a greenback for a three sixty-five currency bond would make the greenback and the bond at the same rate. Now everybody knows that if a 5 per cent. gold bond stands to-day in the market at par, a three sixty-five gold bond would stand at eighty cents; and a three sixty-five currency bond would be below that. And when the greenback is exchanged for the three sixty-five currency bond, the one will be worth just as much as the other. And if the bond is not worth more than eighty cents, the greenback will not be worth more than that.

Mr. KELLEY. I come back to the statement of the gentleman that this exchange will depreciate the greenback. To-day you have idle in your Treasury $53,000,000 of greenbacks.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for a vote.

Mr. MAYNARD. It does seem as if members from certain portions of the country contrive somehow to get the only hearing that is had in this House. I have sought the floor for some time in order to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. He says he is content to abide by the existing law for the redistribution of $25,000,000 of national-bank currency. Is he willing to change that law so as to provide for the redistribution of $75,000,000?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. All the debate which is progressing is out of order. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say one word in reply to what was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] I understood him to charge that the Comptroller of the Currency had for four years——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is out of order. The question is upon the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the amendment proposes an increase of salaries.

Mr. KELLOGG. There is a decrease of salary from $3,000 to $2,500.

Mr. HOLMAN. I mean an increase in the amount. I move to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$2,000."

Mr. MELLISH. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. It has already been reported five times, and the Chair cannot allow it to be reported the sixth time.

Mr. MELLISH. I rise to a point of order. I suppose that before voting a member has a right to have a proposition reported so that he may vote understandingly. I cannot vote understandingly unless this amendment is reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MELLISH] has raised the point of order that he cannot vote understandingly upon an amendment which has been reported five times. The Chair rules that the point of order is not well taken.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN to the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 51, noes 99.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the office of the Register of the Treasury:
Eighteen clerks of class four; twelve clerks of class three; four clerks of class two; five clerks of class one; one hundred counters and copyists, at $900 each; eight messengers; six assistant messengers and laborers; making, in all, the sum of $164,240.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to amend by striking out "eighteen clerks of class four" and insert the following:

Five chiefs of divisions, $2,500 each; one disbursing clerk, $2,000; twelve clerks of class four.

Mr. HOLMAN. This raises $1,800 clerks to $2,500.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I do this for the purpose of saying what I desired to say a few minutes ago without getting an opportunity. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to say that the Comptroller of the Currency had for nearly four years refused to carry out this law of Congress taking away the $25,000,000 of banking capital from New England and from other States having more than their proportion.

Mr. HOLMAN. After the speech of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] I shall insist on the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to correct the gentleman from Vermont by stating that what I did say was that the Comptroller had failed to execute that law by reason of a technicality.

Mr. POLAND. I understood the gentleman to say before precisely what he says now, that the Comptroller of the Currency was entirely in fault and had really violated the law in refusing for a long period of time to carry out this provision. Now, sir, the act of July 12, 1870, which contains this provision for the withdrawal of $25,000,000 of national-bank currency is the same act in which provision is made for an increase of banking circulation of $54,000,000, to be given to States not having their proportion. I ask the Clerk to read the passage I have marked at the close of the section authorizing the withdrawal of $25,000,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope I shall have an opportunity to reply to the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no circulation shall be withdrawn under the provisions of this section until after the $54,000,000 granted in the first section shall have been taken up.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the point, "taken up."

Mr. POLAND. The authority or right on the part of the Comptroller to proceed, for the purpose of withdrawing this $25,000,000 and redistributing it, did not begin, he had no authority under that section to do anything whatever—until the provision of the law in relation to the $54,000,000 was exhausted. The gentleman from Pennsylvania may cavil upon the words "taken up." I do not understand because some organized banking association applied for the currency that that is "taking up" within the meaning of the law. It means that they shall put up their securities so as to be entitled to receive that circulation; and that has not been done yet. I insist that the charge made by the gentleman against the Comptroller of the Currency in reference to this matter is entirely unfounded.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not caviled about the language at all. The Comptroller of the Currency, so far as my knowledge extends both as a member of the House and a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, has rested his objection solely on that technical point about "taking up." The fact I understand to be this: that the whole amount has long since been assigned to certain parties who applied; subsequently to those assignments one hundred and twenty-eight further applications for more currency have been received by the Comptroller of the Currency, but he has refused to entertain them because he says the currency is not actually issued. Now I maintain that the meaning and intention of the law was that whenever that entire amount of $54,000,000 of currency had been assigned to parties, it should be the duty of the Comptroller to execute the law of 1870 providing for a redistribution of $25,000,000; and I never heard until to-day that he rested his action upon anything else than a technicality of law, in opposition to what seems to me the plain intent of the enactment.

One word more. I heard for the first time to-day from the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] that the bill of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] had ever been in any manner, formal or informal, before the Committee on Banking and Currency. For myself, as a Representative from one of the States having now an excess of currency, I am ready at any time to do justice by a redistribution, whether it shall require $25,000,000 or $75,000,00 to be drawn from those who have now an excess by reason of their advantages in having capital at the time this currency was taken up.

Mr. POLAND rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must insist on confining the debate to the question before the committee. One reply will only require another.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I wish to say a single word upon the amendment already pending. It is made necessary by reason of the nature of the duties in the office of the Register of the Treasury. The Treasury Department is a system of checks and balances; and it must be kept so, in order to prevent fraud and to insure that everything shall be done correctly. All the currency that goes into the Treasurer's office goes one-half from the Bureau we have passed on, and the other half from the Register of the Treasury, who has besides a great many other duties to discharge.

Mr. HOLMAN. Instead of providing for seventeen clerks of class four, as the text of the bill is, who are to receive a salary of $1,800 each, the amendment provides for an increase of the salary of some of these clerks to $2,500. There is a want of fairness, it seems to me, in these attempts to increase salaries. I never hear gentlemen—not even the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] who is usually so fair—meet the question on the increase of salaries squarely. They do not even say this is an increase from $1,800 to $2,500, and yet that really is the question now before the House. I know it is hard to get the fact understood in the confusion of the House over the finance question, but I wish members to remember in voting on this amendment that it is an increase of certain salaries here from $1,800 to $2,500. I am opposed to it entirely, and I insist that if we do increase these salaries it shall be done openly and above-board.

Mr. KELLOGG. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. GARFIELD'S amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman from Indiana mistakes the effect of the amendment altogether. These chiefs of divisions have been getting under the operation of the loan fund $3,000 a year, and the effect of this amendment is to reduce their salaries $500 each.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was not done by law, and it is not pretended it was. If they received $3,000 it was not under any law.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 37; no quorum voting.

Mr. KELLOGG demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 50.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the office of the Superintendent of the Work of Engraving and Printing: Superintendent, $5,000; two assistants, at $2,500 each; one chief clerk, $2,000; two clerks of class four; five clerks of class two; three clerks of class one; five copyists, at $900 each; three messengers; and three assistant messengers; making in all the sum of $32,880.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out that paragraph and insert the following in lieu thereof:

Bureau of Engraving and Printing:
Chief of Bureau, $5,000; for payment of employés at per diem, to be paid only for the time actually employed, namely: two assistants, at eight dollars a day; one accountant, at seven dollars a day; eight clerks, at four dollars a day; five copyists, at not more than $2.90 per day; and six messengers, or laborers, at two dollars a day; $31,610.

The amount is about $1,000 less, and at the request of the chief of that Bureau I make it so that he may have the control of his force. They will not then have right to leave of absence and still draw pay.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me call the attention of the committee to one point. I see that he has provided for only five copyists. My understanding is that ten copyists were needed.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have taken the figures given to us.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment will be adopted, as it is one of the very few economical measures which have been offered here.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For labor, (by the day or piece,) including labor of workmen skilled in engraving, transferring, plate-printing, and other specialties necessary for carrying on the work of engraving and printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, the pay for such labor to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury at rates not exceeding the rates usually paid for such work, $500,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. I had hoped the chairman himself would offer the amendment which I now feel compelled to offer; and I ask the indulgence of the House for a single moment while I explain it. This paragraph and the one on the next page relating to printing of notes, bonds, and other securities, should be brought together in one amount and in the same connection. I move in line 56 to strike out "500" and insert "1,125;" so it will read, "$1,125,000." That is the amount, putting together the two sums found in this line and in lines 69 to 71 on the next page. I do it for this reason: This $500,000 is the sum appropriated for the work done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, where we employ about twelve hundred persons, more or less, and where we do the whole work except the mere printing the backs of notes and bonds, which is done in New York by the bank-note companies. Only $500,000 is appropriated for this Bureau, with all this large force, where not only the faces are printed but the numbers are printed by one process, and the sealing by another process, and all the work of trimming and preparing the bonds and notes is done, and millions of stamps besides for your whisky and tobacco taxes; when on the next page $625,000 is appropriated simply for printing the backs of those notes and bonds in New York. By the law now the Secretary of the Treasury makes a contract with these parties in New York, which he can terminate on thirty days' notice or whatever period is agreed upon, if they do not fulfill their contracts in printing the backs of notes to the satisfaction of the Government. This clause on the next page as reported from the Committee on Appropriations compels by law the Secretary of the Treasury to continue the printing of backs of notes by these companies for a year longer from the 30th of June next, whether they fulfill their contracts to the satisfaction of the Government or not, thus taking away from him the power to terminate the contracts on thirty days' notice, or whatever notice is agreed upon in the contracts. I say it is wrong. The whole thing ought to be put in one single item, and let the contractors, bank-note companies or whoever they are, be subject to the law as it is now. The law now requires that contracts shall be made for the work; and if those contracts are not fulfilled properly and promptly they can be terminated on thirty days' notice or whatever notice is agreed upon. But if you pass the appropriation as it is here you are compelled by law to let these bank-note companies in New York, or whoever they may be, do this work for a year longer.

I understood that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was to have offered this amendment. I trust that he will not now oppose it. It is merely to put the two sums together and leave the work to be done as it now is. I have nothing to say in this place where all this printing ought to be done, but may have something to say when the proper time comes for it; and I have nothing now to do with any contest as to where the printing shall be done, as that matter is being investigated by a committee, but I do say that we never ought by any law of Congress to put it in the power of the bank-note companies of New York or Philadelphia or Boston or any other place to hold us for a year longer in their power, or compel us to give them the printing of these notes. We have the matter regulated by contracts which we can terminate by the notice provided, if they do not give satisfaction or fulfill their contracts properly. I have said on a former occasion that this Bureau of Engraving and Printing is the hardest worked and the poorest paid Bureau in any of the Departments. The employés are kept there seven hours and a little more, I think, each day, and I never saw a busier or more industrious body of employés in any establishment. We ought to make the appropriation large enough to pay them more than we do now for their labor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to the amendment which the gentleman from Connecticut has offered, only if it prevails there should be inserted in this paragraph "and for other expenses of printing notes," &c., or some such words.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly. I accept that amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether the object would not be accomplished by merely striking out, in line 70, the words "by bank-note companies;" so that it would read:

For printing notes, bonds, and securities of the United States, $625,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the amendment prevails I think it would be better to put the whole in one clause; so that lines 50 to 56 would read as now, except striking out "$500,000" and adding—

And for expenses of printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, $1,125,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. To avoid any misconstruction in so important a matter the gentleman from Connecticut will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to say to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and to all others, that this matter is being investigated now before the Committee on Banking and Currency; and I for one will not consent to any amendment that will at all trammel us in that investigation.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say to my colleague on the committee that I have been observing that point, and that I think the form in which the amendment is put leaves us entirely free.

Mr. DURHAM. If we are left entirely free to investigate the matter in the interest of the Government, then I am satisfied.

Mr. KELLOGG's proposed amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out "$500,000" in line 56, and inserting "$1,125,000."

Mr. KELLOGG. And I give notice that I will move to strike out the paragraph on the next page appropriating $625,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that what I send to the desk will achieve the object we have in view.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$500,000" and insert after the word "work" these words:
And for other expenses of engraving and printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, $1,125,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. I accept that.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I desire to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. If that amendment is adopted, should we not also in line 50, after the words "for labor by the day or piece," add the words "or by contract?"

Mr. KELLOGG. I accept that also.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let the Clerk report the entire paragraph as it will read if the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] as modified be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For labor, by the day or piece or by contract, including labor of workmen skilled in engraving, transferring, plate-printing, and other specialties necessary for carrying on the work of engraving and printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, the pay for such labor to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury at rates not exceeding the rates usually paid for such work, and for other expenses of engraving and printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, $1,125,000.

Mr. POTTER. I want to address an inquiry to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in relation to this amendment. During previous years there has been a contest in this House, in which he as well as I took part on opposite sides, in regard to the transfer of the printing of the United States notes and bonds to Washington. I have been entirely opposed to this work being centered at Washington, or to any great Bureau or concern for printing the notes of the Government being built up here, and I have heretofore opposed various movements in that direction.

I desire now to learn from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether the effect of this amendment will be to alter the existing law as to where these notes shall be printed?

Mr. GARFIELD. It will not. And I will say to the gentleman that since we undertook to separate how much money should go to pay for the cost of printing notes here, and how much should go to pay for printing them in New York it was difficult to say exactly how we should divide it. And this proposition is to throw the two sums together in a lump; and the officers of the Treasury will be obliged to execute the law as they find it, and pay as much to the one and as much to the other as the law requires.

Mr. POTTER. To execute the law as it exists now?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes. We do not change it in any way. Only we undertake to appropriate a specific sum instead of making a vague, indefinite appropriation.

Mr. POTTER. But it leaves the work to be done as heretofore provided by law?

Mr. GARFIELD. Absolutely; that is unchanged.

Mr. POTTER. I am entirely opposed to any more centralization of work in Washington, particularly in connection with the printing of these notes. I believe safety and economy require that the entire printing shall not be done here. I accept the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as correct.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember that I was upon the other side of that question; but it is not raised here.

Mr. POTTER. I accept any statement of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio in respect of any matter of fact about which he has information. I want to say, however, that I do not intend hereafter to accept his judgment in all cases as final, because at the end of the appropriation bill of last session he introduced a provision appropriating $15,000 for a pneumatic tube to connect the Capitol with the Departments, and I then inquired if that sum of money would be sufficient to complete the work. He answered with entire correctness as he supposed, and in absolute good faith I have no doubt, that it would. But I now understand that the $15,000 has been spent and a ditch dug for the tube, but that the contractor never even began to lay the tube down, and that subsequently the ditch had to be filled up at additional expense to the Government, and the appropriation proved a dead waste.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; not at additional expense to the Government, nor has the whole of the $15,000 been expended.

Mr. POTTER. Hereafter I shall have to hesitate somewhat, therefore, before accepting unconditionally the judgment of my distinguished friend from Ohio; but upon any matter of fact with which he is acquainted and which he asserts here I shall still be glad to accept his statement as I now do.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise for the purpose of calling attention to the subject-matter to which the gentleman from New York has just alluded, in order that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations shall expressly here notify the House and notify the Department that this grouping of the appropriations is not intended to give the Secretary of the Treasury or the Superintendent of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing authority to aggrandize his Bureau and to draw work from other sources, where it is now being done by law, so that he may build up his Bureau. The work is better done now, with better checks, than it can be done in any other way. I hope the Department will consider that nothing in this action is intended to change that arrangement.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if in preparing this bill he had any estimate of the relative amount of the cost of printing the backs of the notes in New York by the bank-note companies, and the cost of the printing done by the Department here?

Mr. GARFIELD. There were such estimates before us, and the way we undertook to divide the two sums was by the actual amount paid last year to the bank-note companies and the actual cost for whatever work was done in the Printing Bureau here, and we reduced the whole amount nearly half a million dollars.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I am entirely opposed to the grouping of these two appropriations. I see no real reason for it. If the object of it is to put it within the power of the Superintendent of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to concentrate the work here if he chooses, I shall oppose it strenuously, because I believe that the work is now well and economically done, and that no advantage can accrue from such a change. Hence I oppose the grouping of these two amounts.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. For the purpose of entering my protest against and dissent from the statement made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] as to the effect of this proposed amendment, I wish to say that as one member of the House I shall vote for it, hoping that it may lead to the Government of the United States doing all the work of this kind here in the District of Columbia; and I believe that is the sentiment of a large majority of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following amendment to come in immediately after the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG:]

But no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be applied to the expenses of the preparation and issue or reissue of the notes of a national banking association.

Mr. KELLOGG. I make the point of order on that amendment that it changes existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment simply provides that none of the money appropriated by this paragraph shall be so applied. It is simply a limitation on the appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. I have the same object in view as I suppose the gentleman from Indiana has, and it is to make the banks pay for the printing of these notes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the object can be accomplished in another way.

Mr. KELLOGG. If it is right to do it, it should be done in some other way.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we can reach it in another direction. The gentleman will observe that the bill which passed the House known as the House currency bill embraced paragraphs meeting his view.

Mr. HOLMAN. One million six hundred and forty thousand dollars are to be appropriated for the purpose of printing and issuing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, and I propose to provide that no part of that money shall be expended in the printing of national-bank notes.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite in accord with the gentleman from Indiana, but I think we can reach his object in another direction.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see how you can do it except by a limitation on the appropriation. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether under the head of "notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States" any of this money can be expended for the preparation of national-bank notes?

Mr. GARFIELD. It cannot.

Mr. HOLMAN. Judging from the report of the Comptroller I am somewhat apprehensive that it may be so used, and that is the reason why I desire to make this limitation.

Mr. KELLOGG. My point of order is that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] proposes to change existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] send to the Chair the existing law which this amendment proposes to change?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not certain that I have the last law on the subject; but I apprehend there will be no dispute on the part of any member of this House who is familiar with the law that bank-notes are printed by the Government, under the direction of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is not an appropriation to print national-bank notes at all. My amendment simply provides that this amount shall not be used for that purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. Bank-notes are printed under the authority of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. HOLMAN. My object is simply to avoid the conversion of this appropriation to any such purpose.

Mr. KELLOGG. Upon the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations I will withdraw my point of order, and simply say to the gentleman from Indiana that if he will go through that Bureau he will find millions of stamps printed there.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand all that; but I do not want it to be used for a different purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. This amendment should be voted down.

Mr. HOLMAN. Being assured by the gentleman from Ohio that this money cannot be expended in the reissue of national-bank notes I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of saying that the Committee on Banking and Currency are making an investigation into the printing of currency by the Bank Note Company of New York, the Bank Note Company of Washington, and the Department. When it is completed we shall probably bring in a bill, which will be an impartial one, for the best interests of the Government. Therefore, whatever is acted upon now is not so important as to require all this discussion. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. KELLOGG as modified, and it was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move to strike out lines 69, 70, and 71 of this section.

The lines referred to were as follows:

For printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States by bank-note companies, $625,000.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

SEC. 3. That hereafter the rooms of each Department shall be kept open for public business and the clerical and other force therein shall be employed not less than seven hours in each working day, from which time an intermission not exceeding one half-hour each day may be taken, under rules to be established by the head of each Department.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have an amendment which I feel compelled by a sense of justice to offer to this section. It is to strike out the words "and the clerical and other force therein shall be employed." I have no objection to keeping the Departments open for seven hours a day and having a sufficient number of clerks in charge of the transaction of business kept there, so that members of Congress and the people of the United States generally can have their work attended to for seven hours each day; nor have I any objection to keeping many of the clerks there upon duties to which they can well devote seven hours a day of labor without injury to themselves or any one else. Many of them work more than seven hours now; some of them work much more than that, while others shirk all they can in the six hours.

The clerks in the loan division and in other divisions to my knowledge have to work at times ten or twelve hours a day; and many of these chiefs of divisions, called clerks in this bill, whose salaries you have unwisely in some cases cut down $500 each, work many hours to my knowledge outside and beyond the regular office hours. It is so with other clerks when the business of the Department requires it.

But there is a class of persons who ought not to be confined in the close and stifling rooms of the Department building longer than six hours a day; and I ask the attention of gentlemen to what I am about to say upon this matter. There is a class of female clerks or employés, counters and copyists, a great portion of whom are employed in work upon which they can accomplish as much, year in and year out, in six hours a day as they could do if compelled to remain there seven hours a day. Take these counters of money, of notes and currency.

Any gentleman who has been in the Treasurer's office, the Register's office, or the Secretary's office, and has seen these ladies engaged in counting money, and has noticed the rapidity with which they do their work, requiring not only the constant and wonderfully rapid work of the hand, but also the constant and continuous strain upon the eye and brain for six hours a day, so as to detect each counterfeit—for if a counterfeit is passed it is taken out of the lady's wages for the month—will understand how important it is to have proper regulations upon this subject. These counters have to become skilled in the detection of counterfeits, until many of them are now much better able to detect the counterfeits that come in large numbers to the Treasury than most of the cashiers and experts in your banks. I have conferred with the persons in charge of those Bureaus and branches of the Treasury Department, and they say that these employés can accomplish more in six hours a day, take the year in and out, than in seven hours a day. I therefore hope the amendment which I have offered will be adopted, and the hours of labor left as they now are in the Departments.

Mr. SPEER. I ask, for information, whether when this money passes through the hands of and is counted by several persons the counterfeit not detected is deducted from the pay of each one; or from whom is it taken?

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me explain to the gentleman how this is done. The money is first counted in the Treasurer's office, where it is sent in great quantities for redemption, and there made up into packages and by the counters verified. Each counter is responsible for the amount put into her hands. The packages of bills are then cut in halves in their presence, and one-half of each package is counted again in the Secretary's office and the other half in the Register's office. Of course the bills are good for nothing when cut in two. But the ladies in the Treasurer's office, where the bills are counted in the first instance, are held liable for every dollar of counterfeit bills that passes through their hands without being detected, and liable for any mistake made by them, and it is deducted from their wages. I say it is unjust and wrong to make these employés work more than six hours a day, considering the nature and responsibility of their work.

Mr. SPEER. I sympathize with the views of the gentleman, and made my inquiry of him for the information of the House.

Mr. KELLOGG. What I have said applies to many others in the Departments. There are copyists and others; there are also many ladies in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing having hundreds of dollars and thousands of dollars' worth of bonds passing through their hands every day; and for every dollar and sheet of currency or bonds that goes through their hands they are responsible. They are worked seven hours a day now in that Bureau, as they have to compete with the bank-note companies; and they are not paid as much in that Bureau as they ought to be, in my judgment. You will find very few drones in that busy Bureau; and this seven-hour section in this bill will make it worse for the interests of the service than it is now, for it gives a half-hour legal intermission at noon, and with a legal intermission the clerks and employés would have the right to leave the building and scatter over the city where they pleased and you would get really less work than you do now with six hours. And I will say also for these counters in the Treasury, as well as other ladies in the Department, that with hundreds and thousands of dollars constantly passing through their hands, you can scarcely find an instance, from the beginning to the end of the year, where the slightest act of dishonesty can be charged upon one of them. The work is so confining and exhausting that they never ought to be kept there over six hours a day.

I would go for keeping the Department building open for seven hours a day and have clerks there to do the business, if members desire it; but let the force there be regulated by the head of the Department. I am willing to trust the man at the head of the Department, for he ought to know a great deal better as to the proper hours of labor than we do.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that there is justice in what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] says. I cannot consent, however, to strike out the provision with reference to the whole clerical force. I therefore move to amend the section by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That the heads of the several Departments may allow a less number of hours as a day's work than herein provided for counters of money and those engaged in similar severe work.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think we should strike out the words "and other force therein employed," so as to leave this matter to be regulated by the heads of Departments.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. LAWRENCE obtained the floor.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I do not believe that this proviso is exactly the thing. I do not think it proper to allow the head of any Department to fix the working hours of the employés.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the provision now pending, which is—

That hereafter the rooms of each Department shall be kept open for public business and the clerical and other force therein shall be employed not less than seven hours in each working day.

It is probably not understood that this provision will reduce the number of working hours as now fixed by law. There is now in force a statute providing that the Departments shall be kept open eight hours each day, Sundays excepted. That provision applies, I believe, to all the Departments except perhaps some of the Bureaus in the Interior Department. Now what is the object of the pending section? Is it to increase or decrease the number of working hours? I say that the object is, or the effect will be, to make a reduction. If that be not the object no such provision is necessary. The law already requires eight hours' duty; but there is not, I believe, a single Department that pays the least attention to that law. The clerks and employés as a general rule work only about six hours.

This section of the bill, if adopted, will increase the expenses of the Government and reduce the hours of labor as they exist by the law now in force. I hope this provision will be struck out. I move to strike out the whole section.

Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague [Mr. LAWRENCE] is mistaken on one point. We do not by this section reduce the number of hours of labor required in the Departments.

Mr. LAWRENCE. You will see whether you do not.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am perfectly familiar with the law to which the gentleman refers—the law of 1836. It requires that the Departments shall be kept open for business; but it does not require the clerical force to be employed there during all the time the Departments are open.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is not that the object of the law? Is not that what it means?

Mr. GARFIELD. Its language requires nothing more than that the offices shall be kept open; and it has never been construed in any other way. Persons have been kept in the Departments to keep the doors open—to keep the offices open; and so far as the technical language of the law is concerned it has been complied with in that way and no other way. It is true that during the war some of the Departments worked eight hours. It is true that the State Department now works at least seven hours; but this is done simply because the business requires it.

In looking over the whole subject the Committee on Appropriations came to the conclusion that some law was needed to require the clerical force to be kept at work; to designate in some way what should be a clerical day's work; a day's work not for the building, not for the rooms, but for the persons employed there. For this reason we thought it best to insert this section. After debating whether seven hours or eight hours should be the rule, we were of the opinion that for many classes of clerical duty, such as that of the accountants, who have long columns of figures to add, or the counters of money, it would be almost criminal severity to require eight hours' daily duty. We therefore fixed upon seven hours as a proper requirement, being less than what is required outside of Government employ.

Mr. KELLOGG. I prefer that the words I have indicated be struck out, because I think we ought to leave this matter to the heads of the Departments. My former remarks applied to other offices besides that of the Treasurer.

It will be observed that the section contains a provision for a half hour's intermission each day. Now it is the universal testimony of the heads of the Departments, so far as I have talked with them, that this provision in the bill, with the allowance of a half hour's intermission, will make the matter worse than it is now; that they will not get as much work in seven hours with a half hour's intermission as they get now. In some Departments seven hours is already the rule.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. MAYNARD.) The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has made a motion to strike out the section. Before that question is taken there are two independent amendments to be voted upon; one offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] and the other by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw my amendment.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. KELLOGG, there were—ayes 63, noes 65; no quorum voting.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 59.

So Mr. KELLOGG's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of showing that my colleague is mistaken in reference to the law. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the statutes which I send up, as I find it in Durant's revision of the laws.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 165. From the 1st day of October until the 1st day of April, in each year, all the Bureaus and offices in the Departments shall be open for the transaction of the public business at least eight hours in each day; and from the 1st day of April until the 1st day of October, in each year, at least ten hours in each day; except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It will be seen that my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is in error in stating there is now no law on the subject, or in saying there is no law fixing the hours of work. The law does provide that all Bureaus and offices in the Departments shall be open for the transaction of the public business at least eight hours in each day. It will not do to say this only means that the office doors shall be kept open; that would be too narrow a construction. When the law requires the "transaction of business" for eight hours, it fixes the hours of work. I know no reason why the clerks and employés should not devote eight hours a day to work. Congress fixed eight hours as a day's work for laboring men, and I know no reason why clerks should work less. No man has more respect for clerks than I have. They are useful and their business is honorable. They deserve consideration and respect. I do not believe they desire a discrimination in their favor and against laboring men in the hours of work. Members of Congress are compelled to work more than eight hours a day. I now withdraw the motion to strike out the last word.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. LAWRENCE to strike out the whole paragraph as amended.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 68; no quorum voting.

Mr. SENER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WOODFORD and Mr. LAWRENCE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 74.

So the motion was agreed to, and the paragraph was stricken out.

Mr. EAMES. I move to insert the following in place of the paragraph stricken out:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The postage on the Agricultural Report shall hereafter be ten cents.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that that it changes the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MILLS. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the heads of the different Departments in the city of Washington are hereby directed to revise their lists of employés, and to distribute their appointments among the several States and Territories according to their respective populations, so far as the same can be done without detriment to the public service.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that it involves a change of existing law.

Mr. MILLS. What existing law?

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the amendment is ruled out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the money appropriated by this act shall be applied in the preparation of new plates and reissue of the notes of the national banking associations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say one word in explanation of that amendment. I understand the effect of the consolidation of the items in reference to printing by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the bank-note companies may be, although it is not intended, that a portion of the appropriation may be used for the reissue of the national-bank notes. Congress has uniformly held that the preparation of new plates and reissue of the national-bank notes when done shall be at the expense of the banks and not a tax upon the Treasury. My amendment is to prevent any portion of the money being used for the payment of the reissue of the national-bank notes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment, and call for a vote.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 101.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reoffer the same amendment, changing the word "applied" to the word "appropriated;" and I do that to make just this further remark: If it is the intention of this committee to appropriate $600,000 of this money for the preparation of new plates and reissue of the currency of the national banks, I hope it will say so fairly and frankly in order that the country may not be deceived into any different belief.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not think that is at all possible, if that be the question raised by the gentleman from Indiana. There was an appropriation last winter for new plates and a new issue of national-bank currency, and that appropriation is still unused simply because the banks have not called for new notes, coupled as the law is with a provision to tax the banks to the full amount of the cost of the reissue.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman know that the Comptroller of the Currency could not enforce that against the national banks, and proposes that Congress should directly appropriate $600,000 out of the Treasury for that purpose?

Mr. GARFIELD. On the contrary he has recommended that Congress shall repeal that law so far as new plates are concerned, saying they are unnecessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have the assurance, then, of the chairman of the committee that no portion of this appropriation will be used for the preparation of new plates and a reissue of the national-bank notes at the expense of the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am perfectly sure about that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That on the 1st day of July of each year, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all unexpended balances of appropriations, which shall have remained upon the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years, to be carried to the surplus fund.

Mr. GARFIELD. There are two amendments which I desire to offer, in order to make it doubly sure that we have cut off from the War Department all power of employing persons in the general service. I send to the desk to be read an amendment, to come in at the end of the clause inserted on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] in relation to the War Department.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I had risen to offer an amendment to the paragraph which has just been read, the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there unanimous consent that the committee shall return to the paragraph relating to the War Department, for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. SPEER. I reserve the right of objection until the amendment shall be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That it is further made the duty of the Secretary of War, when the reduction of clerks now employed shall take effect under the provisions of this act, to retain, as far as possible, such of the enlisted men and discharged soldiers as are now employed in the several Bureaus of said Department, where the same can be done with a due regard to the dispatch of public business. And it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of War to place such enlisted men so retained upon the civil list, so as to entitle them to promotion under the civil-service regulations. And hereafter it shall be unlawful to allow or pay, to any of the persons designated in this act, any additional compensation from any source whatever, or to retain, detail, or employ them in any branch of the War Department except in the Signal Service and Engineer Corps; and except such commissioned officers as the Secretary of War may from time to time assign to special duties; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to reduce the number of temporary clerks and others authorized by this act as fast as the wants of the public service will permit.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to make an explanation of this amendment.

Mr. MCKEE. In the meanwhile I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendment offered, with two or three trifling exceptions to perfect it, is an amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs. It is this: It repeals all those laws that authorize the Secretary of War to put in as clerks enlisted men and persons in what is known as the general service. It sweeps all that power away absolutely. Furthermore it directs that, in making up the list of those persons designated in this bill as clerks, he shall retain those soldiers that are now in the general service whom he is now employing in so far as they are doing their work well.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a question of order. I desire to ask what is the difference, as regards the point of order, between the amendment which I offered some time ago, on which the gentleman made the point of order, and that which the gentleman himself now offers, directing the manner in which certain persons shall be employed? My amendment embraced only the same point.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is needed, because we have already started on that line.

Mr. MILLS. I believe the gentleman from Ohio is a fair man, and I appeal to his fairness and sense of justice to permit my amendment to be submitted to the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I shall be happy to hear what the gentleman has to say after this has been acted upon.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the effect of this amendment offered by him is to authorize and direct the head of the Department to prefer discharged soldiers to civilians?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is.

Mr. SPEER. Then it is right.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I would suggest whether it would not be proper to make the amendment applicable to all the other Departments?

Mr. GARFIELD. By this amendment these men are released from the military arrangements under which they have been serving, and are brought upon the regular civil list. It merely transfers them from the Army list as enlisted men to the civil list.

Mr. DONNAN. Are the terms "enlisted men" and "discharged soldiers" both intended to include Union soldiers only?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose so. I cannot suppose anything else.

Mr. DONNAN. I understand that the Department puts another construction on the term "enlisted men."

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I wish to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio by adding after the words "War Department" "the Treasury Department, the Department of the Interior," &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; because this legislation relates only to the War Department. There are no general-service men elsewhere than in the War Department.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. There are discharged soldiers.

Mr. GARFIELD. This does not provide for putting in new men.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. But it provides for retaining the discharged soldiers and giving them preference in promotion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman not to complicate this amendment by adding other Departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been reported to the committee. The point of order has been raised that it involves new legislation. Is that point of order insisted upon? [After a pause.] As no gentleman rises to insist on the point of order, the Chair rules that the amendment is properly before the committee and recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCLEAN. I understood my colleague [Mr. MILLS] to insist on the point of order.

Mr. MILLS. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is liable to the same point of order as was made upon the amendment which I offered. But a soldier being involved in the case, with whom I always sympathize, caring not what color of clothes he wore, I do not insist on the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I will state that this amendment comprises two sections which were a part of the bill which I introduced for the reorganization of the War Department. There are quite a number of discharged soldiers employed in that Department, who are very good clerks, and this simply gives them the preference in being retained over civilians. It meets the approbation of the Department, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I do not object to it, but I want it to apply to the other Departments. [Loud cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The calls for a vote are entirely out of order, and until the committee desist from it the Chair will not put any question to the committee.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I was going to ask this question: If it is a good thing to provide that discharged soldiers who are employed as clerks in the War Department shall be retained in preference to others, why is it not a good thing to provide that discharged soldiers who are employed in the other Departments shall be retained?

Mr. GARFIELD. The answer to that, if the gentleman pleases, is this: That the amendments adopted in regard to the War Department require them to discharge a large number of persons now employed as clerks, one hundred and ninety-four clerks; and we simply say that in discharging them they shall retain those who have been soldiers in preference to others, if they are just as good clerks. This provision would not apply to other Departments where no reduction of force is made.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a very good proposition, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. WALLS. I raise the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] involves new legislation.

Mr. SPEER. It is too late to raise that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked the committee if those points of order which had been reserved were withdrawn. If the gentleman from Florida states to the Chair that he raised the point of order——

Mr. WALLS. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. And was not heard by the Chair, of course it will be the duty of the Chair to entertain it.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is far too late to make the point of order now.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The amendment has been discussed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] and others.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair make one statement. So great is the disorder that it is impossible for the Chair to hear statements or motions. If the gentleman from Florida upon his honor as a member states to the Chair that he made the point of order, and the Chair did not hear him, the Chair will rule that the point is within time and will rule out the amendment.

Mr. WALLS. The reason I make the point of order is this——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. He makes it now for the first time.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Florida make the point of order at any time before the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] had taken his seat?

Mr. WALLS. I withdraw the point of order.

The question was taken on Mr. GARFIELD'S amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I offer the following amendment. I move to strike out in the last line of section 4 the words "carried to the surplus fund," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "covered into the Treasury of the United States."

I do not desire to discuss the amendment as the hour is so late, but it seems to me a dangerous practice to have a surplus fund. I do not see any use for it, and therefore I make the motion that these unexpended balances of appropriation shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BECK. I offer the following amendment to the amendment. After the word "that" in line 1 insert the words "from and after the passage of this act and;" and after the word "year" in line 1 insert the word "hereafter;" strike out in lines 4 and 5 the words "carried to the surplus fund," and insert in lieu thereof the words "covered into the Treasury of the United States;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4. That from and after the passage of this act, and on the 1st day of July of each year, hereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all unexpended balances of appropriations which shall have remained upon the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years to be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia accept that amendment?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Yes, sir; I accept it.

Mr. BECK. I desire to be heard upon it, if I can get the attention of the committee.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I shall renew my amendment, if the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky shall be voted down.

Mr. BECK. This matter has been talked about very much in this House. On the 12th of July, 1870, Congress among other things made this provision: "That all balances of appropriation which shall have remained on the books of the Treasury without being drawn against in the settlement of accounts for two years from the date of the appropriation made by law" shall go into the Treasury of the United States. A construction has been given to that provision upon which a great deal has been said, that when they could draw upon the appropriation for any purpose whatever they could keep the money out of the Treasury, and in accordance with that construction which is unwarranted under the law, or any possible construction of it, and is a clear perversion of the language, you will find, if you will turn to the Book of Estimates, that the sum of $52,000,000 that was appropriated specifically for the year 1871, two whole fiscal years having elapsed before the beginning of this year, is still being drawn upon. The Postmaster-General himself, as you will see on page 237, drew $500,000 out of that appropriation after the 1st of July and before the 1st of September of the present fiscal year.

I want to make this plain because millions of dollars are every year taken wrongfully out of the Treasury. Some time ago I introduced a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to tell us how much had been drawn up to the 1st of March last; we had it up to the 1st day of September. The Committee on Appropriations desired to have the resolution referred to them, and it was so referred. On the 12th of March the committee reported back the resolution, and the House passed it with this addition:

And if any balances of said appropriation have been so drawn, that the Secretary of the Treasury report under what construction of law the same have been drawn, with a copy of the opinion of any officer of the Government as authority for such construction.

I have watched carefully every day since; I went to the Clerk's office this morning, and I am advised that no answer has yet been sent to that resolution, though it is now the 25th of April.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have heard of no answer to it.

Mr. BECK. I have watched for an answer every day since this resolution was adopted. They are now drawing on these old balances of 1871. During the first three months after those balances should have been covered into the Treasury they drew more than $1,000,000 from them. By the express terms of the law those balances could not be drawn upon after two years. Section 5 of the same act requires that all appropriations made for a fiscal year shall be limited by law to the service of that year. Yet this Book of Estimates shows that, in spite of that law and in the face of it, these moneys are being drawn, and the Secretary of the Treasury has held a resolution of this House for six weeks, refusing to tell us how much has been drawn this year out of the balances of 1871.

Now I hold that the law of 1870 ought to be complied with; that after two years every dollar of an appropriation should go into the Treasury of the United States that has not been drawn for the service for which the appropriation was made. I do not see why we should wait until the 1st day of July next, as this bill proposes; there is no propriety in that. The moment this bill passes it ought to be out of the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to draw a dollar out of these balances.

The complaint I have repeatedly made on this floor is that the Executive Departments do not obey the laws of Congress. No money should be taken out of the Treasury of the United States except by the judgment of a court or an act of the representatives of the people. We have in the last four years remedied the evil in great part. This bill, if amended as I propose, will remedy it more than anything else. Money is now taken out of the Treasury by a false construction of the law. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] himself drew that law when I was upon the committee with him, and we thought we had put this matter beyond their power; and it is beyond their power if they will but obey the law. And the amendment I have proposed will make the law so plain that it will be even beyond departmental construction to evade it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] in the necessity of making this law perfectly clear. But I wish to make a suggestion to him which I think he will agree to. It is that he modify his amendment so as not to strike out the words "to be carried to the surplus fund." That is a technical expression which has been in use in the Treasury Department for many years. It is what is always done as a preliminary to covering into the Treasury. Let the gentleman add to that clause the last clause of his amendment instead of making it a substitute for it, so that it will read "to be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury." Whenever anything is carried into the surplus fund it is as much out of reach as when it is disposed of in any other way.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman will accomplish all he wants in that way.

Mr. BECK. If that is so I will not object.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I insist upon striking out the words "to be carried to the surplus fund."

Mr. GARFIELD. Those words should not be stricken out.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. What do you want them in for?

Mr. GARFIELD. The surplus fund is a name given to an account of all funds found unavailable for use or unnecessary. It is a part of the book-keeping of the Treasury Department, that whenever any fund reaches a point where it can no longer be drawn upon it is entered upon what is called the surplus-fund account, and from the surplus-fund account it is covered into the Treasury. It has to go through that step to get into the Treasury.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BECK. I merely want to say this: I find that in section 5 of the law of 1870 it is provided that all moneys not used to fill contracts for that year nor needed for the purpose "shall be carried into the surplus fund." I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is correct in his suggestion, and I modify my amendment accordingly.

Mr. GARFIELD. The law requires them to be carried there.

Mr. BECK. In view of the explanation of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] I withdraw so much of my amendment as proposes to strike out the words "carried to the surplus fund."

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to put an inquiry to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations: When do the two years spoken of in this section commence? Is it at the beginning of the fiscal year, when the credits of the various accounts commence, or two years after the 30th day of June?

Mr. GARFIELD. It commences from whatever date the appropriation is available. If we make an appropriation for the fiscal year beginning next July, then it takes effect two years from that date.

Mr. RANDALL. Then it would take effect July, 1876.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. That is to say, the money would be covered into the Treasury then?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the section by inserting in the third line, after the word "appropriations," the words "except appropriations for specific works," so that the clause will read "unexpended balances of appropriations, except appropriations for specific works."

Mr. RANDALL. That would defeat the object of the section. All our appropriations are specific.

Mr. MAYNARD. The great inconvenience and difficulty in the execution of this law is that it is made to apply to appropriations which it was never intended to cover, or which at any rate have no connection with the evil that occasioned the enactment; for example, an appropriation for a river or a harbor, or for a public building, or for some specific scientific object.

Mr. DAWES. In any such appropriation, where the provision is thought necessary, we provide that it shall continue available until expended; and such a provision would of course modify the operation of this general law. But we ought not to have a standing exception.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman is aware that a great deal of inconvenience has resulted where, for some technical reason, a work has been delayed until the spring of the fiscal year to which the appropriation applied, and the 1st of July arriving before the work was completed, the whole work had to be stopped until Congress met again. It is with reference to that class of cases—not a very numerous class, perhaps, but still an important class, and one in which a great deal of inconvenience has arisen from the want of such a provision—that I have suggested the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. An appropriation is not covered into the Treasury till two years have elapsed; and whenever it is necessary that it should continue available, it can be so specified in the appropriation. You will find in the river and harbor bill provisions so worded as to avoid the lapsing of the appropriation at the end of two years.

Mr. MAYNARD. Having accomplished my object by bringing the point to the attention of the House, and eliciting the explanations which have been made, I will, with the consent of the committee, withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Pending the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] asks unanimous consent to amend the section by adding the words "and covered into the Treasury."

There being no objection, the section was modified accordingly.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. BECK, which, as modified, proposed to make the section read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act, and on the 1st day of July of each year hereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all unexpended balances of appropriations which shall have remained upon the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years to be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio has had the kindness to withdraw his point of order to the amendment which I sent to the desk. If members will restrain for a few moments their impatient desire to finish up the bill, I wish to present a few facts in connection with the amendment I have offered.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me to offer an amendment before he proceeds with his remarks?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend by adding to the section these words:

Provided, That this provision shall not apply to river and harbor appropriations or light-house appropriations.

I wish to say only a word upon this amendment. The surveys ordered for rivers and harbors, especially the long rivers in the Southern States, frequently require more than two years to perfect them through their whole length. The case is the same with some of the appropriations for river improvements.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman's amendment has no sort of reference to mine.

Mr. CONGER. I know that; but I thought it might be offered and adopted before the gentleman proceeded with his remarks.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman can be heard after I am through.

Mr. CONGER. Very well.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I have examined with some care the Blue-Book which lies on our tables to see where the army of appointees who fill the different Departments come from. Of the five or six thousand Department employés appearing on the pages of that book (exclusive of the small army of employés whose names will not be found there) I find that nearly two thousand are from the District of Columbia; some seven or eight hundred from Pennsylvania, and about the same number from New York. Most of the employés in the Departments are from right around this city. In proportion as we go away from the capital the number becomes less; and from my own State there are but ten. My State has six Representatives on this floor, while the State of New York with only six times as many Representatives has over sixty times as many of these employés. The case is similar with all the States of the South. I make this statement in order to appeal to this House to do to the Southern States an act of simple justice in giving to them a fair proportion of the offices to be distributed by the Departments.

A similar ground of complaint exists with reference to other States; but I am not their advocate here. They have members on this floor and upon the committee, who are fully able to represent their interests.

Mr. McLEAN. Is there one clerk in any Department from Texas?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir, there are ten.

Mr. McLEAN. Does my colleague believe that one of them was ever in the State of Texas?

Mr. MILLS. I cannot answer as to that; but the Blue-Book says there are ten clerks in the Departments here from Texas.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know it will be a difficult and embarrassing question to make an arbitrary rule to compel the Departments to adopt that rule and distribute clerkships according to population. You will see, therefore, I have made it upon the principle that it shall not act detrimentally to the public service; that, so far as it can be done consistently with the public service, the different heads of the Departments shall apportion the employés so as to represent the population of the different States and Territories. I hope the House will adopt the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves an amendment to the bill, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the heads of the different Departments in the city of Washington are hereby directed to revise their lists of employés, and distribute their appointments among the several States and Territories according to their respective population, so far as the same can be done without detriment to the public service.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that is new legislation, and therefore out of order to this bill.

Mr. McKEE. That is hardly a fair deal after what has occurred.

Mr. MILLS. I did not make the point when the other question was up.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not make the point of order now.

Mr. MILLS. I know the gentleman does not, but I appeal to the gentleman from Vermont not to insist on his point of order.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I must insist on my point of order, as this is a matter which ought to be discussed with more than a five-minute debate. It is too important a proposition to be acted on in this way, and I insist on my point of order.

Mr. McKEE. I should like to have the gentleman who makes this point of order state where this provision is new legislation. Let him cite the rule.

Mr. SPEER. Does not the point of order come too late, after the gentleman from Texas has debated the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The exact condition of things is this: The gentleman from Michigan offered an amendment in limitation of section 4. That was read from the Clerk's desk. Then the gentleman from Texas rose, and by the courtesy of the gentleman from Michigan was allowed to explain his amendment, which had not been then reported. It was then reported to the House, when the gentleman from Vermont raised the point of order; and certainly it seems to the Chair it is in time.

Mr. SPEER. On that statement of facts, the Chair is certainly right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the point of order to be well taken, and rules the amendment out. The question next recurs on the amendment moved by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and it will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following proviso:
Provided, That this provision shall not apply to river and harbor appropriations or light-house appropriations.

Mr. McKEE. I make the same point of order against this, that it provides for new legislation.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to give notice that I will bring in a bill on Monday morning, making the same provision as my amendment which was ruled out of order, and shall move a suspension of the rules to put it on its passage.

Mr. BECK. I make the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan that it provides for new legislation, and I send to the Clerk's desk sections 5 and 6 of the act of 1870 to be read.

Mr. McKEE. Will it be in order to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair in reference to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we will take a vote on the pending amendment, and then rise and report the bill to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides with reference to the point of order raised on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan that it seems to the Chair to be well taken.

Mr. CONGER. Before my amendment is ruled out I wish to say a word or two on the point that it provides for new legislation. Now, the section itself to which I move to add this proviso is new legislation, and therefore may be amended of course in the way I propose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that as the section itself provides for new legislation any amendment germane to the section is in order.

Mr. CONGER. As my amendment is now ruled to be in order, I wish to say one word on it. There are several of the surveys ordered for long rivers, continued year after year under the same appropriation, which have to be performed by engineers in the service of the Government from year to year. We must either continue this appropriation or reappropriate it; and I think there is no necessity for a reappropriation in this matter.

Mr. TREMAIN. I rise to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McKEE. I ask the decision of the Chair on the question, whether it is too late to appeal from his ruling?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that it is too late for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. McKEE] to appeal. But after the pending amendment shall have been acted upon, if there be no objection on the part of the committee, the Chair will make none to the gentleman taking an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The Chair will put no limitation on the action of the committee.

Mr. TYNER. I shall object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Add these words:
And public buildings, the appropriations for which shall only lapse according to the provisions of existing law.

Mr. TREMAIN. I want to call the attention of the committee to the amendment in regard to public buildings. It seems to me that this new legislation is very important, and that very great wrong may be done unless existing rights are reserved. As the law now stands, and as it has been construed by the Department, wherever any part of an appropriation has been drawn it has not been considered that the appropriation would lapse within two years from the time of the original appropriation, but under this new law any unexpended amount would absolutely lapse:

Now take this case: Appropriations have been made for a large number of public buildings. Part of an appropriation only has been drawn. The works are going on. Take, for instance, my own city of Albany. An appropriation was made for a public building there which will lapse on the 1st of July next. An appropriation of $350,000 was made, if the city of Albany would raise $150,000 to pay for the balance of the site. Within the last thirty days an appropriation was made by our common council of the whole $150,000; and we are now proceeding by a jury to obtain the balance of the site, the site having been selected. A small portion of the appropriation has already been drawn to pay for the expense of getting the site; and we supposed that this continued the appropriation.

I do not see, however, unless our rights are reserved, that we will not be entirely cut off under this new law after the 1st of July, the whole amount of $350,000 lapsing into the Treasury. So that all we have done will be lost.

Mr. MAYNARD. That will be the operation of the law.

Mr. TREMAIN. Then I ask the committee to remember that the Committee on Appropriations reported a bill to cover into the Treasury all these unexpended appropriations; but the House by an overwhelming majority referred it to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and that committee has reported no bill that will save these appropriations from the effect of this law.

Is this an attempt to get round the action of this House in deciding to refer that bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds? It seems to me that legislating in this manner is irregular, and if legislation of this kind is to be considered I submit to the House that they should not in this hasty manner take action by which millions of appropriation will be lost.

Mr. SPEER. I think the gentleman from New York is in error in stating the effect of the bill. The bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was not a bill for covering into the Treasury unexpended balances; but if I recollect rightly it was a bill providing that all appropriations on buildings still uncommenced should be suspended for the present.

Mr. TREMAIN. That is the case. I understand where no site has been procured and no contract made the appropriation will then lapse.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman is in error. It was simply a suspension for the time being of the entire appropriation; it was not to cover the balance into the Treasury.

Mr. TREMAIN. This section causes the lapse.

Mr. SPEER. This section; but that was not the effect of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] mistakes the effect of this legislation. We had precisely this sort of law passed in 1870. There was a doubt, however, in regard to its construction, and this merely makes certain a construction about which Congress has for years been quarreling with the Treasury Department.

Mr. TREMAIN. Then if this introduces no new law, what is the objection to the language of my amendment which declares that as to existing appropriations for buildings the existing law shall apply? The Department have already construed it. We have acted upon their construction, believing it unnecessary to get a new appropriation, part of the appropriation having been drawn for the expense of procuring the site. We thought it unnecessary, therefore, to get a new appropriation; but if the construction of the Department is overruled by this law we lose the appropriation.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] will observe that this clause allows the appropriation to stand for two years from the time it was made. The measure which was voted down proposed to stop in a day every appropriation which had been made for buildings up to the present time.

Mr. TREMAIN. Under the existing law our appropriation would expire two years after the 1st of July.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Well, your appropriation will lapse any way, whether this amendment be adopted or not.

Mr. TREMAIN. Not according to the past construction of the Department; because nothing has been done toward the construction of the building.

Mr. HYDE. I rise to a point of order. I submit that debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Affirmative debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then let us have a vote.

The question was taken upon the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. TREMAIN; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred upon agreeing to Mr. CONGER's amendment as amended.

Mr. BRADLEY. I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by my colleague. In line 3, after the word "appropriations" and before the word "which," insert "remaining to the credit of the respective funds herein named."

Mr. CONGER. That is not an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. BRADLEY. If gentlemen will allow me for one moment, I will explain my object in offering that amendment. The effect of it would be to confine the provisions of the section covering into the Treasury the several balances relating to the subjects named in this bill, and so as not to affect the other appropriations made.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, that would be a very bad amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. BRADLEY; and it was not agreed to.

The amendment offered by Mr. CONGER, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the following as an additional section to the bill:

Wherever under this bill a discharge of employés is made, soldiers shall be retained on the same conditions as provided for in this bill relating to the War Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no objection to that.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If I recollect the amendment in relation to the War Department, the Department was authorized to employ soldiers now enlisted under certain circumstances. Now, this amendment would extend that provision to the other Departments; would it not?

Mr. DUNNELL. My amendment simply has reference to retaining soldiers, when clerks are to be discharged, in preference to others.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] that the paragraph relating to the War Department did allow that Department to retain men at present enlisted in the regular Army.

Mr. BECK. I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota involves new legislation, and is not in order.

Mr. COBURN. Is not the point of order made too late?

Mr. BECK. I have been standing here waiting for an opportunity to make it ever since it was offered.

Mr. DUNNELL. We have adopted the same provision in relation to the War Department. This is a restriction on the whole bill: that soldiers employed in any other Department provided for in this bill, when clerks are to be discharged, shall be retained in preference to others. We have already provided for that in the War Department.

Mr. BECK. I insist on the point of order. Pension your soldiers and pay them, but let them stand on the same footing as other men as to civil employment.

Mr. DUNNELL. That is an objection to the amendment, and not a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota involves new legislation and is not in order. The Chair, with regret, believes the point of order to be well taken, and rules out the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I object to the Chair using the words "with regret." He must decide according to the rules of the House, one way or the other.

Mr. TREMAIN. I do not know of any rule which prohibits the Chairman from expressing regret.

Mr. BECK. I object to the Chairman's casting an apparent reflection on my right to make the point of order, by expressing regret.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regrets that the point of order last taken by the gentleman from Kentucky is correct.

Mr. BECK. Well, I object to the Chair expressing any regret. It is his duty to decide questions according to the rules, yes or no. We want justice, not regrets.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODFORD reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to reserve all points of order on the post-office appropriation bill, and also on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. The record does not show that they have been reserved.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment to the bill, to come in after line 172:

To pay Henry Douglass, employed under the Door-keeper of the House, his yearly compensation, as fixed by the act of March 3, 1873, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, $917.50.

This amendment was neglected in Committee of the Whole. Gentlemen who were members of the last Congress will remember that our friend Judge Peters, who is not now with us, on the last day of the session offered an amendment to the appropriation bill fixing the salary of this person, one of the humble employés of this House, and the appropriation was not provided for in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move the previous question on the bill and amendments; and when it is seconded I shall ask the House to adjourn, so that we may take the votes on Monday.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Pending that motion, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FORT. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not insist on the previous question. I gave notice in the Committee of the Whole that I desired to offer an amendment to the bill, and the chairman made no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. Notices are of no consequence except in the House. Let us have the previous question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were ayes 45, noes not counted.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now call for a vote on the motion for the previous question.

Mr. FORT. I ask the gentleman to permit the House to vote upon the proposition as to whether they will reinstate the disbursing clerk in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is an amendment to the bill, and the gentleman can have a separate vote upon it. I supposed he wanted to offer an amendment to the bill.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. COX and Mr. HATHORN were granted leave of absence for one week.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 363) for the relief of Lucius A. Rountree;

An act (H. R. No. 1763) to permit Edward Savage, of Minnesota, to enter one quarter-section of the public lands or any legal subdivision of the same; and

An act (H. R. No. 2206) to grant an American register to the bark Azor.

JUDICIAL OFFICERS IN UTAH.

Mr. POLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary have been authorized to report at any time upon the subject of courts and judicial officers in the Territory of Utah. I report a bill upon that subject, and move that it be printed and recommitted.

The bill (H. R. No. 3097) in relation to courts and judicial officers in the Territory of Utah was received, read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to give notice that I will report back this bill for action on Tuesday next after the morning hour.

CUSTODY OF INSANE CONVICTS.

Mr. TREMAIN. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back House bill No. 2710, to provide for the care and custody of persons convicted in the courts of the United States who have or may become insane while in prison. It is a short bill, and it is necessary that it should be acted upon soon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think we should pass upon such an important bill as that at this time.

Mr. ROBBINS. I object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana: The petition of 86 citizens of Boone and Hendricks Counties, Indiana, for the passage of a law authorizing the manufacture of patent-right articles by others than the owners of patent-rights upon payment of a reasonable royalty thereon, to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Wabash County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Clark County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Clinton County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Isabella County, Michigan, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Christian County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Calhoun County, Alabama, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Caroline County, Virginia, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 28 citizens of Carroll County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 34 citizens of Robertson County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Henry County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 10 citizens of Richardson County Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Clinton County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Putnam County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Cape Girardeau County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Allen County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Chester County, South Carolina, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Robertson County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Kershaw County, South Carolina, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Saint Joseph County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Pawnee County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Crawford County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Daviess County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Stearns County, Minnesota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Decatur County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 28 citizens of Noble County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Mercer County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Burlington County, New Jersey, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 10 citizens of Lee County, Mississippi, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Fulton County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Ripley County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 26 citizens of Simpson County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 9 citizens of Prince George's County, Maryland, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Madison County, Alabama, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Howard County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Wabash County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 43 citizens of Mason County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 39 citizens of Douglas County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 26 citizens of Clark County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Kendall County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Scotland County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Salem County, New Jersey, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Lake County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Jefferson County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Union County, Dakota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Cayuga County, New York, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Fulton County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 9 citizens of Mississippi County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 34 citizens of Putnam County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 28 citizens of Henry County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Otoe County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 28 citizens of Ripley County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Kosciusko County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Shelby County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 10 citizens of Bartholomew County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Granville County, North Carolina, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Caswell County, North Carolina, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Jasper County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Orange County, New York, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 10 citizens of Whitley County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Columbia County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 30 citizens of Faulkner County, Arkansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Shelby County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Carroll County, Indiana, on similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Keokuk County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Jackson County, Oregon, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Clark County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Fillmore County, Minnesota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Pope County, Arkansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Henry County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Merrick County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Van Buren County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Montgomery County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Marshall County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Burlington County, New Jersey, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Franklin County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 10 citizens of Shelby County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Prince Edward County, Virginia, or similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Grant County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Lebanon County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Wabash County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Van Buren County, Michigan, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Bradford County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 29 citizens of Miami County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Black Hawk County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Berkeley County, West Virginia, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 27 citizens of Randolph County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 5 citizens of Jefferson County, Alabama, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Bradford County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Wilkinson County, Georgia, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Clay County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Webster County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Blackford County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 68 citizens of Livingston County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Logan County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Hardin County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Noble County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Chippewa County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 28 citizens of Brown County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Boone County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Berkeley County, West Virginia, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Clermont County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Ogle County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Dane County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 53 citizens of Scotland County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Cayuga County, New York, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 37 citizens of Chase County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 34 citizens of Pontotoc County, Mississippi, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Warren County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Owen County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Polk County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Pendleton County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Winnebago County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Stanton County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 40 citizens of Muhlenburgh County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 29 citizens of Boone County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 32 citizens of Oldham County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Clay County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Lincoln County, Dakota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Dodge County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Saint Joseph County, Michigan, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Hopkins County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Saline County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Clay County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Pike County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 6 citizens of Saint Joseph County, Michigan, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 26 citizens of Montgomery County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Harrison County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 27 citizens of Henry County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Montgomery County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 31 citizens of Sullivan County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Webster County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 10 citizens of Chittenden County, Vermont, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Lyon County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 30 citizens of Lincoln, County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 8 citizens of Jefferson County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 27 citizens of Christian County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Saline County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Marshall County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 27 citizens of Henry County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of De Witt County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Grundy County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Johnson County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 26 citizens of Saint Joseph County, Michigan, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Keokuk County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 33 citizens of Fulton County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Jackson County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Adams County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Defiance County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Calhoun County, Alabama, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 42 citizens of Madison County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 9 citizens of Guilford County, North Carolina, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Davidson County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Vermillion County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Caswell County, North Carolina, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Franklin County, Massachusetts, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Morgan County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 29 citizens of Breckinridge County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Bond County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of White County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Boone County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Davies County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 9 citizens of Greene County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 27 citizens of Rush County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Lincoln County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Bullock County, Georgia, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 29 citizens of Sumner County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 10 citizens of Pottawatomie County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Wayne County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Shelby County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Caldwell County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Cass County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Pepin County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Putnam County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Stephenson County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Montgomery County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Walworth County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 7 citizens of Merrick County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Washington County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Blue Earth County, Minnesota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Louise County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 40 citizens of Dodge County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Pike County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Washington County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Marshall County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Gage County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Hancock County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Los Angeles County, California, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Crawford County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 60 citizens of Howard County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 38 citizens of Clermont County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Tazewell County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Linn County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Clay County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 32 citizens of Marion County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Russell County, Alabama, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Colfax County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 48 citizens of Mitchell County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 27 citizens of Mason County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Howard County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Mason County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Monroe County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Bradley County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Morgan County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 27 citizens of Barry County, Michigan, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Hancock County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Whitley County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Jefferson County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 27 citizens of Lawrence County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Meigs County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Columbia County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Seneca County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Hamilton County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Marion County, South Carolina, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 29 citizens of Hillsdale County, Michigan, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Iroquois County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Howard County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Auglaize County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 31 citizens of Montgomery County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 7 citizens of Scott County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Christian County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 26 citizens of Morgan County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Dodge County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 39 citizens of Hinds County, Mississippi, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 27 citizens of La Fayette County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of McLean County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 9 citizens of Richland County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Waldo County, Maine, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 39 citizens of Lake County, Mississippi, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 66 citizens of Stearns County, Minnesota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Green Lake County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 26 citizens of Grant County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Montgomery County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 8 citizens of Washington County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 33 citizens of Allegan County, Michigan, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Columbia County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Delaware County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 8 citizens of Benton County, Mississippi, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 51 citizens of Fountain County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Dodge County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Saline County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Harris County, Georgia, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Fairfield County, South Carolina, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Randolph County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Ontario County, New York, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Dodge County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition 21 citizens of Jackson County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Dakota County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Madison County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition 14 citizens of Mobile County, Alabama, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Clay County, Dakota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 8 citizens of Hardin County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Chatauqua County, New York, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Warren County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Newberry County, South Carolina, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Randolph County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Linn County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Henry County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Meigs County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Brown County, Minnesota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Elkhart County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Ottawa County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 54 citizens of Union County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Fulton County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of San Luis Obispo County, California, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Renville County, Minnesota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Otoe County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Scotland County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Montgomery County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Johnson County, Nebraska, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Olmsted County, Minnesota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of McMinn County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Cherokee County, Alabama, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Jones County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Shelby County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Wilkinson County, Georgia, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Callaway County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Pepin County, Wisconsin, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Franklin County, Massachusetts, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 8 citizens of Platt County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Grant County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 28 citizens of Bell County, Texas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Adams County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 6 citizens of Peoria County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Moniteau County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 39 citizens of Hickory County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Bracken County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 28 citizens of Fountain County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Fulton County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 13 citizens of Polk County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Republic County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Warren County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Haywood County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Newton County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Richland County, South Carolina, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Freeborn County, Minnesota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Tama County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Owen County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Rockingham County, North Carolina, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of Bedford County, Tennessee, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 26 citizens of McDonald County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Lawrence County, Alabama, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Floyd County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 29 citizens of Iroquois County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Wells County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of McLean County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Nicholas County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Ottawa County, Michigan, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 16 citizens of Grundy County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 10 citizens of Delaware County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Owen County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Crawford County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Chickasaw County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Buchanan County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Harrison County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Mercer County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 44 citizens of Jasper County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 17 citizens of Grundy County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Yolo County, California, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Ottawa County, Michigan, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Clark County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition 49 citizens of Caldwell County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 15 citizens of Sullivan County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 12 citizens of Linn County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 20 citizens of Madison County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 14 citizens of Hart County, Georgia, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Gregg County, Texas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 38 citizens of Macoupin County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Camden County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Montgomery County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 26 citizens of Ford County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 23 citizens of Gibson County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Wayne County, Michigan, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Allamakee County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Piatt County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 25 citizens of Boone County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 11 citizens of Osage County, Kansas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Putnam County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Edgar County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Clark County, Illinois, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 19 citizens of De Kalb County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 18 citizens of Union County, Dakota, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 26 citizens of Callaway County, Missouri, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 24 citizens of Huntington County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 37 citizens of Robertson County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 10 citizens of Adair County, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 22 citizens of Cook County, Texas, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 32 citizens of Morgan County, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 27, 1874.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate, offered the following

PRAYER:

Almighty and Everlasting God, on this day of solemn conference we come to bow before Thee in deep humility, for the memory of the distinguished dead of this Senate comes freshly before us now; the shadow of life's great mystery still lingers here; and sacred and melting thoughts are in the air around us and kindly voices seem to be telling us of the tokens and admonitions of Thy will. O, may the vacant place and this solemn pause in this Chamber to-day impress their rightful lessons on every heart, for great and small are all alike before Thee, and men from every station must go the way of all the earth; Thou only remainest the same and Thy years fail not; and so, O Lord God, we pray that we may all live and all die in Thee. Have Thou the charge of these services to-day; have Thou the charge of all these, Thy servants, and of all men; and grant that we may be prepared, when this life is over, to see Thy face in peace. Through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

SUMNER MEMORIAL ADDRESSES.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, agreeably to notice already given, I now submit to the Senate two resolutions designed to furnish an opportunity for the Senate and House of Representatives to offer appropriate tributes to the character and public services of CHARLES SUMNER, and I ask for their present consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of CHARLES SUMNER, long a Senator from Massachusetts, business be now suspended, that the friends and associates of the deceased may pay fitting tribute to his public and private virtues.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were adopted unanimously.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, the time that has passed since the death of Mr. SUMNER has assuaged the bitterness of our grief, but the first feeling of sadness rests with undiminished weight upon every heart. Here and by us more than elsewhere and by others his presence will be missed. For nearly twenty-three years he was a member of the Senate, and for a considerable period its senior.

To all of us he was an acquaintance, and to many of us an intimate friend.

To the cultivated classes of Europe and America he was known as a ripe scholar, a sincere philanthropist, an ardent and consistent lover of liberty and defender of the right, an experienced statesman, trained especially in English and American constitutional history, and the traditions, genius, and practice of European and American diplomacy; a lover of art; an orator fully equipped, according to the requirements mentioned by Cicero, for the forum in which his maturer years were spent; and, more than all, a man of pure purposes in private and public affairs.

For nearly twenty-five years I enjoyed his acquaintance, and for more than half that period his intimate friendship. Forgetting for the moment my relations to him, it is to be said that his friendships were first moral and intellectual, to which he added with a liberal hand the civilities, amenities, and blessings of cultivated social life.

He came to the Senate not only as the representative of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts but as the representative of an idea to which the State was even then already pledged. The men who supported him in 1851 were, with a few exceptions, his supporters in 1857, 1863, and 1869. Mr. SUMNER was at times in advance of the people of the State, but in his hostility to the institution of slavery, in his efforts for its abolition and the reconstruction of the Government upon the basis of freedom, he never misrepresented Massachusetts.

In the cause of liberty he was apostle, martyr, and finally conqueror. In this cause, and by nature as well, he was self-reliant, self-asserting, and aggressive, and therefore his life, as he often said, was a life of controversy. His nature was imperious, and he made little allowance for the diversities among men, and often he dealt harshly with those who opposed or failed to accept his views. It is however a happy memory for his friends and countrymen that after his return from Europe he had only kind words for all, even for those with whom he had most differed upon personal and public questions.

First of all, Mr. SUMNER was devoted to liberty; not to English liberty or to American liberty, but to liberty. He accepted in their fullest meaning the words of Kossuth, "Liberty is liberty, as God is God."

In his efforts to establish liberty in America he gave a free construction to the original Constitution for the purpose of securing right and justice to all who were within its jurisdiction; and the powers of a constitution may well be construed liberally in the cause of right and justice, but they can never be too much circumscribed in the service of wrong and oppression.

There are limitations to every form of human greatness. Mr. SUMNER was a follower of ideas. A general declaration is the fullest expression of ideas; and Mr. SUMNER was inclined to trust general declarations and to embody them in the constitution and laws. Institutions, indeed, are often unsatisfactory when tested by the ideas they are designed to represent.

I speak rather of what has been than of our hopes of the future. Our own Constitution is now a near approach to the Declaration of Independence, and we may anticipate the time when local governments and independent nations, in the discharge of their duties and the exercise of their powers, will conform practically to the best ideas of justice and peace. Mr. SUMNER was impatient of delay, and hence he accepted reluctantly those amendments to the Constitution which to others seemed sufficient for the protection of personal and public rights.

It is therefore to be admitted that in the business of government and for the time in which he lived Mr. SUMNER was not always a practical statesman.

The world is usually too busy to concern itself with the men of the past unless they have special claims to consideration. The immortal few in politics and government are those who have led in proceedings in which men of all times are interested. The American Revolution gave a few such names to the country and the world; the contest for the overthrow of slavery added others. Among these we may venture to place CHARLES SUMNER, whose labors, fidelity, and sufferings can never be omitted from the history of the contest.

As the influence of that contest widens and deepens in the current of universal human life the services of the men engaged in it will be more appreciated throughout the world. The blow struck at slavery in America will prove as effectual against slavery in every other country. While slavery existed with us, and suffrage was limited, and the truths of the Declaration of Independence were not realized in the Government, monarchies and aristocracies had a defense in the admitted failure of the great Republic. That defense is now taken away, and, one after another, personal and class governments must fall. Thus will Mr. SUMNER justly claim consideration in other lands and from future times.

There is, however, an immortality not personal which is even more enduring. The power of a great life, of a superior human intellect, spreads far beyond the knowledge of names, and is transmitted to generations that have no means of tracing the influences to their source. These influences become woven into the civilization, literature, and politics of nations, control their fortunes, shape their destinies, and work out good or evil results of the most important character.

It cannot be denied that in the efforts made by Mr. SUMNER in behalf of human liberty and universal peace he has given new force to the most benign influences, or that his power, mingled with numerous other contributions of the past, present, and the future, will contribute to the general welfare of the human race.

But whether his name be remembered or forgotten, his power will continue. When a person has disappeared from the stage of human action, his name, even if known to future generations, is of little consequence to them; the influence of his life is all of value that remains.

Thus has Mr. SUMNER bound himself to his countrymen of two races, and to the civilized world, by chords that may be traced through the ages as long as justice shall find defenders or the divine spirit of liberty shall animate mankind.

But these thoughts relate to the uncertain future. We are called in the present to accept the solemn truth that the death of CHARLES SUMNER is a signal loss to the Senate and people of the United States, alleviated in some degree by the belief that his life, character, and public services, especially in favor of human liberty and universal peace, will ever be held in grateful remembrance by his countrymen and the knowledge thereof transmitted to posterity as an example for future generations.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, my personal acquaintance with CHARLES SUMNER began a few days after I took my seat in the Senate five years ago. It soon ripened into relations approaching intimacy, and a personal friendship resulted that was never marred for a moment by any political differences however great and decided. Therefore it is that I speak to-day; and speak not so much of the politician or statesman as of the man. I leave to those who coincided with him in public affairs to delineate his public services in such terms as to them seems just. I offer a humble tribute to his personal character. It appears to me that one of the most striking peculiarities of Mr. SUMNER'S mind was breadth rather than accuracy; a predominance of the ideal over the practical; a devotion to a great idea without due regard to its unavoidable limitations. That this intellectual bent sometimes led him to overlook what should have been seen, to disregard obstacles that a more practical man would have felt bound to respect, to advance theories that, however beautiful in the abstract, were hedged about by limitations in the concrete, and often made him—especially upon constitutional and legal questions—an inexact and inconclusive reasoner, must be admitted, I think, by even his most ardent admirers. Who of us has forgotten how he, in effect, placed the Declaration of Independence above the Constitution, and deduced from it powers of government that no one but himself ever thought were conferred by the fundamental law? Who can forget his immeasurable demands upon Great Britain by reason of her conduct during our civil war? Who does not remember his oft-repeated idea that the islands of the Carribean Sea and the Gulf should be wholly abandoned to the African race? But in all these and other instances that might be named his views, however impracticable they seemed to others, were in accordance with a lofty ideal that was satisfactory to himself, and from which he would not willingly depart.

Another trait of Mr. SUMNER was his love of discussion. He never within my knowledge shrunk from it; and he was the determined opponent of all attempts to limit debate in the Senate by a previous question or other restrictive rule. He spoke often and elaborately himself, and he was the best, and perhaps the most courteous, listener among us to the speeches of others. He placed a very high estimate upon the power and effect of discussion; often in conversation citing instances of measures being carried or defeated by a thorough debate. And it so happens that the last words he ever spoke to me (just after an adverse vote on a bill he had opposed) were these: "THURMAN, this is another instance of the good effects of debate. Had the vote been taken on this bill without discussion it would have passed almost unanimously."

It is an old saying, that the foundation of politeness is benevolence; which leads us to contribute to the happiness of others and avoid everything that could give them pain. All who knew Mr. SUMNER in social life will bear witness that he exemplified the truth of this saying. I never knew him in a mixed company to introduce any topic that might prove disagreeable to any one present; and when, by inadvertence or otherwise, such a topic was introduced by others, he was always one of the first to divert the conversation to some other subject. And I can bear witness that he could sit down with a political opponent and discuss political questions, upon which they differed most widely, without for a single moment losing his temper or manifesting a want of respect for the views of his adversary. This, in my opinion, Mr. President, deserves to be ranked among the virtues; and when we add that in the conversation of the deceased there never was anything low or vulgar, but, on the contrary, intellect, refinement, and taste marked all that was said, we contemplate a character whose amiability, high breeding, and politeness will ever command our respect and admiration.

It has been very common to say that Mr. SUMNER was an egotist, and this I suppose is the popular opinion. It may be true that, tried by the standard of modern manners, he was egotistical; but tried by that ancient standard with which his learning had made him so familiar; compared, for example, with Demosthenes or Cicero, he was a modest man. I must say that in five years of somewhat intimate acquaintance I never knew him offensively egotistical. That he found pleasure in speaking of the part he had borne in public affairs is undoubtedly true; but what man ever lived who had been long in public life, and who had arrived at that age when retrospection becomes a habit of the mind, who did not often speak of himself and what he had said and done? If we listen with pleasure and respect to the aged veteran who—why should we censure the aged statesman who recounts his great exploits and narrates his hard-earned victories?

> Shoulders his crutch, and showed how fields were won,

I apprehend, however, that it was egoism rather than egotism of which his critics meant to accuse the deceased. But what man ever achieved success in a long struggle against formidable opposition, or adverse circumstances, without some confidence in his own powers? And if this confidence, fed by success, becomes inordinate, what does it prove save that even the greatest intellects are not free from imperfections?

Mr. President, there is a proverb almost as old as mortuary monuments, that describes an improbable story as being "false as an epitaph." And so of funeral orations it has often been said, that the quality by which they are most distinguished is exaggeration. Observing the charitable maxim, "nil mortuis nisi bonum," the faults of the dead are buried out of sight; while, on the other hand, disregarding that other maxim, "nil mortuis nisi verum," he is exalted by eulogy above the lot of humanity and placed in the ranks of angels or gods. This was not the idea of what a funeral discourse should be in the opinion of CHARLES SUMNER. In that most touching and beautiful address delivered by him on the occasion of the death of Senator Davis, of Kentucky, while paying the highest tribute to the virtues of the deceased and recognizing the moderation of judgment upon the character of our adversaries that is begotten by time and experience, he yet stood fast by his own well-settled convictions. Following that example, I speak over his grave my belief, that he was great in intellect, profound in learning, sincere in his convictions, true in his friendships, urbane and amiable in his intercourse, and wholly unassailable by corruption. All this I can truly say, and more than this he would not, if living, wish me to say. He would not ask me to surrender my well-matured opinions, or to applaud his views or his course when they were opposed to the deliberate judgment of my own mind.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, having been honored with the confidence and friendship of the late distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, I esteem it a high privilege to offer a modest tribute to his memory and worth. Deferring to his large experience in national affairs, and appreciating the extent of his culture and learning, I have often, in the hour of need and uncertainty, sought his advice, and never in vain. To his generous sympathy and wise counsel I attribute much that I have been enabled to accomplish toward the happiness and well-being of a large class of citizens of the State of Alabama, once bond but now free. In their name and on their behalf, as well as my own, I lay the garland of gratitude upon the bier of CHARLES SUMNER, one of the greatest of the many great tribunes of Massachusetts.

When these bondmen were dumb, and in their behalf men were silent, HE SPOKE; and they can never cease to honor him who found voice for the voiceless and gave help to the helpless. That voice was never silenced in their behalf until there fell upon it the enforced silence of death; nor can they ever forget that the last dying utterance of their great champion was a whispered plea to cherish their cause.

Now, when their tongues are unloosed, and all men may speak for them, in God's fit providence, his voice alone is silent. Yet how true it is that, "being dead, he speaketh." Not because of his scholarship do these grateful freedmen honor this great scholar; not because of his statesmanship do they revere the memory of this dead Senator; not for his acquisitions of learning, nor for his pride of place, but only that he had pity for their sorrows, and found it in his heart to plead ever for the poor and for the oppressed. His career thus furnishes an illustrious example of the truth of the proverb, "The heart of the wise teacheth his mouth, and addeth learning to his lips."

Called from his post of duty in the acme of his usefulness, he lived to that epoch when to advocate the cause of universal freedom left no taint upon name and fame, and when to beseech succor for the oppressed and down-trodden constituted no crime, inviting and extenuating violence, or palliating denunciation and social ostracism. In the very face of contumely and disdain he calmly, but no less determinedly, waged his battle against the oppressor's wrong, gathering strength from every repulse and honor from every defeat, until the victory was won; a conquest in the simple interests of peace and human happiness, with no aggrandizement other than the enlargement of the area of freedom.

During the period of African slavery, Mr. President, free speech in the Senate existed only in name—a precept without the practice—the merest mockery of a privilege! The abrogation of slavery gave birth to many blessings, but none greater or more important to the American people than the right to freely express convictions on public affairs, and to be permitted to maintain these opinions in good faith, in accordance with the principles of republican form of government. To CHARLES SUMNER, as much as to any other, are we indebted for the practical and unrestricted exercise of the privilege of free speech in the Senate of the United States. The day has happily dawned when the argument of violence finds no favor in the public sight, and when the people recognize that through faith and love, and not by arms, can the work of national amelioration be accomplished. It is now the auspicious era of fide et amore—non armis, and in this good work is CHARLES SUMNER beatæ memoriæ.

Other Senators, more familiar with his career, will recall the incidents of his early life, his college days, his legal studies, his foreign travel, his friendships for the learned in his own and in other lands, his companionship with the wise and good—all that experience which resulted in the rare culture, and which made him at once the peer of the most cultivated, qualities which lent such a charm to his associations and fitness to his surroundings.

It is my purpose rather to speak of those virtues without which all these gifts and attainments would have been worthless in comparison. The lesson of his life testifies to the value of "integrity of purpose," that integrity which honors cannot suborn nor threats terrify, and which resists alike the blandishments of friends and the batteries of foes—vitam impendere vero.

It was of little interest to the poor hunted slave whether CHARLES SUMNER stood high in scholarship at Harvard; but it was of mighty import to all these dumb black millions that the scholar should have had the moral firmness to stand before the "Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston," and deliver to those listeners (expectant of the glowing periods of the orator, to set forth the "pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war") his weighty arguments against all war!

It doubtless seemed to the impatient politicians, during the weary weeks of vain balloting for a successor to the seat of Daniel Webster, that Mr. SUMNER jeopardized a great prize for a very little and unimportant matter, when he steadfastly refused to do the slightest action which even seemed in the least degree to compromise his position. But had he been of yielding stuff, of what worth would he have been amid the storms and strifes of the Senate? His whole public life, from the day of that oration on peace, through all the momentous scenes of the twenty-three years of his senatorial career—years so crowded with events, years the most important since the adoption of the Constitution—his whole life is but a commentary and a repetition of that rare courage which impelled him to differ from friends for the sake of truth and conscience.

In those early days of bitterness, in these later days of calumny, no voice ever breathed a word against the spotless integrity of the man. To those familiar with the history of the times, there can be uttered no higher eulogy!

Realizing, in the very words of Mr. SUMNER, that a "seat in the Senate is a lofty pulpit, with a mighty sounding-board, and the whole wide-spread people is the congregation," I am deeply sensible, Mr. President, of my inability to properly eulogize his greatness or to fitly exalt his memory. But I would fail in my duty to my constituents, and be untrue to the settled principles of my life, as well as recreant to the deep affection and veneration which I bore him, were I to remain silent upon this solemn occasion.

Far be it from me to advert to error and frailty, and from which none are free; but, in his own language, employed in eulogy of the late Senator Fessenden, I may repeat that "the error and frailty which belonged to him often took their color from virtue itself."

He has followed from this Chamber, in quick succession to the grave, the column of stalwart champions of liberty—Fessenden, Seward, Chase, and Hale—all of whom, through the infinite mercy of Providence, were permitted life to reap the harvest of freedom, and to behold our land happy in the enjoyment of universal liberty. His motto was "Ducit amor patriæ," and no nobler epitaph can be graven on his tomb!

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, here our numbers are not so large, nor our differences of any sort so great, that we do not feel, when death enters this Chamber, something of the bereavement of the broken family circle. Associated here for a prolonged term of years, often including the prime and ripest portion of our lives, statedly meeting in the workshops of committees and in daily debate, hearing our names repeated in the frequent roll-calls, it is not strange that it should give our hearts a pang to part with the humblest name when it passes away forever to the "starry court of eternity." But now when we part with a conspicuous member of the Senate, conspicuous by length of service, by eminent ability and established renown, each one of us must confess to more or less of a personal loss as well as to the greater loss of the Senate itself. CHARLES SUMNER under the higher law has responded to the last roll-call, and here the familiar sound of his voice is forever silenced. His imposing presence on the crowning outer circle of the Senate will no longer attract attention. Only the memory remains to us of one whose words and bearing—with minor qualifications—so well comported with the dignity of his office as to have fairly earned the title of a model Senator.

Mr. SUMNER for four years had been a member of the Senate when it was my fortune, in 1855, first to hold a seat in the House of Representatives. For words spoken in debate, in 1856, he was brutally assaulted by Preston S. Brooks, a member of the House, and it was not until after this that my personal acquaintance with him began. For some years I was more familiar with what was then known as his "vacant chair" than with the Senator to whom it belonged, who was abroad ready to invoke heroic remedies, if only they led to health. During these years he returned for a short period, but bore little or no part in the Senate. Mr. Brooks meanwhile suddenly died, as at last, and after intervals of painful suffering, has, also suddenly, the victim of his violence. It was noticeable in his social intercourse, while others let slip an occasional outburst of feeling as to his assailant, Mr. SUMNER never disclosed the least lingering personal animosity. History was silently left to avenge itself. His misfortune appeared to be accepted as one of the many inseparable wrongs resulting from the cruel system of slavery, with which only he waged enduring battle, and not as the crime of an individual with whom, living or dead, he sought only peace.

The Senate of the United States is no ordinary theater in which men sustain their parts. It is the forum of States. If the seat which in 1851 Mr. SUMNER was called to fill had been previously occupied by an undistinguished person, his task would have been comparatively easy; but that seat had been long held by one the world pronounced the foremost American Senator, made classic by one the breadth and grandeur of whose services—whose eloquence and statesmanship, with that of his compeers—had placed the American Senate on a level with that of the Roman Republic in the days of its greatest virtue and highest splendor. He succeeded, after a brief interlude, the veteran "Defender of the Constitution," who had stamped upon our banner the ineffaceable words, "Union and Liberty, now and forever, one and inseparable." To say that he proved not an unworthy successor of Webster, however unlike, is to say much, considering he was but a tyro in the politics of even the Commonwealth from whence he came. It was the fortune of CHARLES SUMNER to be placed in his high station at a period of grand and rapidly culminating events. Blessed with exalted natural gifts, he also had been furnished with a large share of the erudition of the age, completed by such graces as foreign travel supplies. Having already started in the field with a small band of early crusaders against slavery, impelled by a robust frame and more robust will, he fearlessly seized upon every fit occasion in his new position to make that institution odious and, if possible, to wound it in some of its most vulnerable parts. This was his all-absorbing mission.

He received and revered the Constitution of our country, as ordained by the same will and power which proclaimed that great Magna Charta of human freedom, the Declaration of Independence, and therefore never forgot the fundamental idea of "equality before the law," nor that "all men are created equal." He brought no fixed allegiance to party platforms, and found no withes in the Constitution that restrained him from resisting any claims for the protection of slavery; but that instrument was everywhere to be interpreted broadly and beneficently in the interests of humanity, world-wide and divinely free.

Bestowing care even upon trifles, his orations in the Senate, as might be expected, were prepared as for a grand occasion, and, towering in his place like a tribune of the people, the heavy, resounding tones of his voice were wont to draw the attention of willing listeners to words which soon found through the press a far wider acceptance. His arguments were methodical, abundant in information, stiffened by apt and pregnant sentences, studiously observant of the syllogistic beginning, middle, and end, and, though rarely what is called brilliant or illumined by wit, were always clearly put forth, with the paramount object of spreading light and with the convincing majesty of earnestness.

Those among us who may have found it sometimes difficult to agree with him never found it difficult to respect his fairness of purpose, his unflinching integrity, or his wealth of learning. In his orbit as a statesman he soared high from the beginning to the end, and ever sought with moral intrepidity noble ends by noble means. As to the largest share of legislative measures, he was apt to be right. He sturdily and sorrowfully resisted the banishment of coin, as an alien, from the base of a sound currency. Upon questions of popular rights he was often a leader; in all steps of reform he was never a laggard. The doctrines he espoused, if not exclusively his own, appeared to belong to him by the possessory title of constant use and earnest adherence. He needed no admonition to "stick." If it cannot properly be claimed that "his doctrines persuaded one generation and live to govern the next," it may be claimed that his early text, of "Freedom national, slavery sectional," did not wait until the next generation to be even more than verified. Freedom is national and slavery forever extinct. In the surging conflicts in behalf of universal liberty the deceased Senator has gathered many laurels, and if few more remained to be won, his brow was already covered. He will be numbered among those who helped to change a great chapter in our history. By a life of unstinted and unselfish labor he secured the undying gratitude of an emancipated race and the general approval of mankind.

Mr. SUMNER was ever surrounded by books. They were his most beloved friends, and surrendered many of their secret treasures to their constant wooer. New books as well as old, Longfellow as well as Plato and Milton, often robbed him of sleep. He was a somewhat fastidious lover of the beautiful in art, busily collecting such notable objects as were historically rare, superb in material, or cunning in workmanship; but neither this elegant refinement of taste nor the epicurean seclusion of his daily life lifted him above willing labor and the tenderest sympathy for those who were rude, unlettered, and degraded by even the darkest-browed slavery. To him the "Greek Slave" in marble appeared transcendently beautiful; but the chain, the ugly system, that chafed the limbs and bound the living slave, was an intolerable atrocity, even a manacle on the symbol of God.

Mr. SUMNER's habits of industry, though the sands of his fourth term as a Senator were fast running out, clung to him to the very last, and in no three months of his life were they much better displayed, nor rest and pastime more habitually scorned, than in those which brought his labors to an end.

Most men have some specialty wherein they chiefly excel, and doubtless the great subject of the natural rights of man most deeply excited the enthusiasm of CHARLES SUMNER; but he brought valuable contributions into the discussion of a wide field of topics, political and historical; and upon international law, it may not be wrong to say, he was possibly more profoundly learned than upon the subject which most contributed to build up and support his reputation. Few men have done more work, and fewer still have done it so well. While chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in all critical emergencies he was a vigilant and powerful friend of peace, and as such merits the country's grateful remembrance. The principle embodied in our late treaty with Great Britain, of the arbitration of international differences, he eagerly accepted as the herald of peace to future generations, in harmony with his earliest idea of the "True Grandeur of Nations," and as a hopeful sign of human progress.

Public men during life very often receive the poorest kind of thanks for their noblest efforts. The world at large is not always swift to comprehend; associates look on with torpid indifference; and enemies are made glad by every new field exposed to assault. But when the grave closes the scene, praise of the dead harms no rival, and the final verdict of history proclaims only truth, generously, perhaps, but free from detraction and all uncharitableness; and then public men who have deserved well of their country obtain that full measure of recognition and reverence which at last confers merited rank in the roll of the worthiest of mankind.

The present age, however, always suffers at all points by contrast with the past, because none but the great among the unnumbered hosts turned to dust—the few screened and idolized products of picked centuries—have been preserved, while all of the present age are visible and so near that no deformities can be hidden. There is no sun, that has not long ceased to shine, whose spots remain unrevealed.

Our deceased associate, unsheltered by wealth, by family, or by party, was exposed first and last to much adverse criticism, from which, in spite of much real admiration, impartiality will not even now wholly release him. His persistency in pushing his own measures to the front, though to their present hurt or to the hurt of others, often provoked rebuke. His enemies he easily forgave, but could not so easily bury the slender personal affronts received in any wordy encounters from his peers. His self-confidence, admirable enough when he was right, was no less unmistakable and glittering when he happened to be wrong. To his conclusions, sincerely reached, he gave regal pretensions, and for them accepted nothing less than unconditional submission. Unconscious of personal offense, he imperiously and with the stride of a colossus, trampled down whatever arguments stood in his way, not knowing who was bruised, and yet was sometimes so sensitive that if his own arguments were touched by the gentlest zephyrs of personal retort he felt they were visited too roughly.

Yet these occasional self-assertions by no means held general sway, and never at his own house and table, where the cordial greeting and genial smile, with conversation embroidered with both wisdom and mirth, exhibited the full and varied attractions of his head and heart.

Finally, deducting whatever truth may demand—a stern deduction the deceased never omitted—the brightness of his fame will not serve to perpetuate the memory of any stain upon the absolute purity of his private or public character, and there will still remain the imperishable records of a memorable career—something that the highest ambition aims to grasp, and that heroes die to obtain—or much of the real elements of greatness and all the glory of a historic name.

"I live in the hope of a better world, a world with a little less friction," are words I have seen attributed to the departed Senator. Has he not, with no duty neglected, reached that "better world?" And who of us does not sometimes pray for "a world with a little less friction?"

Mr. PRATT. I too would drop a tear over the new-made grave of CHARLES SUMNER. Others who have known him longer and better have already set forth in eloquent language his wonderful endowments of mind and the moral graces of his character. I do not propose to speak of these at any length, nor yet of the leading incidents of his eventful career; for his history is known of all. The press has already spoken with its myriad tongues to all parts of this widely extended country. Nor yet do I care to dwell upon that rare scholarship which made him in international law, in belles-lettres, and statesmanship one of the foremost men of the country and the age. All who knew him can bear witness how well the graces of his mind harmonized with his nobility of form and majesty of feature. He was a man of such mark in his mere exterior as to arrest at once the attention of a stranger, and make him a chief among ten thousand. All these topics I leave to other hands. But what I do want to linger upon a few moments are some traits in his character which distinguished him as a man and legislator and deserve to be held up as incentives to others who would tread the paths of honor like him and win the enduring respect and confidence of mankind.

Mr. SUMNER was a man pre-eminently true to his convictions of right. It was in this sign he conquered. He did not stop to consider whether the position he took would bring favor or reproach. He was only anxious to be right; to plant himself upon principles that would not change. Hence he did not allow himself to look at a question through any medium that distorted its true proportions. He was an honest man by nature. He hated deceit, fraud, peculation, and corruption in all their forms. But especially were all the strong forces of his moral nature set in hostility to oppression by man over man. Against the system of human slavery he waged ceaseless war, from early manhood up to the period of his death. Need I speak of his correlative love of truth, of freedom, of justice, of equal rights, in this Chamber that has so often echoed his grand utterances? To the establishment of this doctrine of equal rights among men without distinction of color or race; to the emancipation and elevation of the four millions of the African race whom he found in bondage and lived to see freedmen and citizens of this Republic, he consecrated the many years of his public service with a singleness of purpose that never swerved a moment, with an unflagging zeal and an energy that never tired. This was his great work; and it was a work of love and of conscience. He had many colaborers, and it is no injustice to them to say that he had no superior in the abilities, the ripe learning, the courage and zeal which he brought to the enterprise.

The pioneers in the great movement against slavery were a most remarkable body of men, distinguished equally by talents and boldness, by zeal and fortitude. The history of parties may be searched in vain for a parallel to the anti-slavery party in its origin and progress in the short but rapid and successful career it run, until all its objects came to be accomplished, but by means and instrumentalities hidden from the eyes of those who set the ball in motion. Their doctrines were odious to the last degree among their countrymen, and neither the great abilities of the leaders, nor the abstract justice of their cause, nor the unselfishness of their motives could shield them from persecution, from odium, and contempt. The principles they announced touched the conscience of a part of their countrymen and alarmed the selfish fears of another part. They excited the animosity of all who wanted repose and hated agitation. The war they waged was against an institution which was coeval almost with the settlement of this continent, which was interwoven in the political systems of half the States, recognized even and protected in the national Constitution and which furnished the unpaid labor of three millions of men, women, and children to promote the wealth and feed the pride of less than half a million of masters and mistresses. Never in the history of the world did there exist a combination of men more formidable by their common interest and their common fears, by their wealth and wide-spread influence, than this compact body of slaveholders; and it was such an institution, venerable in years, deeply imbedded in social and political systems, and above all formidable in the political grasp in which it held the country as in a vice, that this small body of reformers attacked in its stronghold. It was David with his sling going forth to meet Goliath with his spear like a weaver's beam. This is not the time to do more than touch upon that great warfare in which Mr. SUMNER bore so conspicuous a part. He was most ably seconded by such men as Gerritt Smith, Lovejoy, Stevens, Hale, Seward, Chase, Garrison, Phillips, and Giddings. Most of that noble band of pioneers have gone to their rest. But what a work for a single generation to accomplish have they left behind them!

When Mr. SUMNER's conscience was roused by the wrongs of slavery he was pursuing with singular success a profession which opened to his ambition pleasing vistas of distinction and ample reward. There is something grand in his renunciation of the advantages of his position; in his breaking loose from friends and a party too timid to resist the demands of slavery, and consecrating himself to the elevation of a race of slaves, from whom he was so far removed by tastes and association and sympathy. I do not follow him in his great work. It is a part of the history of the country. To that country and its honor, to truth and humanity and to the cause of equal rights, he devoted the remainder of his life. His last thoughts dwelt upon that race for whose welfare he had done and suffered so much, and in the advocacy of whose rights he had been struck down by a felon blow in this Chamber inspired by the barbarism of that slavery against which he had made war.

"See to the civil-rights bill; don't let it fail," were among his last utterances to his colleague in the other House, who stood beside the dying statesman. To his colleague in this body a year ago he said, "If my works were completed and my civil-rights bill passed, no visitor could enter the door that would be more welcome than death." That bill was the great work which was to crown his labors. It was the last act of legislation necessary, in his opinion, to fill the measure of the colored man's rights. How often during this session have we heard his voice in eloquent persuasion lifted up in support of this measure. It was the first bill offered upon the assembling of the Forty-third Congress, and stands to-day at the head of our Calendar of bills. In times past how often have we seen him employing every fair parliamentary opportunity of urging this measure upon the consideration of the Senate.

Probably at no period of his life did he more forcibly illustrate his perseverance, his energy, his zeal, and eloquence, than in the many efforts he made to pass this bill. We know now it was no mere passion for notoriety that inspired these labors. Death tears the mask from the face and the human soul gives out true utterances as it approaches the overmastering presence of Him who divines the thoughts of men. We know now that it was in the heart of CHARLES SUMNER, his last and most deeply cherished wish, to lift up the colored race to the plane of perfect equality. And, sir, while that race endures on this continent they will bind upon their hearts these last words of their friend, and henceforth for all time Mr. SUMNER will divide with the martyred Lincoln the love and reverence of this warm-hearted people.

But I must not forget to mention other traits of character which distinguished our departed friend. Though not a demonstrative man, but studious and somewhat reserved in his habits, he was courteous and kind to all who approached him. There was no one who better understood the rules and courtesies which govern this body, or that more scrupulously observed them. No one ever had occasion to call him to order. No expression unbecoming this place ever fell from his lips in debate, though no one more prompt to assert his rights.

There is another trait on which my mind delights to dwell: the transparent purity and simplicity of his character. No one has ever ventured to assail the purity of Mr. SUMNER's public or private life. Here, for more than twenty years, he stood a conspicuous figure, for much of the time odious for the opinions he held upon the subject of slavery and the object of bitter persecution; but who ever challenged his perfect rectitude of motive in the views he uttered and the votes he gave? Here, during the many years of his public life, when corrupt schemes assailed Congress, who ever linked Mr. SUMNER's name with ring or combination of any kind which sought special advantages from legislation? No lobbyist ever approached him with doubtful propositions. No one could count upon his vote unless the measure was one which commanded his approbation from his sense of its justice and fitness. Suspicion fell from time to time upon many names, often with cruel injustice, of self-seeking aims; but it is a most striking proof of Mr. SUMNER's lofty and transparent character that his integrity was never called in question in his public or private relations. That he did not love money or seek to add to his riches we know from the modest estate he has left, and of which he has made such judicious distribution. That he had a warm heart and friends he prized, we know from the bequests he has made and the dying messages he left. His last utterance was, "Tell Emerson how much I love and revere him." This was the friend who once said of Mr. SUMNER, "I think he has the whitest soul I ever knew." That little sentence tells the whole story of Mr. SUMNER's character.

Mr. President, with this memorial occasion ends all of public honor we can render to our departed associate. But no living witness of what transpired here on the day his funeral obsequies were celebrated in this Chamber shall ever forget the sublime spectacle. From early morning all the approaches to the Capitol were thronged with people of all conditions of life who sought to look upon his face for the last time as his body lay in state in the Rotunda. What fitter place for such respect? Thousands upon thousands passed his bier and paused a moment to gaze upon that classic face, majestic in the repose of death. And then who shall forget the presence which greeted his mortal remains in this Chamber? Here were assembled the representative living forces which govern this Republic of forty million people. The national law-makers were here from far-off Oregon and California; from the Rocky Mountains; from the original thirteen States, and from the great basin of the Mississippi and its tributaries. Here were assembled, in their black robes, the members of that august tribunal who administer jurisprudence over forty-six States and Territories. Here, too, came to do honor to the departed Statesman the Chief Magistrate of the nation with his Cabinet councilors; and lastly, ranged side by side, sat the embassadors of the great powers of the earth, the representatives of those governments with which for ten years Mr. SUMNER as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations had so much to do in molding our national policy toward them. All these were here hushed and sad, while the voice of religion was heard in prayer and in sad mention of him lying low in his coffin, all insensible to the imposing pageant and about to be committed, with solemn rite, earth to earth, dust to dust. Sadly did his associates think of that form, now prostrate and lifeless, as we had so often seen it tower here in eloquent debate. Sorrowfully did we recall that voice whose earnest tones should fill these Halls no more. And O! how sadly did we see his lifeless corpse make its final exit from this place where for twenty-two years he was a living power, influencing in perhaps larger degree than any other the opinions of men. He has been borne from city to city, through the busy throngs of the living, who paused with uncovered heads to do honor to his ashes, until he has been committed at last to final rest in the soil of his native State which he loved so well and served so faithfully.

Mr. President, I cannot close my humble tribute to the memory of Mr. SUMNER without adverting to the extraordinary testimonies to his worth which have been rendered spontaneously throughout the whole country by the press, from the pulpit, and through resolutions passed at public meetings. Since April, 1865, when Mr. Lincoln fell by the hand of an assassin, the country has witnessed no such manifestations. But especially have these tributes been warm and earnest on the part of the colored race, for whose good he labored with such disinterested zeal. Wherever the news has penetrated that their great friend and advocate had fallen in the midst of his work in their behalf, they have assembled and given expression to their grief and gratitude. I hold in my hand a series of resolutions, just in sentiment and beautiful in expression, adopted by the colored men of the city where I dwell, and I cannot more fittingly close what my heart prompted me to say of our lamented associate than by sending to the Clerk's desk the preamble and resolutions adopted by them and asking that they may be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following preamble and resolutions adopted at a meeting of colored citizens of Logansport, Indiana:

Whereas it has pleased the All-wise and beneficent Ruler of the universe to remove from our midst our beloved friend and benefactor, the eminent philanthropist and statesman, Hon. CHARLES SUMNER; and whereas we, as colored people, are under a special debt of lasting gratitude to him for his unswerving devotion to the advocacy of our rights as an oppressed race: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the death of Hon. CHARLES SUMNER comes to each of us with all the bitterness of a personal bereavement.

Resolved, That we will ever cherish and honor the name of CHARLES SUMNER, and that while we hand it down to our children, to be held by them in love and veneration, we will also teach them to emulate his virtues and uprightness of character.

Resolved, That his solicitude for our cause, to which he had given the labors of his noble life, manifested in his dying hour in the ever memorable words, "Take care of the civil rights bill," was the last beautiful link in a golden chain of good deeds which binds his memory to the hearts of the oppressed of all lands forever; and, though he needs no monumental marble to keep his memory fresh in their hearts, yet, as an outward expression of their gratitude, we favor the proposition that the colored people of this country shall erect a monument to him at the capital of the nation, respectfully suggesting the words quoted above as one of the inscriptions upon said monument.

Resolved, That as a testimonial of respect to the memory of our deceased friend, we will drape our church in mourning, and the colored citizens of this city are requested to wear emblems of mourning for the period of thirty days.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, it was my privilege a few weeks since, by your appointment, to stand with a few of our brother Senators at the grave of the late Senator, CHARLES SUMNER, while his earthly remains were being deposited in the soil of his native State, to rest while time shall endure in the goodly company of heroes and statesmen who had there preceded him. Standing among the tombs of the many who had trod the paths of glory that lead but to the grave, were the eminent men of the State, notably among others the masters of philosophy and poetry, who express its highest thought and give intellectual power and glory to the Athens of America. Only for such a man could such an assembly have been gathered. Something besides station evoked that homage of select souls. Among these many men of genius, drawn there not merely by respect for the dead statesman, but by the promptings of an affection springing from kindred tastes and years of intimate friendship, it may not be improper to individualize a very few of those who witnessed that closing scene of a conspicuous career. There stood Ralph Waldo Emerson, the genial philosopher, who, in writing of such friends as the one then mourned, had expressed in one of his essays his appreciation of friendship:

I awoke this morning with devout thanksgiving for my friends, the old and new. Shall I not call God the Beautiful, who daily showeth himself so to me in his gifts? I chide society, I embrace solitude; and yet I am not so ungrateful as not to see the wise, the lovely, and the noble-minded, as from time to time they pass my gate. Who hears me, who understands me, becomes mine, a possession for all time. * * * High thanks I owe you, excellent lovers, who carry out the world for me to new and noble depths, and enlarge the meaning of all my thoughts.

In that silent and sorrowful company also stood Henry W. Longfellow, with silver locks and noble brow, the poet of tenderness, whose words had fitly imaged the aspirations of human souls to penetrate the veil of death; words never more fitting than when some strong spirit has "left the warm precincts of the cheerful day" and passed beyond the dark curtain hiding from mortal gaze the "realm of mystery and night:"

As the moon from some dark gate of cloud
Throws o'er the sea a floating bridge of light,
Across whose trembling planks our fancies crowd
Into the realm of mystery and night,
So from the world of spirits there descends
A bridge of light, connecting it with this,
O'er whose unsteady floor, that sways and bends,
Wander our thoughts above the dark abyss.

And there stood Oliver Wendell Holmes, the rich and clear in thought, whose muse is soon to celebrate his dead friend in other memorial services. Will he find more apt thought or expression than those with which years ago he testified his homage to the memory of a brother poet?

Behold—not him we knew!
This was the prison which his soul looked through,
Tender, and brave, and true.

His voice no more is heard;
And his dead name—that dear familiar word—
Lies on our lips unstirred.

Here let the body rest,
Where the calm shadows that his soul loved best
May glide above his breast.

Smooth the uncurtained bed;
And if some natural tears are softly shed,
It is not for the dead.

Here let him sleeping lie
Till heaven's bright watchers slumber in the sky,
And Death himself shall die.

There stood John G. Whittier, the poet of freedom, clarum et venerabile nomen, sad witness of the interment of the MAN for whom his exigent muse had called five years before the first election of CHARLES SUMNER to the Senate:

Where's the MAN for Massachusetts?
Where's the voice to speak her free?
Where's the hand to light up bonfires,
From the mountains to the sea?
Beats her pilgrim pulse no longer?
Sits she dumb in her despair?
Has she none to break the silence?
Has she none to do or dare?
O, my God! for one right worthy
To lift up her rusted shield,
And to plant again the pine tree
In her banner's tattered field!

I could not doubt that the grand old poet had seen the realization of his ideal in the unflinching champion, now low in death, who had borne a part so generous and courageous in the strife for freedom.

It has been assumed that CHARLES SUMNER was an austere man, absorbed in his self-consciousness and in his daily labors, indifferent to ordinary emotions. I refer to the life-long friendship that knit him to men like these to show the real warmth of his nature; his attractive and receptive inner life.

I recur again to that scene, impressive as it was as the uncovered multitudes silently looked upon the casket that enshrined the dead Senator, and fitting as it was that the State and nation should pause while the sad rites consigned to earth that noble form which had so long moved with high power and influence in human affairs, to note the lesson there impressed, that Time is the universal conqueror, and the lives of the greatest are but a point on the dial of time. To very few of the restless, ambitious, striving sons of humanity is immortality of fame attainable. The advancing shadows of the past leave uncovered few forms of men who have occupied the world's arena. The cloud approaches and swallows up successive generations; obscures into common blankness names and histories that were fondly thought imperishable. Only when great opportunities are furnished to great talents can exception be hoped, or is ever realized. The efforts of men to accomplish the birth of some great state, filling broad pages in the world's annals; an empire over the intellect or imagination of mankind attained by the rare genius that dates its infrequent efforts with intervals of a score of generations; the discovery or application of grand truths for the amelioration of human conditions—these may give immortality to the memory of man, and leave his name a household word even with the indifferent future.

CHARLES SUMNER'S fortune did not cast him into an era when a great State struggled into being. He had not that impulsive, consuming genius that casts a glare over the ages. But he lived in an age when evils that were scarcely noticed from their apparent insignificance at the origin of the Republic had grown to vast proportions, had become incompatible either with national safety or human rights, and gave him a field of labor in which he became illustrious. Earnestly sympathizing with him in that work, concurring with him year by year in the blows that he struck at slavery, I speak with full heart in tribute to his courage, his manliness, his singleness of purpose, his high achievements. He boldly announced and persistently applied eternal truths that brought to the test the growing wrongs which were destroying the meaning of our institutions and giving point to the assertion that the declaration of the fathers was a display of glittering generalities. The name he earned by these labors of Hercules Massachusetts cannot afford to let die. The enfranchised race must hallow it forever. But it belongs to the world and all mankind.

I speak of his courage and manliness. Picture that almost solitary man as he stood here twenty years ago, uttering what his associates deemed not merely heresies, but blasphemies; the suggestions not merely of eccentricity, but of stark madness or fatal mischief. The ark he shook with unsparing hand was to them most consecrate. Here there was political and social ostracism—the discountenance of his fellows, so hard to bear in such a body as this; in the country execration and contempt; at home, even, doubtful and hesitating support. Martin Luther would go to Worms if there were as many devils as tiles on the roofs. CHARLES SUMNER would go where his convictions led, through obloquy, hate, unpopularity, and deadly assault. Let no man who challenges the wisdom or justice of his course deny his fortitude and courage. But for the work that Mr. SUMNER performed there were necessary not only fearlessness and fortitude, but a cool, clear judgment, untiring industry, and perfect integrity. Suspicion of sordid motives would have destroyed his influence. These necessary qualities Mr. SUMNER possessed in the highest degree. His devotion to the one great idea of his life, the abolition of slavery and the entire political equality of all men, was absorbing and unremitted. If n the earlier years of his senatorial life to most of his associates here his utterances against slavery seemed sacrilegious or insane, long before his death advocacy of slavery in this Chamber would have seemed to all his associates as insane or a pleasantry. Less than twenty years worked this great revolution; and in this Hall he was unquestionably the chief inspiring cause and guiding spirit. The careful orations which he elaborated and here pronounced, exhibiting in remorseless nakedness the repulsive body of slavery, aroused the attention of the North, introduced into political discussion a moral element almost as potent as religious enthusiasm, and changed the issues widely from the commercial controversies that before that time had divided parties. It would be assuming too much to say that Mr. SUMNER was the sole cause of the revolution that was wrought, mighty as his influence was. There were other able laborers in the Senate and in the country, increasing in numbers as events progressed. Slavery gave food for excitement by its measures of resistance, which were often carried to aggression, and by new demands; and it took the final stand in opposition to the Government, without which all the eloquence of CHARLES SUMNER and his associates and all the aroused spirit of the North would have left it intact in its strongholds.

The lurid flames of civil war let in a more intense light upon this great stage, and fixed the attention of mankind upon the actors who played a part unequaled in the world's drama. Among these Mr. SUMNER was not excelled for sagacity or patriotism. I am disposed now to concede that the war was a logical result of the teachings of Mr. SUMNER and his compeers; though only peaceful revolution, the force of persuasion only, was intended by them. They combated a power of unknown force and proportions; of unascertained sensitiveness and vigor. They boldly thrust their torches into a magazine. They zealously promoted ends where the resistance arose from both passion and interest, and the collision was unexpectedly a convulsion where the frame-work of the Government trembled on its foundations. They believed that to circumscribe slavery within existing boundaries was to put it in the course of ultimate extinction. But its extinction, peaceful or otherwise, was not desired, would not be tolerated, by its ultra friends; and hence when a party triumphed with CHARLES SUMNER'S dominant idea, the friends of the twin relic took the fatal step of secession long contemplated as their dernier ressort.

Mr. SUMNER met this crisis with statesman-like decision. In those days, as a member of the other House of Congress, I had often opportunity to listen to his utterances on the floor of the Senate. No man ever heard from his lips counsels for submission or unworthy compliance. Rather was he stern and aggressive, as befitted the times. He was among the first to proclaim that the war for slavery could only be put down by the annihilation of slavery. Where others of his party timidly followed or resisted, he boldly led. He was the embodiment at once of the convictions and courage of his noble State. In the prime of manhood and of his intellectual powers, hardened in grain and nerve by the long exercise of his strength in senatorial conflicts, his decisive voice gave boldness and energy to the counsels of the American Senate, where only boldness and energy could cope with the appalling difficulties that assailed the country. To Mr. SUMNER largely, to men of his bold and sagacious spirit wholly, the nation owes it that is now not only one but free from the Canadas to the Gulf.

Francis Lieber in his Political Ethics says: "The dread of unpopularity has ruined many statesmen, led authors to abjure the truth, and seduced citizens to crooked paths." With CHARLES SUMNER no dread of unpopularity ever operated to deflect him from his chosen path of duty. He might err, he did sometimes err, in choosing that path; but he pursued it sturdily, without selfish fear of consequences. He was sometimes harsh in his judgment of the motives of others; but his own were transparent and frankly avowed. He was tenacious of his opinions in good or evil report. His reliance upon his own resources was unwavering; his confidence in his own convictions was supreme: He expected rather than courted the concurrence of the people. In a remarkable passage in the Mémorial de Sainte Hélène, Napoleon declared, "Thus we ought to serve the people worthily, and not occupy ourselves with pleasing them. The best way of gaining them is by doing them good." This teaching, however strange in the mouth of the august author, seems to embody the philosophy of Mr. SUMNER'S political life. Yet he was gratified by the love of the people of Massachusetts, and proud of their confidence. On the last day that he ever visited the Senate, when the resolutions had been read that testified that the people of his State by their representatives had rescinded the only censure of him that they had ever uttered during his long career of service, he feelingly expressed to me his appreciation of that great act of justice, and spoke warmly of the kindness that had cheered him during his last visit to his State. Yet it is said that to no man did he ever complain of that censure, and by no act or word ever sought its reversal. So he had none of the arts of the politician; had no party within his party; no leaders of cliques or factions at his beck; and left wholly to the people the care of his political fortune.

It is meet that to the memory of such a man—scholar, statesman, and patriot—high honors be paid. He was himself generous of eulogy to departed worth. I have sought to add but a leaf to the garland that decorates his tomb.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when the Senate met on the 11th day of March last, and we were informed that CHARLES SUMNER was dying, the intelligence came with such suddenness and excited such sorrow and sympathy, that no one of us was inclined to the discharge his usual official duties. Mr. SUMNER was with us the day before in apparent good health, and witnessed the formal withdrawal by the General Assembly of Massachusetts of the only criticism ever made by that Commonwealth of any act of his during his long-continued service of twenty-three years as a member of this body. We saw no indication of disease, and yet within twenty-four hours he was dead. So striking an example of the uncertain tenure of human life was a warning to us all, made more impressive by the exalted position held by Mr. SUMNER.

At no previous period of his life would his death have caused such general sorrow. The long strife he conducted against slavery aroused against him bitter animosity in one portion of our country, but this was so mellowed by time and events that his old enemies acknowledged the purity of his motives and the lofty purpose of his warfare. He had unmistakable evidence of the continued confidence and support of his constituents, and of the love and veneration of five million freedmen.

The heat of recent contests in this body, unavoidable where debate is free, and where honest opinions boldly expressed necessarily produce some strife and personal feeling—this was passing away, and CHARLES SUMNER was by the judgment of his associates here, by the love and confidence of his constituents, by the general voice of the people, the foremost man in the civil service of the United States. This eminence is assigned him for unblemished honor, for high intellectual capacity, improved by careful study and long experience, and for public services rendered here with unwavering fidelity and industry, with conscientious consistency, contributing in a large degree to the liberty of millions of slaves, and to the advancement of the power, position, and prosperity of the whole country.

We ought not to exalt the dead with false eulogy; but I feel after long association with Mr. SUMNER in the public service, continued since December, 1855, sometimes disagreeing with him and conscious of his imperfections, that I would not do justice to his memory did I not place his name and fame above that of all in civil life who survive him. I do not compare him with those whose good fortune it has been to have rendered important military service, for such a comparison is impossible. We may contrast the services of the statesman and the soldier, but we cannot compare them. The mental and physical elements required for success are widely different. In all periods of history the soldier has won the highest rewards; the statesman must often content himself with deserving them.

This is not the time or the occasion to analyze events or to parcel out the good that has been done or the evil that has been avoided; but I can safely say that on all the vital issues that have arisen since Mr. SUMNER entered the Senate he has been a prominent, conspicuous, and influential advocate of the opinions and principles represented by the republican party, which have either been ingrafted in the Constitution of the United States or have controlled the policy of the Government since 1861. His differences with political friends have been on collateral questions, but on vital questions he has always been not only a representative but a leader. His part on the leading measures of the war and on those that grow out of the war is so conspicuous that their history could not be written without his name appearing in the forefront. The true criticism of his course is, that he has often been so eager in the advance that he did not sufficiently look to practical measures to secure the progress already made.

If I am correct in the position I assign to Mr. SUMNER, we may well pause a moment to notice the personal advantages or qualities that enabled him to attain this distinction.

And first and chief of all I would place the advantage he derived from a good education. He was eminently an educated man, not only in the perfect mastery of college lessons, but in the broader field of classical and English literature, of international and civil law, and in the customs and habits of society. With this advantage, he had an armory of weapons and a capacity for acquiring knowledge from every source and making it useful in every emergency.

Again, he was a man of fixed convictions, with a steady purpose always in view. This is an indispensable quality for success. The central idea of his political life was hostility to slavery. This appears in his earliest writings as strongly as when afterward it became mixed with personal strife. His hatred of slavery was fierce, intense, morbid—evinced by such language of bitterness and denunciation that no wonder the holders of slaves construed his invectives against the system as personal insults demanding resentment. Mr. SUMNER did not so regard them. His object was liberty to the slave, and not punishment to the master. His later life proves that when he could secure the one he freely gave amnesty to the other. Washington did not pursue his object to obtain liberty and independence for his country with more unwavering faith and effort than SUMNER did for liberty and equal rights for the slave. This quality in Mr. SUMNER always relieved him from inconsistency. While he was not always satisfied to secure what he had previously demanded, he was always advancing in the same direction and not in an opposite one. No man's actions could be more consistent with the objects he always kept in view.

Mr. SUMNER was aggressive; he could brook no opposition. He was always for a clean victory or a clean defeat. He would not yield even on minor points, and would often fight for a phrase when he endangered a principle. He would sometimes turn his warfare upon his best friends when they did not keep exactly abreast with him. This feature of his character lay at the foundation of many of his controversies with his associates, and was its weakest point. With the great multiplicity of minds that must contribute to a common purpose in this arena of debate, there must be yieldings of minor things to accomplish great things.

Mr. SUMNER was industrious to a remarkable degree. His seat was rarely vacant. He was prompt and faithful in his attendance on committees of which he was a member. Genius can accomplish nothing without industry. Education cannot be acquired without it. Success in public life more frequently depends upon industry than upon natural ability. We can have no eight-hour law or ten-hour law here. Mr. SUMNER was always busy, and even in social life sought for or conveyed information. The eloquent speeches that will preserve his name are none the less valuable because they have been distilled by the midnight lamp.

Mr. SUMNER was honest in the broadest meaning of that good old Roman word. He was upright, free from tricks and fraud. No one could suspect the purity of his motives, or seek by improper means to influence his conduct. He might be misled by prejudice, or party bias, or local interests, but never by personal interest or hope of it. He was not a politician in the sense of the word as it is now used—a man of artifice or contrivance. He was remarkably free from all artifice. He did not even use the artifice of silence. But he was a politician in the true and natural sense. He was profoundly versed in the science of government. It is a common error that he confined his attention to the slavery question. Far from it. No one in this Senate was so familiar as he with all the laws and usages that govern our intercourse with foreign nations. He was deeply interested in questions affecting the internal development of the country, and of late years has carefully studied all financial questions, and has contributed to their solution. Next to his dying wish for the passage of the civil-rights bill was his desire that the promise of the United States should no longer be measured by a depreciation of 10 to 14 per cent.

Such is the estimate, briefly stated, that I have conceived of Mr. SUMNER. He sleeps upon Mount Auburn, and no word of ours can give him care or grief. He awaits the mysteries of the future, and not long hence we must in our turn join him. How changed this scene since a few years past I entered it! More than one-half I met here are dead, and only three remain who were then members of the Senate. CHARLES SUMNER was the last of the funeral train. Who next?

May we be so guided here that when our time comes our associates may be able truly to say of us something of the good that is this day said of CHARLES SUMNER.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, representing in part upon this floor a State contiguous to Massachusetts and a people closely allied to hers by many ties, I cannot refrain from briefly expressing upon this occasion the profound sorrow that bowed their hearts when they heard that CHARLES SUMNER was no more.

In common with the people of the whole country, they recognized his eminent public services, and, even when disagreeing with him, never lost their faith in his honesty of purpose and unfaltering devotion to the cause to which his life was given. But New Hampshire has other reasons peculiar to herself for cherishing his memory.

Seven years before he came here to occupy the seat of Daniel Webster, John P. Hale appealed from the decision of his party to the voters of New Hampshire upon the question of slavery extension. Almost single-handed and alone, against a party unequaled in discipline and ignorant of defeat, among a people nearly as steadfast and unchanging as their granite hills, he won one of the greatest victories ever recorded in our political annals. Kindling by his eloquence the love of liberty and hatred of oppression that lie at the core of humanity, he was borne into this Senate upon a popular torrent which burst through the crust of party like lava from the burning heart of a mountain. Here for four years he stood the isolated and ostracized representative of a principle stronger than all parties and destined to triumph over them all.

In 1851 Massachusetts, as if to repay the debt she owed for the man who marched from the Granite State to die at Bunker Hill, placed CHARLES SUMNER at the side of John P. Hale. It was the re-enforcement of a forlorn hope, and revived the drooping spirits of the opponents of slavery.

What followed is known to all and will never be forgotton. Linked to the emancipation of four million slaves, the memory of such men is as imperishable as the stars.

And after this marble pile shall have crumbled into dust and every existing political organization shall have been destroyed by all-devouring Time, SUMNER'S incorruptible honesty and steadfast devotion to the cause of human freedom will be gratefully remembered, for these make his one of the names—

On Fame's eternal bead-roll worthy to be filed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I can add nothing of narration or of eulogy to what has been said, and so well said. Mr. SUMNER'S life, his character, and his services have been fittingly presented, and on both sides of the Chamber. The generous voices of political opponents have followed the affectionate praises of devoted friends, and nothing remains but to close this sad and august observance. Yet something forbids my entire silence, and impels me to interpose a few sentences before the subject passes from the consideration of the Senate.

My acquaintance with Mr. SUMNER commenced previous to my entrance into this body, where it ripened into a friendship which will always remain among the most agreeable recollections of my public life. I remained associated with him until every other seat in the Chamber, except one, had changed its occupant, and eight new ones had been added. Some left us in the ordinary chances and changes of political fortunes; some were transferred to other departments of the public service; and of these some have returned again to the Senate; some, as Douglas, and Baker, and Collamer, and Foot, and Fessenden, fell, like SUMNER, at their posts, and like him were borne to their final repose with all the demonstrations of public gratitude, of official respect, and of popular affection with which a generous constituency decorates the memory of those whose lives have been spent in its service and who have worthily worn its honors.

But Mr. SUMNER'S constituency was the Republic, wide as its farthest boundary and permeating its utmost limits; for he was conspicuously the representative of a principle which, although seminal in the organization of the Government, was slow of growth and fructified largely under his care. When the intelligence of his death followed so close upon the first intimation of his danger, it fell with an equal shock upon all classes of society, upon "all sorts and conditions of men;" it invaded with equal sorrow the abodes of luxury and the cottages of the poor—

——— pauperum tabernas,
Regumque turres.

The scholar closed his book and the laborer leaned upon his spade. The highest in the land mourned their peer, the lowliest lamented their friend. How well his life had earned this universal testimony of respect; how naturally the broad sympathy which he had manifested for the wronged and the injured of every condition came back to honor his memory, it is not my purpose to enlarge upon. His eulogy is his life; his epitaph is the general grief; his monument, builded by his own hands, is the eternal statutes of freedom.

Mr. President, when I look back over this long period, crowded with great events, and which has witnessed the convulsion of the nation, the reorganization and reconstruction of our political system; when, in my mind's eye, I people this Chamber with those whose forms have been familiar to me, whose names, many of them historical names, have been labeled on these desks and are now carved on the marble that covers their dust, I am filled with a sadness inexpressible, yet full of consolation. For, musing on the transitory nature of all sublunary things, I come to perceive that their instability is not in their essence, but in the forms which they assume and in the agencies that operate upon them; and when I recall those whom I have seen fall around me, and whom I thought necessary to the success, almost to the preservation of great principles, I recall also those whom I have seen step into the vacant places, put on the armor which they wore, lift the weapons which they wielded, and march on to the consummation of the work which they inaugurated. And thus I am filled with reverent wonder at the beneficent ordering of nature, and inspired with a loftier faith in that Almighty Power without whose guidance and direction all human effort is vain, and with whose blessing the humblest instruments that He selects are equal to the mightiest work that He designs.

And now, Mr. President, as a tribute of respect to the memory of our departed associate, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and thirteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 27, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back on motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for reference and printing. The morning hour begins at five minutes after twelve o'clock.

COURTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POLAND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3098) to amend an act entitled "An act to reorganize the courts of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

FREE BANKING, ETC.

Mr. POLAND also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3099) to provide a free system of national banking and for the resumption of specie payments; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. POLAND. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. POLAND. It provides, it is true, for a free system of national banks; but it also provides for the retiring of United States notes, and the issue of new United States bonds for the purpose.

The SPEAKER. The House on Monday last, by a yea and nay vote, decided that bills of this character belonged to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. POLAND. They decided wrong.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] may think so; but the Chair is bound by the decision of the House.

Mr. POLAND. I should prefer the judgment of the Speaker.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

INCREASE OF NATIONAL-BANK CURRENCY.

Mr. HOOPER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3100) to increase the issue of national-bank notes in States and Territories having less than their proportion, and for the ultimate resumption of specie payment; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES N. WILLIAMS.

Mr. HALE, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3101) for the relief of Charles N. Williams, postmaster at Elizabethtown, Essex County, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TESTIMONY OF PARTIES TO ACTIONS.

Mr. LANSING introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3102) to permit parties to actions and indictments in courts of the United States to testify in their own behalf; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States, and ordered to be printed.

WIDOWS' PENSIONS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3103) to repeal the statutes which forfeit widows' pensions by reason of a second marriage; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SALLIE BROUGHTON.

Mr. SMART introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3104) for the relief of Sallie Broughton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

JOHN CASS.

Mr. WILBER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3105) for the relief of John Cass and to refund commutation money wrongfully paid during the late civil war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SALARIES OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. DUELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3106) to fix the salaries of the district judges of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN HUDSON.

Mr. O'NEILL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3107) to place the name of John Hudson on the pension-rolls; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RESTORATION OF DUTIES.

Mr. BIERY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3108) to restore certain duties on imposts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS M. MACCUBBIN.

Mr. O'BRIEN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3109) for the relief of Thomas M. Maccubbin, of Montgomery County, Maryland, for steam grist and saw mill converted to the public use by United States troops; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A. SHOOP, OWEN ARDINGER, AND OTHERS.

Mr. LOWNDES introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3110) for the relief of A. Shoop, Owen Ardinger, and other citizens of Williamsport, Washington County, Maryland; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MARIE P. EVANS.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3111) for the relief of Marie P. Evans, executrix and legatee of S. Duncan Linton, deceased, and to refer her claim to the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MARY C. STIRLING.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3112) for the relief of Mary C. Stirling, (tutrix of her minor children,) of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

EPHRAIM CLAYTON AND JAMES R. O'NEILL.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3113) for the relief of Ephraim Clayton and James R. O'Neill, of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

FRENCH BROAD RIVER, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. VANCE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3114) to provide for opening the navigation of French Broad River, of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.

Mr. VANCE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3115) to render available an unexpended balance of appropriation for the support of industrial and other schools, &c., of Indian tribes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FANNIE M. HERRON.

Mr. SLOAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3116) granting a pension to Fannie M. Herron, widow of James Herron, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL AGENTS' ACCOUNTS, ETC.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3117) to provide for the adjustment of the accounts of mail agents, mail contractors, and postmasters for services rendered previous to April 20, 1861; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MARY CONLY.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3118) for the relief of Mary Conly; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM MILLER.

Mr. HAYS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3119) for the relief of William Miller, of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

FLORENCE AND GUNTERSVILLE RAILROAD.

Mr. SLOSS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3120) granting the right of way to the Florence and Guntersville Railroad through the public domain, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. LAWRENCE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3121) to facilitate the resumption of specie payments and to prevent fluctuations in the value of United States notes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS DOWDELE.

Mr. READ introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3122) for the benefit of Thomas Dowdele, allowing him a pension for wounds received in the late rebellion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MARTHA J. HARRISON.

Mr. READ also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3123) for the benefit of Martha J. Harrison, of Hardin County, Kentucky, allowing her arrears of pension; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A. C. MEADOWS.

Mr. DURHAM introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3124) for the benefit of A. C. Meadows, of Russell County, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SARAH BACON.

Mr. DURHAM also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3125) granting a pension to Sarah Bacon, of Frankfort, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REPEAL OF TAXATION ON STATE BANKS.

Mr. CROSSLAND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3126) repealing all laws imposing taxation on State banks; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

HUSTON WYRICK.

Mr. THORNBURGH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3127) for the relief of Huston Wyrick, of Union County, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CRIMES BY MILITARY PERSONS.

Mr. COBURN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3128) in regard to crimes committed by military persons; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INCOME TAX.

Mr. FORT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3129) to levy a tax on the annual income of persons and corporations which exceeds $5,000; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FORT called for the reading of the bill in full.

The bill was read in full.

Mr. FORT. I ask the reference of this bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am inclined to think that it should go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. FORT. It is to affect the currency, as will be evident from an examination of it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have no objection to our committee taking jurisdiction of a matter of this sort; but I think properly it should go to the Committee on Ways and Means. It relates to a tax on incomes.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

JOHN IRWIN.

Mr. FORT also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3130) granting a pension to John Irwin, a soldier in the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN T. SILVERNAIL.

Mr. McNULTA introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3131) for the relief of John T. Silvernail; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE W. SILCOX.

Mr. McNULTA also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 92) authorizing the payment of $2,000 to George W. Silcox, out of the appropriation made February 14, 1873, for compensation and expenses of the United States commission to the international exhibition at Vienna in 1873; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ALICE ROPER.

Mr. CLEMENTS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3132) granting a pension to Alice Roper, widow of Samuel Roper, late captain Company K, Fifty-sixth Illinois Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL PARK AND HOTEL COMPANY.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3133) to incorporate the Bozeman City and Yellowstone or National Park Wagon Road and Hotel Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES J. CARLIN.

Mr. GLOVER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3134) for the relief of Charles J. Carlin, of Macon County, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INTERCONVERSION OF LEGAL-TENDER NOTES, ETC.

Mr. FIELD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3135) to provide for the interconversion of legal-tender notes and interest-bearing bonds, and to reduce the interest on the public debt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

FRICTION MATCHES.

Mr. FIELD also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3136) relating to the manufacture and packing of friction matches, to define a gross thereof, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF SANTIAGO DE LEON.

Mr. HANCOCK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3137) to compensate the heirs of Santiago de Leon for certain property taken for the use of the Government; which was read a first and second time, referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

E. LAWS.

Mr. PURMAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3138) for the relief of E. Laws, chief engineer, of the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

STEAM FERRY-BOAT A. BURTON.

Mr. McCRARY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3139) for the relief of the owner of the steam ferry-boat A. Burton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GREEN BAY, WISCONSIN.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3140) to provide for a building for the use of the custom-house, post-office, internal revenue, and other civil offices, in the City of Green Bay, Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OSHKOSH, WISCONSIN.

Mr. SAWYER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3141) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, internal revenue and other civil offices, at the City of Oshkosh, Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GREEN BAY.

Mr. SAWYER also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin relative to the erection of a custom-house and post-office at Green Bay, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES M. INGALLS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3142) for the relief of James M. Ingalls; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

STOCKBRIDGE AND MUNSEE INDIANS.

Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3143) to provide for the payment of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe of Indians, of Wisconsin, for certain lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEONARD J. ROSE ET AL.

Mr. HOUGHTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3144) for the relief of Leonard J. Rose, Joel Hedspeth, James R. Hedspeth, and Robert Perkins; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PAGE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3145) to amend an act approved June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relative to the Post-Office Department and regulating the mail service;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PAGE also presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California relative to the survey of public lands in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FORT RIDGLEY RESERVATION.

Mr. STRAIT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3146) to extend the provisions of the homestead law to the Fort Ridgley reservation in the State of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

COMBURGH TOWN COMPANY OF MARION COUNTY, KANSAS.

Mr. PHILLIPS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3147) providing for the repayment to the Comburgh Town Company of Marion County, Kansas, of the purchase money paid for the northeast fractional quarter and the northwest fractional quarter, section 4, township 22 south, of range 3 east; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3148) to confirm the sale of lands in Kansas made by Dudley Tucker, a Shawnee Indian; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. HEREFORD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3149) directing that hereafter 20 per cent. of the duties on imports be collected and paid in legal-tender notes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF BENJAMIN MOORE.

Mr. HAGANS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3150) for the relief of the heirs of Benjamin Moore; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. KENDALL presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Nevada relative to the Central Pacific Railroad obtaining patents to lands; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3151) authorizing payment to certain citizens of New Mexico for Indian depredations; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PHILIP J. BUCKEY.

Mr. CHIPMAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3152) for the relief of Philip J. Buckey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN MAGEE.

Mr. CHIPMAN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3153) for the relief of John Magee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

COLUMBIA RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CHIPMAN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3154) amendatory of an act to incorporate the Columbia Railway Company of the District of Columbia, approved May 24, 1871; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The call of the States and Territories being completed the Chair will, by unanimous consent, now receive bills and joint resolutions for reference from those gentlemen who were absent when their States were called.

GIRLS' REFORM SCHOOL OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3155) providing for the construction of buildings for the use of the girls' reform school in the District of Columbia, and appropriating the conscience fund for that purpose; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PATENTS AND COPYRIGHTS.

Mr. DOBBINS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3156) in addition to the statutes relating to patents and copyrights; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF FROM TAXATION.

Mr. BRIGHT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3157) to provide temporary relief against further permanent taxation, &c.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

EUGENE JACOBS.

Mr. BANNING introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3158) for the relief of Eugene Jacobs, United States consul at Montevideo; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FREE BANKING, ETC.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3159) to establish free banking, to reduce the interest on the bonded indebtedness of the United States, and to retire the legal-tender notes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania. I ask that that bill be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the bill?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I object.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen introducing bills when their States are called have a right to have them read; but afterward, when they are presented by unanimous consent, they have no such right.

The States having been called for bills and joint resolutions for reference only, they will now be called for resolutions; and resolutions are in order from the State of Maine.

EMPLOYÉS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. FRYE. I offer the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and call for the previous question.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas great inequalities are believed to exist in the salaries of the officers, clerks, and employés of the Senate and the House of Representatives, whereby injustice is done to them as well as to the Government; and whereas the public interests will be promoted by a careful revision of those salaries and a correction of the existing inequalities at as early a day as possible: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service be, and they are hereby, instructed to carefully consider, forthwith, the subject of salaries for said officers, clerks, and employés, and if inequalities are found and if injustice is being done to them, or any of them, or to the Government, in their opinion, to provide for the correction thereof by bill or otherwise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to accept a suggestion——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I merely want to suggest that this should be a concurrent resolution so as to have a joint committee of the two Houses.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BECK. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of this resolution. I want to exhaust the morning hour.

Mr. KELLOGG. There will not be any other business in the morning hour.

Mr. BECK. Then I will withdraw the call.

The resolution was then adopted.

SHIPPING COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3160) in reference to the operation of the shipping commissioners act, approved June 7, 1872; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that none of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of shipping commissioners by the several circuit courts of the United States to superintend the shipping and discharge of seamen engaged in merchant ships belonging to the United States, for the further protection of seamen," shall apply to sail or steam vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, or in the lake-going trade touching at foreign ports or otherwise, or in the trade between the United States and the British North American possessions, or in any case where the seamen are by custom or agreement entitled to participate in the profits or results of a cruise or voyage.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call the previous question upon this bill. I wish to state that the Committee on Commerce sanction the bill.

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House absolutely prohibit debate under this call.

The question was then taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 18, noes 22; no quorum voting.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE, of New York, and Mr. HALE, of Maine, were appointed.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HALE, of New York, (one of the tellers.) I withdraw the call for a further count. I misunderstood the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. If I understand the bill it should not be passed.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER. No amendment or debate is in order.

Mr. SPEER. Does it not require one day's notice for the introduction of a bill under this call?

The SPEAKER. It does; but that point is too late to be made on this bill. Besides, the Chair is informed by the Clerk that notice was given.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 119, noes 32.

So the previous question was seconded; and the main question was then ordered.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays. If I understand this bill correctly, it is one that should not pass.

The question was then taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 11 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill; and being taken, upon a division there were ayes 94, noes not counted.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IN MEMORY OF CHARLES SUMNER.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCDONALD, their Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had adopted resolutions for the purpose of showing an additional mark of respect to the memory of CHARLES SUMNER, late a Senator of the United States from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts

The SPEAKER. The resolutions just received from the Senate will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 27, 1874.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of CHARLES SUMNER, long a Senator from Massachusetts, business be now suspended, that the friends and associates of the deceased may pay fitting tribute to his public and private virtues.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of CHARLES SUMNER, long a Senator from Massachusetts, and in sympathy with the action of the Senate, business be now suspended in this House to allow fitting tributes to be paid to his public and private virtues.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, when, more than six weeks ago, the announcement of the death of the Senator from Massachusetts was made in this Hall, the shock was so sudden, the sense of loss and bereavement so great, that we felt the most fitting employment of the time to be to "commune with our own hearts, and be still." Public business was suspended until that lifeless form could be brought to rest for a few hours under the great Dome of the Capitol, crowned by the emblem of that liberty at whose altar the homage of his life had been offered; and then, in the Senate Chamber, by Senators and Representatives, President and Cabinet, judges and warriors, the ministers of foreign powers, clergy and people, in the presence of the great reconciler, Death, were performed those funeral rites with which the nation honors those of her sons who have "fallen in high places."

We bore him from these scenes of his public labors to the old Commonwealth which gave him birth; and there, in the home of his childhood and manhood, in the presence of countless thousands who thronged to unite in that last tribute of respect and affection, the State reverently and tenderly committed to the earth, to mingle with kindred dust, the earthly remains of her foremost public man and best beloved citizen.

And now that his character and fame are passing into memory and history, it is fitting that we, his contemporaries and associates in the public service, should be allowed a brief opportunity to express our estimate of the man, and of his relation to his country and mankind.

CHARLES SUMNER was born in Boston, on the 6th of January, 1811, the son of Charles Pinckney Sumner, who was for a long time the sheriff of Suffolk County. His early education was at the Boston Latin School, from which he entered Harvard College, and graduated with distinction in 1830. He studied law under Story and Greenleaf in the law school of that institution, and was for three years employed to take the place of Judge Story as a lecturer and instructor in law during the sessions of the Supreme Court at Washington. He spent the next three years in Europe, where both in England and on the Continent he formed the acquaintance and gained the friendship of many distinguished men; acquired a familiarity with some European languages; diligently pursued his studies in literature, history, and jurisprudence, and gratified as well as cultivated his taste for art. He returned to the practice and study of his profession, in which he gained an honorable and distinguished position, chiefly due to his profound and extensive learning. He never argued many cases, but conducted such as he had with marked ability and success. He edited the American Jurist, the twenty volumes of Vesey's Reports, and was the reporter of three volumes of the decisions of Judge Story in the first circuit. His first public performance which attracted general attention was his oration on "The true grandeur of nations," before the municipal authorities of Boston, on the 4th of July, 1845, which Richard Cobden pronounced "the most noble contribution made by any modern writer to the cause of peace."

He had voted with the whig party, but took no active part in political affairs, until the great controversy upon the question of slavery, especially as affected by the war with Mexico and the proposed annexation of Texas, brought him into the front rank of the advocates of universal liberty. He declined a nomination as a Representative in Congress.

In April, 1851, he was elected to the Senate of the United States, for the full term succeeding that which had been held by Mr. Webster, and in its last few months by Mr. Winthrop and Mr. Rantoul. His election was made by a coalition of the free-soil party and the democrats, Mr. BOUTWELL, who was the democratic candidate for governor of Massachusetts, being elected by the same combination of parties. He took his seat in the Senate on the 1st of December, 1851. His first great speech in the Senate was in support of a motion to repeal the fugitive-slave law, and was delivered on the 26th of August, 1852.

He was struck down at his desk in the Senate Chamber, by blows upon the head inflicted by a Representative from South Carolina, on the 18th of May, 1856, in professed revenge for words spoken in debate two days before. The terrible injury to the spinal column, which was nearly fatal at the time, resulted in the malady, angina pectoris, which at last terminated his life. In consequence of the suffering and illness caused by this assault, he was absent from his place in the Senate during most of the time for four years. He was re-elected to the Senate in 1857, in 1863, and in 1869; and died on the 11th of March, 1874, having attended the session of that body on the day before his death.

Such are the simple outlines of his life; yet how affluent a culture, how lofty a purpose, how rich a nature, how wide an influence, how absolute a conscience, how perfect an integrity, how enduring a fame, how tender and affectionate a heart, belonged to the man who filled out those outlines to the full measure of a noble and heroic character! The only office he ever held was that of Senator from Massachusetts, and when he died he was the senior Senator in length of continuous service. His successive re-elections were carried by great waves of public sentiment; without bargains, without concealments, without pledges, except those of his life and known opinions, and without competitors.

For twenty-three years the record of his public life is the history of the country. He took part in all the great debates, and his name is indelibly associated with all the great results which that period has produced. And what accomplished results it was his privilege to see! How much of the great work and object of his life were attained before it closed!

When he entered the Senate there were but two others there of his political opinions. Before he died he was the leader of a majority of more than two-thirds of the body. He came there the advocate of impartial liberty throughout the land, the antagonist of slavery wherever it could be reached under the Constitution. He was treated as a detested fanatic, tried for months in vain to get a hearing, and was even refused a place on any committee, as "outside of any healthy political organization." He lived to see the adoption of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution, to be the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to see men of the proscribed color admitted to seats in both branches of Congress, and to know that he had the gratitude and affection of the race he had helped to emancipate, with the respect and confidence of the nation before whom he had pleaded that "nothing is safer than justice," and to whom he had contended that "nothing is settled that is not right."

His first public utterance was in favor of peace, and of the amicable settlement of differences among nations, which was contemptuously received as the dream of a visionary enthusiast. He lived to see the negotiation of the Treaty of Washington and its consummation in the arbitration at Geneva.

Mr. SUMNER was thoroughly and truly an American. He believed in his country, in her unity, her grandeur, her ideas, and her destiny. He had drank deep from the sources of American institutions in the writings and lives of our revolutionary fathers. He was an idealist, and trusted the future. To his far-reaching vision it was always true that—

> Every gift of noblest origin
> Is breathed upon by hope's perpetual breath.

His spirit was of the morning, and "his face was radiant with the sunrise he intently watched." He saw in the future of America a noble and puissant nation, its grand Constitution conformed to and construed by the grander declaration of 1776, purged of every stain and inconsistency, the home of the homeless, the refuge of the oppressed, the paradise of the poor, the example of honor, justice, peace, and freedom to the nations of the earth.

His personal integrity was so absolute that no breath of suspicion even ever sullied it. He said to a friend, "People talk about the corruption of Washington; I have lived here all these years and have seen nothing of it." He never had any tracks to cover up, or opinions or motives to conceal.

You remember well his commanding presence, his stalwart frame, six feet and four inches in height, the vigor and grace of his motions, the charm of his manners, the polish of his rhetoric, the abundance of his learning, the fervor and impressiveness of his oratory. He was every inch a Senator, and upheld with zeal and fidelity the dignity, privileges and authority of the Senate. He never seems to have known fear. His courage and power of resolute endurance were conspicuously shown in his undergoing the moxa, the application of hot irons the whole length of the spine, which his physician says was the most terrible torture he ever knew inflicted on man or animal, and which he bore without taking ether, because he was told that by so doing there was a little better prospect that the treatment would be efficacious.

There is no doubt that he died a martyr to the cause of liberty, and to the efforts which he would not relax in its behalf, as truly as they who fell on the field of stricken battle. The bludgeon preceded the bayonet and the bullet in that civil war which began long before 1861; and did its work of death as surely, if more slowly.

Of his private life, of his genial and liberal hospitality, of the strength and warmth of his friendships, of his curious stores of information, of his treasures of literature and art, of his tenderness and sweetness toward those who loved and trusted him, there is no time or need to speak in this place, on this occasion. But there are many of the pure and gentle, of the thoughtful and richly cultured, to whom the tidings of his death brought tender and precious memories of these things.

No doubt Mr. SUMNER had defects of character. I think he had little sense of humor, and some more of it might have been of service to him. He was an orator, and not a debater; and if he had had more of the training of the bar and the popular assembly, might perhaps sometimes have made a more direct and forcible impression upon those whom he sought to convince, and who were wearied with stately periods and inexhaustible learning. But some of his faults were closely allied to his virtues, and to the sources of his power. He was of an imperious nature, and intolerant of difference in opinion by his associates, and has been called an egotist. But all this came largely from the strength of his convictions; from his own belief in his own thoroughness of study and purity of purpose; from what has been happily described as his "sublime confidence in his own moral sagacity." He was terribly in earnest, and could not understand how others could fail to see what he saw so clearly.

It may indeed be true that in advancing age, and while striving to bear up and do his work under a terrible burden of shattered health and worn nerves, he made judgments which some of us have thought unjust, and severed associations which some of us would have gladly seen preserved.

But let me say for him, that I believe he carried to the grave as few resentments, as little animosity, as rarely is found in the hearts of men whose lives have been passed in scenes of public conflict. I saw him frequently and familiarly during the last four months of his life, and wish to give my testimony to the gentleness and kindliness of his temper during all that time, and to the fact that he uttered no word of harshness or censure in my hearing concerning any human being. It was noticeable and touching to observe, it is gratifying to remember, and I think it would have been pleasant to him to know that it would be here remembered of him.

But the time allowed me is short, and I must not withhold your attention from those who are to follow.

I cannot better sum up the character I have described than by adopting language which has been applied to the character of Milton:

> A high ideal purpose maintained, a function discharged through life with unwavering consistency; austerity, but the austerity not of monks but of heroes; incapable of depression, but also, as far as appears, incapable of mirth.

As I stood by the dying bed of him who was my friend for thirty years, and heard the repeated exclamation, "O, so tired! O, so weary!" the old hymn of the church seemed to be sounding in my ears:

> Yes, peace! for war is needless,
> Yes, calm! for storm is past;
> And rest from finished labor,
> And anchorage at last.

The weary are at rest! The good and faithful servant has entered into the joy of his Lord!

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, in rising to second the resolutions just offered, I desire to add a few remarks which have occurred to me as appropriate to the occasion. I believe that they express a sentiment which pervades the hearts of all the people whose Representatives are here assembled. Strange as in looking back upon the past the assertion may seem, impossible as it would have been ten years ago to make it, it is not the less true that to-day Mississippi regrets the death of CHARLES SUMNER and sincerely unites in paying honors to his memory. Not because of the splendor of his intellect, though in him was extinguished one of the brightest of the lights which have illustrated the councils of the Government for nearly a quarter of a century; not because of the high culture, the elegant scholarship, and the varied learning which revealed themselves so clearly in all his public efforts as to justify the application to him of Johnson's felicitous expression "he touched nothing which he did not adorn;" not this, though these are qualities by no means, it is to be feared, so common in public places as to make their disappearance, in even a single instance, a matter of indifference; but because of those peculiar and strongly marked moral traits of his character which gave the coloring to the whole tenor of his singularly dramatic public career; traits which made him for a long period to a large portion of his countrymen the object of as deep and passionate a hostility as to another he was one of enthusiastic admiration, and which are not the less the cause that now unites all these parties, ever so widely differing, in a common sorrow to-day over his lifeless remains.

It is of these high moral qualities which I wish to speak; for these have been the traits which in after years, as I have considered the successive acts and utterances of this remarkable man, fastened most strongly my attention, and impressed themselves most forcibly upon my imagination, my sensibilities, my heart. I leave to others to speak of his intellectual superiority, of those rare gifts with which nature had so lavishly endowed him, and of the power to use them which he had acquired by education. I say nothing of his vast and varied stores of historical knowledge, or of the wide extent of his reading in the elegant literature of ancient and modern times, or of his wonderful power of retaining what he had read, or of his readiness in drawing upon these fertile resources to illustrate his own arguments. I say nothing of his eloquence as an orator, of his skill as a logician, or of his powers of fascination in the unrestrained freedom of the social circle, which last it was my misfortune not to have experienced. These, indeed, were the qualities which gave him eminence not only in our country but throughout the world; and which have made the name of CHARLES SUMNER an integral part of our nation's glory. They were the qualities which gave to those moral traits of which I have spoken the power to impress themselves upon the history of the age and of civilization itself; and without which those traits, however intensely developed, would have exerted no influence beyond the personal circle immediately surrounding their possessor. More eloquent tongues than mine will do them justice. Let me speak of the characteristics which brought the illustrious Senator who has just passed away into direct and bitter antagonism for years with my own State and her sister States of the South.

CHARLES SUMNER was born with an instinctive love of freedom, and was educated from his earliest infancy to the belief that freedom is the natural and indefeasible right of every intelligent being having the outward form of man. In him in fact this creed seems to have been something more than a doctrine imbibed from teachers, or a result of education. To him it was a grand intuitive truth inscribed in blazing letters upon the tablet of his inner consciousness, to deny which would have been for him to deny that he himself existed. And along with this all-controlling love of freedom, he possessed a moral sensibility keenly intense and vivid, a conscientiousness which would never permit him to swerve by the breadth of a hair from what he pictured to himself as the path of duty. Thus were combined in him the characteristics which have in all ages given to religion her martyrs and to patriotism her self-sacrificing heroes.

To a man thoroughly permeated and imbued with such a creed, and animated and constantly actuated by such a spirit of devotion, to behold a human being or a race of human beings restrained of their natural rights to liberty, for no crime by him or them committed, was to feel all the belligerent instincts of his nature roused to combat. The fact was to him a wrong which no logic could justify. It mattered not how humble in the scale of rational existence the subject of this restraint might be, how dark his skin, or how dense his ignorance. Behind all that lay for him the great principle that liberty is the birthright of all humanity, and that every individual of every race who has a soul to save is entitled to the freedom which may enable him to work out his salvation. It matters not that the slave might be contented with his lot; that his actual condition might be immeasurably more desirable than that from which it had transplanted him; that it gave him physical comfort, mental and moral elevation and religious culture not possessed by his race in any other condition; that his bonds had not been placed upon his hands by the living generation; that the mixed social system of which he formed an element had been regarded by the fathers of the Republic, and by the ablest statesmen who had risen up after them, as too complicated to be broken up without danger to society, itself, or even to civilization; or finally, that the actual state of things had been recognized and explicitly sanctioned by the very organic law of the Republic. Weighty as these considerations might be, formidable as were the difficulties in the way of the practical enforcement of his great principle, he held none the less that it must sooner or later be enforced, though institutions and constitutions should have to give way alike before it. But here let me do this great man the justice which amid the excitements of the struggle between the sections, now past, I may have been disposed to deny him. In this fiery zeal and this earnest warfare against the wrong, as he viewed it, there entered no enduring personal animosity toward the men whose lot it was to be born to the system which he denounced.

It has been the kindness of the sympathy which in these later years he has displayed toward the impoverished and suffering people of the Southern States that has unveiled to me the generous and tender heart which beat beneath the bosom of the zealot, and has forced me to yield him the tribute of my respect, I might even say of my admiration. Nor in the manifestation of this has there been anything which a proud and sensitive people, smarting under a sense of recent discomfiture and present suffering, might not frankly accept, or which would give them just cause to suspect its sincerity. For though he raised his voice as soon as he believed the momentous issues of this great military conflict were decided in behalf of amnesty to the vanquished, and though he stood forward ready to welcome back as brothers and to re-establish in their rights as citizens those whose valor had so nearly riven asunder the Union which he loved, yet he always insisted that the most ample protection and the largest safeguards should be thrown around the liberties of the newly enfranchised African race. Though he knew very well that of his conquered fellow-citizens of the South by far the larger portion, even those who most heartily acquiesced in and desired the abolition of slavery, seriously questioned the expediency of investing in a single day and without any preliminary tutelage so vast a body of inexperienced and uninstructed men with the full rights of freemen and voters, he would tolerate no half-way measures upon a point to him so vital.

Indeed, immediately after the war, while other minds were occupying themselves with different theories of reconstruction, he did not hesitate to impress most emphatically upon the administration, not only in public, but in the confidence of private intercourse, his uncompromising resolution to oppose to the last any and every scheme which should fail to provide the surest guarantees for the personal freedom and political rights of the race which he had undertaken to protect. Whether his measures to secure this result showed him to be a practical statesman or a theoretical enthusiast is a question on which any decision we may pronounce to-day must await the inevitable revision of posterity. The spirit of magnanimity, therefore, which breathes in his utterances and manifests itself in all his acts affecting the South during the last two years of his life, was as evidently honest as it was grateful to the feelings of those to whom it was displayed.

It was certainly a gracious act toward the South—though unhappily it jarred upon the sensibilities of the people at the other extreme of the Union and estranged from him the great body of his political friends—to propose to erase from the banners of the national Army the mementoes of the bloody internecine struggle, which might be regarded as assailing the pride or wounding the sensibilities of the southern people. That proposal will never be forgotten by that people so long as the name of CHARLES SUMNER lives in the memory of man. But while it touched the heart of the South and elicited her profound gratitude, her people would not have asked of the North such an act of self-renunciation.

Conscious that they themselves were animated by devotion to constitutional liberty, and that the brightest pages of history are replete with evidences of the depth and sincerity of that devotion, they can but cherish the recollections of sacrifices endured, the battles fought and the victories won in defense of their hapless cause. And respecting, as all true and brave men must respect, the martial spirit with which the men of the North vindicated the integrity of the Union and their devotion to the principles of human freedom, they do not ask, they do not wish, the North to strike the mementoes of her heroism and victory from either records or monuments or battle-flags. They would rather that both sections should gather up the glories won by each section, not envious, but proud of each other, and regard them a common heritage of American valor.

Let us hope that future generations, when they remember the deeds of heroism and devotion done on both sides, will speak not of northern prowess or southern courage, but of the heroism, fortitude, and courage of Americans in a war of ideas—a war in which each section signalized its consecration to the principles, as each understood them, of American liberty and of the Constitution received from their fathers.

It was my misfortune, perhaps my fault, personally never to have known this eminent philanthropist and statesman. The impulse was often strong upon me to go to him and offer him my hand and my heart with it, and to express to him my thanks for his kind and considerate course toward the people with whom I am identified. If I did not yield to that impulse it was because the thought occurred that other days were coming in which such a demonstration might be more opportune and less liable to misconstruction. Suddenly, and without premonition, a day has come at last to which, for such a purpose, there is no to-morrow.

My regret is therefore intensified by the thought that I failed to speak to him out of the fullness of my heart while there was yet time.

How often is it that death thus brings unavailingly back to our remembrance opportunities unimproved; in which generous overtures, prompted by the heart, remain unoffered; frank avowals which rose to the lips remain unspoken; and the injustice and wrong of bitter resentments remain unrepaired! CHARLES SUMNER in life believed that all occasion for strife and distrust between the North and South had passed away, and there no longer remained any cause for continued estrangement between these two sections of our common country. Are there not many of us who believe the same thing? Is not that the common sentiment, or if it is not ought it not to be, of the great mass of our people North and South? Bound to each other by a common Constitution, destined to live together under a common Government, forming unitedly but a single member of the great family of nations, shall we not now at last endeavor to grow toward each other once more in heart as we are already indissolubly linked to each other in fortunes? Shall we not, over the honored remains of this great champion of human liberty, this feeling sympathizer with human sorrow, this earnest pleader for the exercise of human tenderness and charity, lay aside the concealments which serve only to perpetuate misunderstandings and distrust, and frankly confess that on both sides we most earnestly desire to be one; one not merely in political organization; one not merely in identity of institutions; one not merely in community of language and literature and traditions and country; but, more and better than all that, one also in feeling and in heart? Am I mistaken in this?

Do the concealments of which I speak still cover animosities which neither time nor reflection nor the march of events have yet sufficed to subdue? I cannot believe it. Since I have been here I have watched with anxious scrutiny your sentiments as expressed not merely in public debate, but in the abandon of personal confidence. I know well the sentiments of these my southern brothers, whose hearts are so infolded that the feeling of each is the feeling of all; and I see on both sides only the seeming of a constraint which each apparently hesitates to dismiss. The South—prostrate, exhausted, drained of her life-blood as well as of her material resources, yet still honorable and true—accepts the bitter award of the bloody arbitrament without reservation, resolutely determined to abide the result with chivalrous fidelity; yet, as if struck dumb by the magnitude of her reverses, she suffers on in silence.

The North, exultant in her triumph and elated by success, still cherishes, as we are assured, a heart full of magnanimous emotions toward her disarmed and discomfited antagonist; and yet, as if mastered by some mysterious spell, silencing her better impulses, her words and acts are the words and acts of suspicion and distrust.

Would that the spirit of the illustrious dead whom we lament to-day could speak from the grave to both parties to this deplorable discord in tones which should reach each and every heart throughout this broad territory, "My countrymen, know one another, and you will love one another."

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, by virtue of resolutions just adopted, the ordinary business of Congress is suspended.

We pause to recognize the presence of death in our midst, that mysterious power which walketh unseen, whose tread is unheard, but whose work is daily and hourly bringing anguish to some bereaved family circle. We pause to pay tribute to the memory of one of the most distinguished of American legislators.

SUMNER is dead! His native Massachusetts, that good old Commonwealth, mourns. Faneuil Hall is clothed in the habiliments of woe. But Massachusetts mourns not alone. Her sister States are here to-day mingling their tears with her tears.

His labors were not confined to his own State; his work embraced the whole Union. The cause of humanity throughout the world enlisted his active sympathy, and in every portion of our ocean-girt Republic, and in every clime where Freedom has a votary, tears are dropped to his memory.

Those who have preceded me on this occasion have, more ably than I could, spoken of his early life and its reminiscences, of his literary and professional studies and of his equal attachment to both, of his early success in the profession of his choice, demonstrating at once that if he had continued to walk in that path he should have attained its highest honors, as he subsequently attained the highest honors of statesmanship.

A devoted student, possessing a strong and vigorous mind, enriched with scholastic and scientific research in almost every department of human knowledge—with him success was the certain and legitimate offspring of an effort to succeed.

In 1851 he was chosen to the Senate of the United States, which position he held thence continuously to the day of his death. Soon after being officially informed of his appointment, he addressed a letter to the Legislature of Massachusetts from which I present an extract eminently characteristic of the man, and indicating his high estimate of the duties thus devolved upon him, and the spirit in which these duties should be discharged:

> Your appointment finds me in a private station with which I am entirely content. For the first time in my life I am called to political office. * * * I accept it as the servant of Massachusetts, mindful of the sentiments solemnly uttered by her successive Legislatures—of the genius which inspired her history, and of the men, her perpetual pride and ornament, who breathed into her that breath of liberty which early made her an example to her sister States. * * * I accept it as the servant of the Union, bound to study and maintain with equal patriotic care the interests of all parts of our country, to discountenance every effort to lessen any of those ties by which our fellowship of States is held in fraternal company, and to oppose all sectionalism, whether it appear in unconstitutional efforts by the North to carry so great a boon as freedom into the slave States, or in unconstitutional efforts by the South, aided by northern allies, to carry the sectional evil of slavery into the free States, or in whatsoever efforts it may make to extend the sectional domination of slavery over the national Government.

He was chosen because the public sentiment of Massachusetts indicated him as a fit successor to her greatest statesman; and twenty-three years of faithful and distinguished service in the Senate has fully demonstrated the wisdom of that sentiment, while throughout his long senatorial career his countrymen by general consent accorded him the once proud Roman title of "Primus inter illustres."

He entered the Senate at a time when his political opinions had few supporters, either in or out of the Senate; when, to use a phrase of the times, he was "outside of any healthy political organization," and when ridicule, satire, opprobrium, and even social ostracism, were visited upon anti-slavery men.

In 1860 he was placed on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and on the 4th of March, 1861, became its chairman. This position, at all times one of great responsibility, especially so on account of the important and delicate functions pertaining to the Senate in connection with the treaty-making power of the Government, became vastly more important in consequence of the rebellion then about being inaugurated.

It is hardly necessary for me to add that his acquirements in the field of general literature, his thorough knowledge of the science of the law, and especially that branch pertaining to the "law of nations," qualified him in a peculiar manner to discharge ably and intelligently the duties thus devolving upon him.

The war for the suppression of the rebellion involved many intricate and important questions in connection with foreign governments, requiring for their consideration and solution the utmost skill and prudence. During that eventful period SUMNER was on most confidential terms with Secretary Seward, and the distinguished Secretary and no less distinguished Senator were in constant consultation over those questions.

The wisdom which characterized our foreign intercourse during this most trying period in our history, and the ability with which the rights of the Government were maintained and serious complications avoided, attest equally the importance of those consultations and the eminent statesmanship of these two distinguished citizens.

In these labors he seems to have adhered strictly to those cardinal principles adopted at an early period of our diplomatic history, "to avoid all entangling alliances with foreign nations;" "to demand nothing but what is right, and submit to nothing that is wrong."

His senatorial career attests that in no just sense of the term was he ever a partisan, but co-operated with party organization only so far as he believed such organization to be essential to the accomplishment of his great purpose.

That purpose, which was the leading principle of his life, was to secure beyond doubt or contingency "the equality of the human race," and with him it became the "star of his destiny," the "sun of his Austerlitz." He frequently expressed this principle sententiously, as "equality of rights is the first of all rights," "equality before the law;" and this purpose became a part of his very nature; as it were, bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh. It was this which led him to believe and to act upon the belief that all men should be free, that freedom should encircle the earth like its atmosphere; that in every clime the chains of slavery should be broken, and that everywhere man created in the image of his Maker should stand erect and unshackled, the peer of his neighbor in the presence of God, who has so solemnly proclaimed that He "is no respecter of persons."

The blighting curse of slavery clouded and tarnished, alas! too long, our national escutcheon. Serpent-like it crawled into the very citadel of American liberty, and coiled its slimy folds around the pillars of the Constitution, infusing its poison into the life-blood of the Republic, and striking, as with the touch of paralysis, alike all classes of our people and every department of the Government.

To destroy this monster was the enthusiastically assumed life-task of SUMNER, engrossing all his thoughts, enlisting all his energies. To the accomplishment of this task he subordinated every other consideration, devoting to it all his time, his great talents, and his varied learning. His unceasing vigilance was equal to all the devices and strategy of the enemy, who, baffled at one point and retreating to another, was still pursued and pressed and scourged. He met boldness with boldness, audacity with firmness, and sophistry with the principles of eternal truth. The battle was long-continued and often waged with apparently unequal forces, but SUMNER faltered not; he had counted the cost from the beginning, and had an abiding faith that, with the God of Freedom on his side, complete and enduring victory was only a question of time; and strengthened and animated by that faith he was willing to bide that time.

Victory came, as God willed it should come, amid war, and fire, and blood; amid the convulsive throes of a nation struggling for existence; it came while unnumbered graves were being filled with the sad remains of some of the best and bravest of our countrymen; and that victory is forever imbedded as with adamant in the Constitution in these words of living light:

> Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Thus was the monster slain; and amid his death-struggle, and his dying groans, four millions of the victims of his power rose, unshackled and unfettered, and with prayers and songs of thanksgiving praised the God of Freedom for their deliverance.

Slavery was destroyed and freedom obtained, but SUMNER saw that freedom was not secure without equality of rights, and he at once addressed himself to the duty devolving upon the statesman as an inevitable consequence of the recent struggle. This portion of our history is so freshly engraven on the public mind that a mere allusion to it is all-sufficient. The removal of odious disabilities incident to the law of slavery, the granting of civil rights to those recently emancipated, and the conferring upon them political privileges and franchises, were events which followed each other in rapid and natural succession. But these acts were not accomplished without serious and closely contested struggles, for the prejudices engendered by slavery did not die with slavery, and in all these struggles SUMNER was a most prominent and a most able leader.

As "equality before the law" was the leading principle of his whole life, so it most naturally and fitly engrossed his dying moments, and almost his last words on earth were an injunction to a valued friend, "Take care of my civil-rights bill."

With such a life, filled with such deeds, is it a wonder that his death has called forth such universal regret and sympathy? Is it a wonder that the colored man, whose cause he served so well and for whose rights he struggled so successfully, should be among the first at his death-bed and among the last at his grave?

Is it a wonder that throughout the land the colored men should "regard his death with all the bitterness of a personal bereavement," and "owe to his memory a lasting debt of gratitude?" Is it a wonder that in the lowly dwellings of the freedmen tears of bitterness should course down the furrowed cheeks of the former slave, who perchance was never permitted to look upon his face, but who remembers his benefactor and teaches his children to reverence the name and fame of CHARLES SUMNER?

Mr. Speaker, years ago New England's poet of freedom addressed to the memory of a co-laborer in freedom's cause words which can appropriately be repeated on this occasion:

O loved of thousands! to thy grave,
Sorrowing of heart, thy brethren bore thee;
The poor man and the rescued slave
Wept, as the broken earth closed o'er thee;
And grateful tears like summer rain,
Quickened its dying grass again!
And there, as to some pilgrim shrine,
Shall come the outcast and the lowly,
Of gentle deeds and words of thine,
Recalling memories sweet and holy!

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, not long since we were called upon to lay aside our accustomed duties of legislation to participate in the mournful procession that signalized the departure of the distinguished statesman and philanthropist who has been summoned before the bar of our final Judge. We have again halted to pay further tribute to his memory and intrinsic worth.

The announcement of the death of CHARLES SUMNER, late Senator from the State of Massachusetts, sent a thrill of sorrow and cast a shade of melancholy gloom over this country more pervading in its general effects than any similar event since the assassination of the lamented Lincoln. Language such as I have at my command is too imperfect and feeble to convey in adequate terms the high estimation in which he was held, or to express fully and feelingly the depth of grief his demise has occasioned. Men and women mourn his loss and shed the tear of regretful sadness, not only in large cities and the palatial dwellings occupied by the learned and wealthy, but in villages and hamlets, upon farms and the distant plantations of the South; into the cabins of the unlettered and the lowly, bereavement found its way, bowing the hearts of all in mournful lamentation for this irreparable loss. Mr. SUMNER, in name and deeds, is known, revered, and esteemed by all classes of our people. The remarkable and noble battles of argument and eloquence which he has fought in the Senate in behalf of the oppressed, have enshrined him in the hearts of his countrymen, millions of whom never beheld his majestic form, nor heard his deep and impressive voice—that voice which at no time indulged silence when the cause of the downtrodden and the enslaved was the issue.

Early in life Mr. SUMNER espoused the cause of those who were not able to speak for themselves, and whose bondage made it hazardous for any one else to venture a word in their behalf. No one knew the danger and magnitude of such an undertaking better than the deceased. Public sentiment at that time was opposed to his course; ostracism confronted him; friends forsook him; but undaunted and full of courage he pursued the right, sustained his convictions, and lived long enough to see the fruition of his earnest labors. He was among the first to arouse the Commonwealth of his beloved Massachusetts to consider the justice and equity of mixed schools. The blows he gave were effectual; the separating walls could not withstand them; they consequently tottered and fell. The doors of the school-houses flew open to all; prejudice was well-nigh consumed by the blaze of his ardent eloquence, and proscription gave way to more liberal views. It was upon his motion that the first colored man was admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States.

These remarks are made to show that the cause of my race was always foremost in his mind; indeed, he was a friend who in many instances stuck closer than a brother. He was one of those who never slumbered upon his lance, but stood ever watchful for the opportunity to hurl the shaft of his forensic powers against the institution of slavery. The forum, the platform, and the legislative hall bear equal testimony to his untiring zeal and determined opposition thereto.

The barbarities and atrocities of slavery, through the aid of his giant mind, were brought to the attention of the American people and the world in a manner and style hitherto unknown. He was God's chosen advocate of freedom and denouncer of the crime of the "peculiar institution" which blurred the fair record and threatened ultimately to destroy the growing fame of his country. So attractive, instructive, and inviting was his mode of argument, that even those who opposed him most strenuously were constrained to "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest" his utterances. This was doubtless owing in a great measure to his rare talents and acquirements, and the splendid opportunity he enjoyed of speaking to the country

Mr. SUMNER was a patriot of no ordinary rank. He was a lover of his country, the whole country, in the broadest and the most comprehensive signification of the term. Whatever he did to hinder the extension of slavery or to hasten the day of its final abolition, was based not upon hatred or antipathy to the South, but upon a conviction that it was not only wrong to humanity, but an accursed blot upon the escutcheon of the Republic. He knew full well that it would tarnish the beauty of its history; therefore he felt the duty pressing to combat it. In a word, he did not hate the South nor the slaveholder, but he hated and detested slavery. His desire was that the South as well as the North should share in the real grandeur of this republican empire. He was aware that the impartial historian could not complete his task so long as slavery existed, unless the pen, as it were, was dipped in human blood; the thought of which to him was revolting. O that the South had heeded his admonition and let the oppressed go free! As a statesman, Mr. SUMNER may have allowed his zeal to outrun his discretion, and thus made mistakes.

To err is human; to forgive, divine.

It was evident, however, that his errors ever leaned to the side of justice and humanity. He could not comprehend any fundamental law that did not embrace in its provisions the cause of the poor and the needy; consequently his construction of the Constitution differed in many essential particulars from that put upon it by other statesmen, who were less liberal in their opinions and more partial and biased in their judgment. He was strong to his convictions, faithful to duty, and true to his country. How appropriate are the following lines in tracing his active and useful life:

Staunch at thy post, to meet life's common doom,
It scarce seems death to die as thou hast died;
Thy duty done, thy truth, strength, courage tried,
And all things ripe for the fulfilling tomb!

A crown would mock thy hearse's sable gloom,
Whose virtues raised thee higher than a throne,
Whose faults were erring Nature's, not his own,—
Such be thy sentence, writ with Fame's bright plume,
Amongst the good and great; for thou wast great,
In thought, word, deed—like mightiest ones of old,—
Full of the honest truth, which makes men bold,
Wise, pure, firm, just; the noblest Roman's state
Became not more a ruler of the free
Than thy plain life, high thoughts, and matchless constancy.

Compared to his admirers Mr. SUMNER's circle of intimate friends was not very numerous. Only a few genial spirits imparted to him social pleasure and mental enjoyment. He found his chief delight in the companionship of books and the study of the fine arts. But with this rare appreciation for the classic and the artistic, he possessed in an astonishing degree the faculty of adapting himself to social intercourse with those whose attainments were not commensurate with his own. He was always willing to receive such as visited him, seeking counsel or advice, without regard to present circumstances or former condition. His friendship, when formed, was sincere and advantageous. I did myself the honor to call upon him occasionally; not as often, however, as I felt inclined, for I knew that his time was valuable, not only to himself, but to his country. Never did I call but I found him glad to see me and ready to lay aside constantly-exacting duties, and engage in such conversation as invariably resulted in my being benefited. It was very perceptible that the aim and bent of his master-mind was to elevate to true manhood the race with which I am particularly identified. I can never forget so long as I have the faculty of recollection the warm and friendly grasp he gave my hand soon after I was admitted a member of this House. On my first visit to the Senate he said: "I welcome you to this Chamber. Come over frequently; you have rights here as well others."

During his senatorial career, embracing a period of twenty-three years, he has contended for a moral principle against enemies more daring and intrepid, perhaps, than any other man has encountered in the same space of time. This principle was to him more dear than life itself. His conscientious conviction that slavery was a national crime and moral sin could not endure tamely assertions to the contrary. He heeded not the menacing denunciations of those "who eat the bread of wickedness, and drink the wine of violence." Their execrations could not move nor intimidate him. Finding these instruments of wickedness could not deter him or turn the keen edge of his argument, he was brutally and cowardly assaulted in the Senate Chamber, in 1856, by Preston S. Brooks, a Representative from South Carolina. This occurred a few days after his masterly effort setting forth the "Crimes against Kansas."

Mr. Speaker, that unprovoked assault declared to the country the threatening attitude of the two sections, one against the other, and awakened a determination on the part of the North to resist the encroachments of slavery. The unexpressed sympathy that was felt for him among the slaves of the South, when they heard of this unwarranted attack, was only known to those whose situations at the time made them confidants. Their prayers and secret importunities were ever uttered in the interest of him who was their constant friend and untiring advocate and defender before the high court of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church." With equal truthfulness and force, I think it may be said that the blood of CHARLES SUMNER, spilled upon the floor of the Senate because he dared to oppose the slave power of the South and to interpose in the path of its progress, was the seed that produced general emancipation; the result of which is too well known to need comment. It spoke silently, but effectively, of the cruelty and iniquities of that abominable institution.

Notwithstanding that dastardly assault, his valor was not cooled, neither was his determination abated to resist the advancing steps of that power which was the source of so much distraction to the Republic and disgrace to the nineteenth century. Sir, I believe in a Providence that shapes events and controls circumstances. His hand is most conspicuously seen in the life and death of the lamented Senator. Though he was a martyr to the cause of freedom and universal liberty, he nevertheless lived long enough to see the struggles of his eventful public life crowned with victory, and the broken shackles of the slave scattered at his feet, before he was gathered to his fathers. The emancipated and enfranchised will pay grateful homage to his memory in life, and dying bequeath the name of him who was their benefactor as a befitting one for the reverence and adoration of posterity.

Farewell! if ever fondest prayer
For others' weal availed on high,
Ours will not be lost in air,
But waft thy name beyond the sky.

Mr. Speaker, the intentness of his thought on the subject of his mission, for which apparently he was born, clung to him to the ebbing moments of his life. When weary and longing for rest, having his eyes fixed upon that "mansion not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," and just preceding his final step over the threshold of time into the boundless space of eternity, he uttered in dying accents, yet with an eloquence more persuasive and impressive than ever, these words: "Do not let the civil-rights bill fail!"

How remarkable the connecting incidents of his history! This is particularly apparent when we recall the fact that he began as an advocate of human rights, continued through an eventful career the same, and closing his last hours on earth, facing the judgment-seat of the very God, he looked back for a moment and repeated these words, which will be ever memorable, "DO NOT LET THE CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL FAIL!"

This sentence, we trust, will prove more potent and availing in securing equality before the law for all men than any of his former efforts. This is not the proper time, neither is the occasion propitious, for further comment on that dying appeal. I therefore with trembling hands and a grateful heart lay it gently in the lap of the muses, that it may be wrought into imperishable history as an additional evidence of his sincerity in life and his devotion to the grand principle of equal rights even in the embrace of death. He can never be repaid for the services he has rendered the Republic. No libation, adoration, or sacrifice can equal the beneficence and magnitude of the services he has rendered his country and mankind.

As for my race and me, his memory will ever be precious to us. We will embalm it among the choicest gems of our recollection. Yes;

> Let laurels, drench'd in pure Parnassian dews,
> Reward his memory, dear to every muse,
> Who, with a courage of unshaken root,
> In honor's field advancing his firm foot,
> Plants it upon the line that Justice draws,
> And will prevail or perish in her cause.
> 'T is to the virtues of such men man owes
> His portion in the good that Heaven bestows.

Now, sir, my grateful task is done. This humble but heartfelt tribute I lay at the base of the broken column in token of him who was an eminent statesman, renowned philanthropist, and devoted friend to the friendless. "May he rest in peace."

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, it is from no lack of eulogy or tribute already fitly spoken by stricken Massachusetts that I seek to be heard on this occasion. But, longer than any other of her representatives here at the Capitol, it has been my good fortune to have been associated with Mr. SUMNER in the public service and to stand by him as a colleague in the representation of that State. He had served a full term in the Senate when I entered this House more than seventeen years ago. I had met him here in his very first session, which was in fact the commencement of his public life; for that public life, when measured by the limitation of years, began and ended with his service as a Senator of the United States from Massachusetts. No man can justly estimate that great public career which has so suddenly and sadly closed, who fails to comprehend the times which gave it birth, and the events out of which its grand proportions have been rounded into matchless perfection and power. How much they developed him, and he them, belongs to the historian and biographer and not to the eulogist.

The life and times of CHARLES SUMNER will be a chapter in the world's history, standing out all alone and by itself. To the latest day that it will be read of men there will be found in it nothing ordinary, but, from its inception to its close, everything was cast in a mold which had no prototype, and on a scale by which nothing else has been measured. If we go back from the grand consummation to the beginning there will be found the same extraordinary conditions which have attended every step of his great career upward and onward to its end. He had never held public office till he entered the Senate Chamber in December, 1851. Calhoun had died in the previous year and both Clay and Webster in the year which followed. As Mr. SUMNER entered the arena made illustrious by the great struggles of the giants of that day, and sought his own position in coming conflicts, Mr. Benton said to him:

> You have come upon the stage too late, sir; all our great men have passed away. Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster are gone. Not only have the great men passed away, but the great issues too, raised from our form of government and of deepest interest to its founders and their immediate descendants, have been settled also. The last of these was the National Bank, and that has been overthrown forever. Nothing is left you, sir, but puny sectional questions and petty strifes about slavery and fugitive-slave laws involving no national interests.

How limited is human vision! The great men and the then great issues with which they wrestled filled, as they were receding from his view, the whole horizon of a statesman whose own participation in public affairs covered in that very forum the unparalleled period of thirty years. But as men sometimes build better than they know, so more often do they build in a way and tread a path they know not of.

Calhoun, and Clay, and Webster, did, indeed, pass away. But the sun which seemed to set with them rose again, almost simultaneously, with a new and a grander glory. And there was no night. Seward and Chase and SUMNER stood up in the places made vacant by those mighty intellects. And issues more momentous and far-reaching than ever before confronted statesmanship sprung up under their very feet, and out of the ashes of struggles vainly supposed to have become extinct.

The world's history furnishes no parallel to the pages which shall truthfully chronicle the character and consequences of the conflicts into which slavery and fugitive-slave laws hurled the nation almost from the hour of this lamentation over repose. And the young Senator from Massachusetts had no occasion to wait for opportunity. He was summoned to the very front of the conflict, and, without hesitation or delay, took the position which conviction of duty as well as public exigency assigned him. If therefore it had been permitted to Mr. SUMNER, standing at the goal and looking back along the years of his labor, with all that increased knowledge and wider experience, that wealth of philanthropy and expansion of heart which crowned his last days—had it then been permitted him to choose, could he have selected a moment more fit or crowded with grander opportunities for the enlistment of his vast and varied powers than the one which called him to his work? Hardly had he entered upon it before he received upon his own person the concentrated malignity of that barbarous system of society with which he grappled, in blows the effects of which never left him, but which, failing to silence, consecrated him to the sublime mission he so grandly filled.

That work thus begun had many phases, and led him along many ways which sometimes, for the moment, seemed devious, and which ofttimes compelled him to invoke instrumentalities pronounced doubtful by the bystander. But all the while it grew upon his hands—it broadened and it deepened—towering above and dwarfing all other work which fell to the lot of other statesmen. Grand in its very simplicity, sublime in its very comprehensiveness, it enlisted the noblest aspirations of the statesman and lifted his whole being into an atmosphere and life and vigor all its own.

ABSOLUTE HUMAN EQUALITY secured, assured, and invulnerable was the work to which with a baptism of blood and suffering he consecrated all his powers, all his life, and all his hopes. In that work he himself grew great. Around about it, as a center, all the attributes of his mind and elements of his character, called into active service and put to constant task, were developed, till like the one muscle of the blacksmith's right arm they attained a growth and strength unlike all others.

He was an eloquent man. But through all his rhetoric gleamed the battle-ax, cleaving the chains of the slave and beating down the hoary head of caste. His orations were not set with diamonds nor decked with flowers, but they thundered along the unbending track of logic irresistible and crushing. They had one purpose, the consummation of his life-work, and he in them marshaled the whole artillery of rhetoric and of speech for the assault. Learning he acquired as no other man in public life, but he devoted it all to this his one great struggle; and while he levied upon ancient lore and modern research alike for illustration, for argument, for admonition, and for encouragement, it was only as for so many recruits to the forces he commanded in a life-campaign against human bondage. Thus it is that his public addresses, with few exceptions, stand as monuments both of his own power as an orator and of the transcendent work to which his whole life had been set apart. Yet on those rare occasions when he permitted himself as if in relaxation to indulge in current debate or in popular address, he has left ample evidence that his mind was richly endowed with all those rare gifts of oratory which have in all times charmed, instructed, and swayed the popular mind. Some of these orations are masterly productions, of wide-spread fame.

To speak of the work itself to which Mr. SUMNER set apart his life, and for which he laid it down, would be to attempt not only the history of his country from his entrance into public life to the hour when his labors ceased, but also that of human rights and human equality the world over. This cannot be attempted here. Happily it is not needed to complete the duty of the hour. That work, once derided, denounced, scoffed at, and spit upon, has now conquered all opposition and to-day commands a support well-nigh universal. There remains no forum in which its justice is debated, and no home or heart so lowly that its efficacy does not reach it. It was not permitted him to see the formal enactment of a civil-rights bill he had so long labored and waited for. But he knew that this keystone of the grand arch was already fitted to its place. What he suffered, what he sacrificed, what he lifted and carried to the end of all things on earth to him, in the hope that his own work might be completed by his own hand, cannot now be put in words.

I have said that Mr. SUMNER was sometimes misunderstood. I speak not now of that common lot of public men which subjects them to the misrepresentations and denunciations of opponents often as indiscriminate as unjust. There is a more trying ordeal, when the vision of friends becomes dim, and familiar faces turn away for a time in doubt and distrust. Then the statesman who is faithful to his convictions will wait patiently and silently in the path of duty till, the mist lifting and the light breaking in, the blinded see again the outline of that pathway and hail anew his advancing footsteps. Thus recently his own beloved Commonwealth, proud and long-trusting as she is, yet for a moment losing her vision in a bewildering twilight, turned her face away from Mr. SUMNER and his work. Not a word of complaint fell from his lips. Conscious of a lofty and noble aspiration, and with an unfaltering faith that time would bring him vindication, he waited patiently for the dawn of a brighter day and the opening of a clearer vision. They came at last, but only just in time to save her, in this her day of mourning, the added pang of unatoned injustice.

I have no space to speak of those varied accomplishments, that wealth of knowledge, and that kindliness of heart which were the charm of his social life. But I desire to put on record my deep obligations for an unbroken friendship of seventeen years, begun in a common public service, and interrupted only by that great event which has alike crushed private friendships and social ties, and brought irreparable loss upon the public service, the country, and mankind.

Mr. SUMNER reared his own monument and has left it complete.

It will stand peerless through all the ages that free government and human equality shall exist on the earth. An enslaved race, lifted to freedom, to citizenship, and to equal rights, will crown it with the garlands of fresh effort and victorious struggle toward a completed manhood. The Commonwealth whose son he was, and whose commission he bore, will cherish tenderly his memory, and point proudly to the name which is at once history and inspiration.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, but that I have been requested to do so I should be unwilling to detain the House by adding any words of mine to the general expression of regret at the great national loss we all so deeply deplore.

My acquaintance with Mr. SUMNER, sir, only began during the Forty-first Congress. I was never intimate with him. But when I first met him he spoke to me of my father, whom he had known, with such warmth and feeling as always endeared him to me. I sometimes had the pleasure of seeing him at my house, sometimes of visiting him at his. Those great powers and acquirements which made him so distinguished in public life united with his large experience, ripe learning, and varied cultivation to make him charming in private life. To me he seemed never more so than in his own house, where he had collected about him so many souvenirs of travel and of taste, and was surrounded by so much that was best in literature and art and culture. His grand presence, his manners, always so far as I observed dignified but courteous, his recollections rich in knowledge of books, of men, and of events, his independence of thought and gifts of expression, all served to make me recall him as one of the most distinguished and impressive men it was ever my privilege to meet.

Mr. SUMNER began public life with strong convictions; convictions in which he was supported by the sympathy of his people and the action of his State. They were convictions that brought him into bitter and long-continued conflict with the leading men of the day—a conflict which ended only with the changes wrought by the late civil war, and the intensity of which may well have tended to limit the nature and range of his efforts and services. That throughout this conflict he bore himself earnestly, boldly, and efficiently, with an entire devotion to his convictions and an honorable disregard of personal consequences, even those who differed from him admit; and that in the end he was not wanting either in a large liberality or in a magnanimity alike generous and wise, all should gratefully remember.

With Mr. SUMNER'S training and powers there were many walks of usefulness and success open to him; but he preferred giving up the profession he had so well begun, to devote himself through life to the public service. After long years of arduous and important labor he died, leaving behind him but a slender estate, having received for all his service no other reward than the good he had achieved and the honor which attended it. Although he founded and built up a great and successful party, no man ever accused him of profiting by his pursuit of politics. His name was connected with no job, mixed with no share in doubtful profits, stained by no scandal. Called away suddenly in all the fullness of his powers, so that the very day before his death he seemed to me as grand, as useful, and as genial as ever, he left public life as he entered it—with clean hands and unsullied name.

Such service is always patriotic and useful. But as the country increases and its numbers and interests become greater and more conflicting, the need for men of intelligence and culture willing to give their attention to public affairs without personal profit increases also. In a small and sparse community government is easy; but when numbers grow great and men crowd upon each other, so that each must surrender to others some portion of his natural rights, the difficulties of government begin. With our increasing wealth and growing population and crowded cities and varied industries, our need of men willing and able to permanently devote themselves, without hope of gain, to the duties of government becomes yearly more and more pressing.

All of that this distinguished man did. With a fidelity worthy of every praise, with a diligence not exceeded by any man in public life, for more than twenty years he gave up his great powers and learning and acquirements to the public service with a purity, a zeal, and an ability, which, however men may differ as to the soundness or breadth of his views, entitle him to the honor and the praise of all, whatever their political faith, who respect patriotic and distinguished service. For, Mr. Speaker, in a nation so vast as this men must needs differ, and differ widely, in respect of government; and the citizen who gives to the nation his best service, according to the light that he has, does all that is permitted to him, and deserves, indeed, well of his country.

Mr. SUMNER'S share in public life was during a time of conflict and of revolution, followed, happily, by peace and almost general material prosperity; but followed, too, by circumstances which call now as much, perhaps, as ever for large and statesman-like qualities, for careful consideration of the true principles of government and of those changes in our system which the altered political and physical condition of the country have made necessary. That great Commonwealth which so honored him, and which he so long and so faithfully represented, will, indeed, be fortunate if she shall find other sons ready to worthily bear up the torch this great Senator held so long aloft to light the way for the national progress, and which at the last he let fall only with his life.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, when on the 4th of July, 1861, I first took the oath of office as a member of Congress, my then venerable colleague, the late Thaddeus Stevens, was the acknowledged leader of the House. He had been a life-long foe to slavery; and such was his hostility to the spirit of caste, that he was unwilling that his protest against it should terminate with his life, and by provisions in his will directed that his body should be interred in an obscure cemetery in the suburbs of the city he had so long represented, and that his resting-place should be marked by a simple stone bearing these characteristic words:

I repose in this quiet and secluded spot, not from any natural preference for solitude, but finding other cemeteries limited by charter rules as to race, I have chosen it that I might be enabled to illustrate in my death the principles which I have advocated through a long life—equality of man before his Creator.

Owen Lovejoy, whose moral heroism had long commanded my admiration, was the member of the House for whose name I listened with most interest when the roll was called, that I might see the person of him who had with such burning eloquence defied the slave-power in this House and elsewhere. John P. Hale and CHARLES SUMNER were then in the Senate, from which William H. Seward and Salmon P. Chase had recently withdrawn—the former to enter upon the duties of the office of Secretary of State, and the latter upon those of Secretary of the Treasury. None of them are among the living now; each, having closed the work appointed to him, has gone to his reward. Great and good as these men were, they were not faultless. He who had been would not have been a man. But the world is better for the life of each of them. Their labors and example improved our moral and political atmosphere, and though they have been withdrawn from our presence, their influence is scarcely less potent now than it was when they responded to the call of President Lincoln, and in their respective spheres devoted themselves to the maintenance of the Army and Navy that were to suppress the rebellion and invest with all the rights pertaining to American citizenship the lowliest slave in the land.

Mr. SUMNER was the last survivor of this illustrious group. He hoped for the early passage of a bill the provisions of which should enable all men to maintain and enforce their civil rights as the completion of their joint life-work. Had he lived to see such a bill enrolled among our statutes he might well have expressed the completeness of his gratification in the often-quoted exclamation of Simeon of old.

How conspicuous a part Mr. SUMNER took in the legislation of Congress during his long senatorial career others have told. It was such as has been permitted to few men, and yet I have often thought that he would have more largely affected the sentiment and conscience of the country had he never been involved in the active and exhausting duties of the Senate. It has seemed to me that he was too much devoted to letters and too intensely wedded to abstract sentiment to be either an influential statesman or a successful politician; that he was too cosmopolitan in his statesmanship to influence current policies, and too little of a politician to be a successful statesman. The readiness with which he accepted broad and generous propositions, which in terms promised beneficent results, led him to disregard the influence of details which in the complicated web and woof of human life often thwart the application of general laws; and I have never doubted that the prevalence of his theories of trade and finance—free-trade and the limitation of the medium of exchange to a volume of paper money so restricted that it might ever be interchangeable with gold—would, while paralyzing the energy of the North, have reduced the plantation hands of the South to a degradation in freedom from which the interests of their owners had protected them in slavery. They are the policies which have been applied by England to British India and which, by destroying its ancient and diversified industries, have from time to time depopulated its most fertile districts by famine and the diseases consequent upon long-continued hunger. As a teacher—through the press, the forum, and the rostrum—Mr. SUMNER'S illustrations of great principles would have been free from the suspicion of partisanship and he unembarrassed by the personal strife which is inseparable from a parliamentary career.

Permit me to refer in support of this suggestion to but two of his early addresses, each of which produced controlling and life-long impressions on my mind.

It is now nearly thirty years since I read an occasional address by Mr. SUMNER, which had been delivered on the 4th of July, 1845, before the municipal authorities of the city of Boston. His subject was "The true grandeur of nations," and I think it is not saying too much to express the belief that the power and amplitude of illustration with which he treated the subject did much to prepare the people of Great Britain and the United States for the settlement by arbitration rather than by trial of battle of the difficulties that grew out of our late civil war. The discussion of his theme was purely abstract; it was free from party bias or personal allusion, and well calculated to captivate the mind of every generous youth into whose hands it might come.

The other instance to which I would refer occurred but a few years later, when Mr. SUMNER appeared before the supreme court of Massachusetts, December 4, 1849, as counsel for Sarah C. Roberts, a colored child but five years old, who by her next friend had sued the city of Boston for damages on account of a refusal to receive her into one of the public schools. The question as stated by him was, "Can any discrimination on account of color or race be made under the constitution and laws of Massachusetts among the children entitled to the benefit of our public schools?" In opening his argument he said to the court:

This little child asks at your hands her personal rights. So doing she calls upon you to decide a question which concerns the personal rights of other colored children; which concerns the fundamental principles of human rights; which concerns the Christian character of this community. Such parties, and such interests, so grand and varied, may justly challenge your most earnest attention.

Close as was the legal argument and ample as were the authorities cited, the speech was read most widely by the unprofessional public, and the freedom from caste which characterizes the schools of the young States of the Northwest may be largely ascribed to the influence of this argument presented to a bench of judges in Massachusetts. Let me bring it anew to the attention of the public by making a brief citation or two, which may be read with profit in the practical discussions of our day:

As the State receives strength from the unity and solidarity of its citizens without distinction of class, so the school receives new strength from the unity and solidarity of all classes beneath its roof. In this way the poor, the humble, and the neglected share not only the companionship of their more favored brethren, but enjoy also the protection of their presence, in drawing toward the school a more watchful superintendence. A degraded or neglected class, if left to themselves, will become more degraded or neglected. To him that hath shall be given; and the world, true to these words, turns from the poor and outcast to the rich and fortunate. It is the aim of our system of public schools, by the blending of all classes, to draw upon the whole school the attention which is too apt to be given only to the favored few, and thus secure the poor their portion of the fruitful sunshine. But the colored children placed apart by themselves are deprived of this blessing.

May it please your honors, such are some of the things which it has occurred to me to say in this important cause. I have occupied much of your time, but I have not yet exhausted the topics. Still, which way soever we turn, we are brought back to one single proposition, the equality of men before the law. This stands as the mighty guardian of the rights of the colored children in this case. It is the constant, ever-present, tutelary genius of this Commonwealth, frowning upon every privilege of birth, upon every distinction of race, upon every institution of caste. You cannot slight it or avoid it. You cannot restrain it. It remains that you should welcome it. Do this, and your words will be a "charter and freehold of rejoicing" to a race which has earned by much suffering a title to much regard. Your judgment will become a sacred landmark, not in jurisprudence only, but in the history of freedom, giving precious encouragement to all the weary and heavy-laden wayfarers in this great cause. Massachusetts will then through you have a fresh title to regard, and be once more, as in times past, an example to the whole land.

But, Mr. Speaker, grand and inspiring as were the utterances of Mr. SUMNER, he has left to the youth of our country a heritage more precious even than they in the story of his daily walk in life, the excellence of his habits, his untiring industry, his love of art, poetry, sentiment, and in the noble aims for which he lived.

Mr. NESMITH. Mr. Speaker, to the tributes inspired by personal and political friendship which are paid to the memory of the illustrious dead, permit me to add a word expressive of my respect for and appreciation of the man.

Possibly the little I have to say will be entitled to the more consideration from the fact that whatever I may speak in praise comes from an opponent who for six years served with CHARLES SUMNER in the other end of the Capitol without having entertained a political sentiment in common with that great man. I can say that through all this opposition he commanded my respect, and in some instances my admiration. I recognized in him an embodiment of New England's high sense of duty. He always appeared to me a pure, single-hearted, earnest man. While lacking the enthusiasm that comes of generous impulse, the intense earnestness of his nature produced a quality so like it that the substitute was often accepted.

What was fanaticism in others appeared from his cultivated, high position as patriotism, and although a refined John Brown, he threw about his efforts such a charm of learning, such graces of rhetoric, that it seems a wrong to class him with the coarse fanatic who molded into bullets the feelings and words the orator uttered in the Senate.

John Brown was CHARLES SUMNER reduced to practical action, and both represented the rock-ribbed and iron-bound land where duty takes the place of impulse.

I am unacquainted with the early history of CHARLES SUMNER, beyond the outline of his public career, estimating him as I did from a stand-point that made me almost impartial. I have always been impressed with the belief that much of his marked advocacy of equal rights grew out of his personal experience. Dr. Johnson tells us that "in a majority of instances cruelty is but another name for ignorance." A man therefore to appreciate oppression, as CHARLES SUMNER seemed to do, must have felt keenly the wrongs of oppression. We know that upon his first appearance in public life he took up the cry of the oppressed that found words in his last utterances. We know that this was brought home to him in the saddest and most painful manner during his career in the Senate before the war, and I am of the opinion that it was his experience long before he entered public life. We all know that there is no part of the globe where caste has a more iron rule than in New England, and I can well imagine the early struggles of a sensitive and cultivated mind against its despotism.

He had a quality for which the world never gave him credit, and that was high courage. He fought bravely the social tyranny he suffered from in his own land, and he fought with still higher courage what to him was the cruelist despotism known to humanity, and as he fought his earnestness grew more intense. It was not that he felt for the down-trodden negro whose cause he advocated, but that his manhood resented the cruel injustice of a dominant class.

And here, sir, I wish to call attention to that quality in Senator SUMNER that is in him so little understood or appreciated. He came to the Senate of the United States the avowed advocate of the slave, and the uncompromising, bitter opponent of the master. Entirely alone, backed up by no great party, unaided by a solitary voice of friendship, he bearded the lion in his den. At that time, sir, it was not considered even respectable to be such an advocate, and the man who voluntarily thrust himself into such a position made the tender of open hostility to nearly all the rest of his countrymen, while he carried his own life in his hand. You may call this the foolhardiness born of fanaticism, but I recognize in it an example of moral and physical courage combined such as the world has rarely witnessed.

Physical courage is an inherent quality in the most of our race, and there are but few men who would not prefer to mount the deadly breach or march to the cannon's mouth rather than suffer the reproaches, the contempt, the obloquy, and the scorn of their countrymen. CHARLES SUMNER led the forlorn hope in practically facing all these dangers combined.

We must all remember who have read, and certainly no one can forget who witnessed the scene, the chivalrous effort that led to an assault upon him in his seat in the Senate Chamber. A gentleman, belonging to the democratic party, who happened to be upon the floor of the Senate at the time, tells me that it was almost melodramatic in its effect. In that great historic hall of eloquence, the old Senate Chamber, there were present the assembled legislative wisdom of the nation, and while all appeared calm and peaceful, underlying this smooth and placid exterior was that deadly animosity which a few years later culminated in the most sanguinary civil war that a nation ever experienced.

When CHARLES SUMNER addressed the President, he must have felt all that the scowling eyes and sneering lips conveyed to him. If he looked around for sympathy or support, it was to find a few cowering friends utterly appalled at his audacity; and yet he was as cool, self-possessed, and brave as if he had at his back an army of supporters. His audacity, manly person, youthful appearance, and courage won for him sympathy akin to admiration from his enemies, shown in the profound attention they gave to his bitter utterances and stinging invective. Those who witnessed the scene, or have read of it, remember the storm of wrath and indignation that was poured out upon the head of the young Senator, and we know how he arose again and again with undaunted courage to repel the attack.

And subsequently to this scene, so feebly described, another manifestation of this sublime quality of high physical courage was exhibited, when he was subjected to the most severe and excruciating surgical tortures, and bore them with the uncomplaining fortitude and stoical indifference of the North American savage.

Let us then, Mr. Speaker, give him our admiration for the high qualities of which in public estimation he has been so long deprived.

Learned, eloquent, pure, and earnest, he had not, in my estimation, any claims to statesmanship. This is shown by the fact that he closed his public career at the very moment he secured a triumph of his own all-engrossing idea some ten years since. The fanatical reformer is seldom a builder, the image-breaker cannot replace the image he destroys. Of all that little band who from the first led the forlorn hope which ultimately effected the organization of a great political party, not one was found capable of guiding or controlling it. They turned their command over to more practical minds than CHARLES SUMNER'S—to men so eminently practical, that they not only rebuilt for others, but remarkably well for themselves. It is curious, sir, to look about me and see men now in command of that party that CHARLES SUMNER created, who while he was in the minority denounced him as a fanatic, an abolitionist, an enemy of good order, of his country, and of mankind, but who now exceed his utterances in their screams for refused rights. Their conversion was probably his most marvelous achievement.

But, sir, had he possessed the statesman's creative power, he was too pure a man for the politics of our day and generation. In his high position it was not possible for him to be the paid advocate, it was not possible for him to be the associate of men who, while waving the banner of freedom with one hand, stole from the public Treasury with the other. Why, sir, he was so pure and single hearted that he could not even understand such characters.

Differing as I honestly and heartily did with Mr. SUMNER upon the great issues out of which his fame grew, I feel it incumbent upon myself to say that while my own opinions upon those questions remain at variance with his, I concede to him an honesty of purpose in urging his peculiar theories with a pertinacity unparalleled in our political history. Defeat strongly inspired him with renewed energy; and when the popular vote of the nation, as it did at times, condemned him and his cause, he, phœnix-like, arose from the ashes of defeat to advocate with fresh ardor and invigorated courage the "equality of the races before the law."

His courage was of a higher order than that inspired by mere brute force. He adhered to his theories through contumely, adversity, and disgrace; and when the results of his labors, his sufferings, and his courage elevated those who had defamed and despitefully used him from obscurity to power, he bore their renewed reproaches with but slight retaliation or complaint.

In my humble estimation Mr. SUMNER never appeared to greater advantage than when he magnanimously proposed in the Senate that the achievements of our gallant troops in an intestine war should be obliterated from their flags. An envious and malignant man would have desired to see our southern brethren humiliated by the emblazonment of their disasters upon that proud banner which we all as American citizens desire to hail as the emblem of a great and united nationality.

The evil passions growing out of the war had become so furious and unreasoning as to cause his own State to condemn his generous impulses upon that subject; but I thank God that his last moments on earth were cheered with the rescinding resolutions of the representatives of a people themselves the descendants of rebels, who felt, upon sober second thought, what was due to a people who had gallantly risked their lives in their adherence to what they conceived to be the principle that "all just government is derived from the consent of the governed." His familiarity with English history had demonstrated to him the folly of perpetuating hatreds and sanguinary reminiscences in a people who, in the nature of things, should be homogeneous. In the latter part of his life he gave evidence of his abhorrence of white political slavery no less than that which pertained to the African.

Mr. Speaker, inexorable death has claimed CHARLES SUMNER as his own, and the grave has closed over his mortal remains. We shall never in our generation look upon his like again, simply because there are no surroundings to develop such a character. The freedom of the African is assured, and it now remains the highest duty of the statesman to assure the freedom of the citizen.

"Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war;" and the man who by persistent direction of peaceful agencies converts a nation of politicians to his views is as much entitled to the triumphal arch as is the mere soldier who, by the unreasoning power of brute force, completes a victory with the sword and points to the hecatomb of the slain as his passport to power. The saddest thing about CHARLES SUMNER'S life to me is that he survived himself—that he lived to see other men occupying the proud positions and wielding the power he had created, with no higher motive prompting them than the self-aggrandizement to be found in wealth.

I have only hinted at his faults, few as they were. I have no heart to dwell upon his failings. He had the egotism of genius and the impatience of fanatical conviction. He may be said to have lived alone, never knowing pleasant companionship, and meeting the world only to be flattered and admired or to be fought. His, however, were faults we can readily forget, and failings we are willing to forgive.

He is gone from among us. His chair in the Senate, to which all eyes were turned when any great question agitated that grave body, will never be filled by a public servant more pure in his motives, more elevated and courageous in his action, or truer to his convictions. Let us keep his virtues in remembrance. May his monument be of spotless marble, for it cannot be purer or whiter than his life.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I should prefer to leave this theme to those of my colleagues who have been longer and more conspicuous in the public service. But the community which I represent was bound to our great Senator by a tie closer, I think, than that of any other. In the city of Worcester he first publicly devoted himself to the great cause to which his life was consecrated. From that day to his death, for more than twenty-five years through his eventful career, through all the obloquy and strife and hatred which it was his lot to encounter, that people have loved and honored him, scarcely ever divided from him in judgment, never in principle, never in affection; and it seems to me fitting that in this season of funeral sorrow and of funeral triumph its voice should not be silent.

CHARLES SUMNER'S public life was spent in one place—the Senate Chamber; and was devoted to one cause—the equality of all men before the law. For that great arena and that great argument his first forty years must be considered only as preparation. He came to manhood, leaving Harvard with the best training his native State had to bestow. He was a model of manly beauty and of manly strength, attracting the eye in every assembly, capable of great athletic feats, and able to sustain the most severe and continuous study. To the best American training he added what foreign travel could give. He mastered the principal modern languages and formed intimacies with the distinguished men of Europe, especially with those of his own profession. He became a learned lawyer, editing the twenty volumes of Vesey, jr., himself reporting the decisions of his friend Judge Story, and contributing many original essays to the American Jurist. His great native powers of oratory, the indispensable instruments of his future service, he trained and manifested by numerous public addresses, in which, thus early, he unfolded the principles and opinions from which he never swerved. The full vigor of his intellect he retained till his death. But that magnetic eloquence which inspired and captivated large masses of men as he molded the lessons of history, the ornaments of literature, the commandments of law, human and divine, into his burning and impassioned plea for the slave, belonged only to his youth. He never fully regained it after the assault upon him in the Senate Chamber. His vast learning and retentive memory were a marvel. I remember in my boyhood hearing an eminent scholar style him the encyclopedia of Boston.

He was familiar with all heroic literature. His style, without much variety, reminded you of some of the statelier passages of Burke, whom in person he resembled, resembling also in its affluence of citation that "field of the cloth of gold," the prose of John Milton.

Old men who had trod the highest paths of fame recognized the promise of the youth and sought his companionship. Probably no young man in America ever counted such a host of illustrious friends. Among them were Kent, the greatest modern writer on jurisprudence, (unless we join Kent himself in preferring Story,) and De Tocqueville, that wisest of Frenchmen, who has understood the institutions of America better than any man since the men who builded them, and from whom SUMNER received that maxim in which he delighted: "Life is neither a pain nor a pleasure, but a serious business, which it is our duty to carry through and to terminate with honor." Among them were some still alive, famous in poetry, in letters, and in science, whose unfailing affection cheered the darkest hours of his life. Among them were four—John Pickering, the illustrious scholar, whom SUMNER called the leader in the revival of learning in America, comparing him to Erasmus—Washington Allston, Story, and Channing—whom he commemorated in that wonderful oration of eulogy, in which, taking them as representatives and examples, he set forth the four ideals which he kept ever before his own gaze—knowledge, justice, beauty, love.

Such was CHARLES SUMNER when he was called to choose his side in the great battle of which our nation was to be the scene. Never did hero, martyr, or saint choose more bravely or worthily. The party to which he had belonged, dominant for a generation in Massachusetts, was just wresting the national authority from the grasp of its ancient rival. The victory of either was the victory of slavery. Turning his back on the victors, he chose the conquered cause. Fond of power, fitted for its exercise, he chose the side of weakness. Surrounded by wealth, he chose the cause of the poor. Rich in friends, he became the defender of the friendless. Favorite of that cultivated society, his great heart went out in sympathy for the ignorant and degraded slave. He joined himself to a small political association, not strong enough to carry three districts in the country, who made opposition to slavery the cardinal doctrine of their creed.

The indignation of Massachusetts at the passage of the compromise measures of 1850, especially the fugitive-slave bill, for which the whig administration of Millard Fillmore was responsible, enabled the free-soil party, combining with the democratic minority, to elect Mr. SUMNER to the Senate, where he took his seat in 1851. From that time forth he was the undoubted leader of the political opposition to slavery. His speeches stirred the public heart and conscience to their depths, and were the arsenal from which the most effective arguments were drawn.

The sure instinct of slavery did not err when it recognized him as its implacable foe. At last a man had come to the Senate to whom the ideal higher law was real; on whom threats and blandishments alike were lost; who would not buy popularity or office; who would not buy success for his party, or even safety and prosperity for his country, by injustice. There was no mistake about him. The minions of tyranny sought eagerly for his destruction, thinking that with him the new-born movement for freedom would perish. But, fools and blind, they saw not that the eternal forces were behind him. They thought if they could but silence that bugle-note the music of liberty would die out over the land. They thought if they could but strike down that sentinel on the ramparts the awakening nation would turn itself again to its long sleep. They thought if they could but stifle the clarion voice of the herald of the day, the morning itself would not dawn.

The secret of CHARLES SUMNER'S power lay in two qualities which he impressed on this people in larger measure than any other man of his time—his conscientiousness and his faith. Others, a good many, equaled him in eloquence; others, a few, equaled him in scholarship. But he alone was the interpreter of the conscience of this people. To every proposition he applied the inexorable test—is it right? Is it absolutely just? Unless his Puritanic sense of rectitude was satisfied he would not yield. No argument of political expediency, no whisper of administrative caution, no deference to associates, no regard for venerated authorities, no consideration of fitness of occasion, no fear for himself, would induce him to abate one jot of his indignant denunciation. With this trait he could not be other than the life-long foe of slavery.

There was no optimism in his nature. He never turned his gaze away from evil, or looked on it but to hate it and to strike it. But in the darkest days of war, or those darker days worse than war, when slavery ruled, he never lost his sublime faith in the triumph of justice, truth, equality, wrought out in the Republic by the power of a free people.

The secret of his power and the rule of his public life will be found in two of his own sentences, one almost the opening sentence in his first great public discourse, the other which I heard him utter toward the close of life in a debate on the civil-rights bill, that great and crowning measure of justice, in care for which he forgot himself in the very hour of death. "Never aim at aught which is not right, persuaded that without this every possession will become an evil and a shame." "Trust the Republic, and the ideas which are its strength and safety."

No eulogy of CHARLES SUMNER will be complete which leaves out his faults. When common men die we may invoke the adage, "Nil de mortuis nisi bonum," or rather that sadder cry of human frailty, "Jam parce sepulto." But of this man we can say the whole truth. Two grave defects marred the symmetry of his moral and intellectual nature. The first was a certain want of proportion or perspective in his mental vision, which made him exaggerate the evil or good qualities of men whom he had occasion to blame or praise, or the importance of measures with which he was concerned. In saying this we should not forget how often time has brought round the popular judgment to his own.

The other was a graver fault. In him the egotism often fostered by a long senatorial career seems to have been natural. He possessed an inordinate confidence in his own judgments. He was intolerant of difference or of opposition. It was hard for men his equals in station, themselves accustomed to respect, conscious of equal desire for the general welfare, to submit to his impatient and imperious criticism. What he saw he seemed to himself to see with absolute clearness and certainty. He could not understand the state of mind of a man who did not see it as he did. But this his greatest fault was a protection to him in the warfare in which he was engaged. Imagine Mr. SUMNER in Washington from 1851 to 1857, almost alone, an object of general hatred, receiving by nearly every mail threats of violence and assassination, possessed with a modest distrust of his own convictions, and exhibiting an amiable deference to the opinions of other people. Nothing but the absolute certainty of his confidence in his cause and in himself could have sustained him in those years of obloquy and peril.

I have spoken of his injustice to his associates and his intolerance of opposition. But the harshness and bitterness with which for the time being he spoke of men who opposed the measures he had at heart, he never felt toward mere personal antagonists. I may surprise some persons who have not carefully studied Mr. SUMNER, but I am sure of the assent of those who knew him best when I declare that he was as free as any man I ever knew from personal hatreds, and that his lofty and generous nature was absolutely incapable of revenge. Let the man whom he considered to have most wronged him, or to have most wronged the Republic, but unite with him heartily in any cause which was dear to him, and the bitterest estrangements were forgotten.

Who shall say that he thought more highly of himself than he deserved; that he demanded for himself or his opinion greater consideration than would now be accorded to them by the judgment of mankind? In the words of that fine sentence of the Ethica of Aristotle, applied by the English historian to the younger Pitt, "He thought himself worthy of great things, being in truth worthy."

There was at least nothing petty or mean in these traits. They were the foibles of a lofty and noble nature.

> To his own self not always just,
> Bound in the bonds which all men share;
> Confess the failings as we must,
> The lion's mark is always there.

At any rate there he was to be seen and known of all men. There was no secrecy in his nature. He was the soul of truth. His public and his private life corresponded. Of one thing those who love him are secure. History will lay bare no secret which will tarnish the whiteness of his fame. His correspondence, his conversation, the secrets of his chamber may be made known to mankind. No intrigue, no dissimulation, no artifice, no selfish ambition, no impure thought or act shall be found.

> Whatever record leap to light,
> He never shall be shamed.

He was hearty and generous in his friendships. No man took greater delight in other men's services to freedom or rewarded them with a more precious and bountiful commendation. To receive his praise for any service to human liberty was like being knighted by Cœur de Lion or Henry V on the field of battle.

He said lately that the happiest period of his life was when he was a student at law. The time of the close of the war must have been equally so. He had seen the great desire of his life fulfilled. The eyes which had ached with sorrow and with toil had gazed upon the glory and the beauty of the harvest. The martyr of free speech, the solitary and despised champion of liberty, had lived to be the honored leader of the Senate. The friendship and confidence of Lincoln, who knew and loved the noble nature of the man; the gratitude of the American people, the recollection of great tasks successfully achieved, the affection of hosts of friends, the expectation of new and most congenial employments in the country's service, the enjoyments of literature, the resources of art—everything that could adorn, everything that could delight the remainder of a life scarce past its vigorous prime, seemed to be his.

But fate ordered it otherwise. The voice of duty, obeyed at prime, called him to new sacrifices and new strifes until the end.

The last morning on which he came to the Senate Chamber, to the inquiry of a friend who met him, he answered, "I am tired, tired." As I heard of it just afterward, I thought of a sentence in that magnificent opening passage of his first great discourse, in which he seems to dedicate himself to the service of the Republic: "We must not fold our hands in slumber, nor abide content with the past. To each generation is committed its peculiar task; nor does the heart which responds to the call of duty find rest except in the grave." Ah, heart, so dauntless and so tender, well hast thou kept that early vow! Ever responding to the call of duty, from the day when Massachusetts gave thee to thy country in the fullness of thy youthful promise till that saddest moment when we saw thee borne cold in death from the portals of the Capitol, thou hast known no rest. At last thy country gives thee back to thy native Commonwealth to sleep in her holy pilgrim soil with the kindred dust of the sons, many and brave, who have well obeyed the lesson she taught them in their youth—with Samuel Adams, and Otis, and the elder and the younger Quincy, and John Adams and his illustrious son. Like them he learned at her knees the lessons of liberty. Like them he encountered hatred and strife and peril. Like them he lived to see the seed he had sown bearing its abundant harvest, and like theirs his grateful country shall preserve his fame.

> For the memorial of virtue is immortal, because it is known with God and with men. When it is present men take example at it, and when it is gone they desire it; it weareth a crown and triumpheth forever, having gotten the victory striving for undefiled rewards.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, the true analysis of human character requires profound knowledge, extensive research, and the most critical judgment of any subject that commands the attention of the human mind.

Great names on the pages of history shine ever with their own unborrowed light. Eulogy cannot add to their glory, detraction cannot dim their luster.

The ostracism of one generation may be supplemented by the adoration of another. The scorn and derision of one age may merge in devotion and reverence in those that follow, and the very implements of disgraceful torture may become sacred symbols of devout faith to myriad followers. Yet all this while the true character of the individual had remained unchanged, his life in all its relations to the world in which he moved had been rounded, perfected, finished, and it held its place in the grand living panorama of the world's progression, unaltered and unalterable.

Seldom, if ever, can the then present age be so free from the errors of prejudice or partiality as to warrant confidence in the accuracy of its judgments or the correctness of its conclusions. If such suggestions are forcible regarding the great names of history whose achievements were illustrated by mere physical endurance or personal daring, with what modesty should we venture to delineate the character and motives of that illustrious citizen who in one and the same age, the same generation, and among the same people has been the object of unlimited hate—of boundless veneration.

CHARLES SUMNER, in the fullness and perfectness of his character, would have been impossible in any other age, among any other people, in any other phase of human civilization. He was cast in the mold of these times, imbued with the spirit of this age, but enriched with the learning of the world. Of great moral courage, commanding presence, intense individuality, his personality and self-estimation almost offensive, his tenacity of will bordering upon obstinacy, influenced little by the tender emotions of human nature, but a devout worshiper of abstract truth and right and a fearless champion in their defense whenever and wherever occasion arose.

For the marvelous changes in our civilization to which he was to contribute his very faults were necessities, his very failings were indispensable, his pride and egotism and self-assurance were fundamental elements of his success.

His lack of personal sympathy and emotional affection left room and place for all humanity.

For him, insult and injury sanctified the cause which he defended, opprobrium and scorn hallowed the theories which he had espoused, and had imbued with his own intense personality. Common truths were enlarged to immortal grandeur in his vision, when adorned with the gems of his eloquence and surrounded with the halo of his learning.

A servile and dégraded race were to him kings and priests, so soon as he became the champion of their rights and had thrown over them the banner of his protection. His own pathway was illuminated by the light of his intense individuality, and all who traveled with him along that royal road were clothed in purple, and all who went by other ways were groping in darkness.

Governments and people, working out the problem of their growth otherwise than by his elaborated plan, were rushing madly to ruin. Constitutions and laws lacking the absolute assertion of the grand truths of humanity were in his eyes delusion and a snare.

To him the absolute equality of all human beings on the plane of civil and political rights left no place for partiality; no room for prejudice.

The vast world was to become the abode of enfranchised millions. The revelations from Heaven and the arcana of nature alike shadowed forth the universal disenthrallment of humanity, and he gloried in the belief that he was the recognized apostle of liberty. All things conspired to strengthen such a conviction. The admiration of friends, the persecution of enemies, the stern devotion of the puritan, the intense hatred of the chivalry, the boundless confidence of the oppressed, and the scorn of the dominant race.

Even his personal peculiarities strengthened this belief. His commanding presence, the grand intonations of his far-sounding voice, the triumphant utterance of his splendid sentences, the almost barbaric display of literary wealth gleaned from all languages and gathered from all lands, the triumphal progress of his high-sounding oratory, the imperial consciousness of his right to the throne, and even the jealousy that would brook no rival near that throne, all around him and all within conspired to assure him that he was appointed and anointed the grand high priest of the changing civilization and renovated institutions of this marvelous era of American history.

True to that conviction, to the fixed belief in his calling and destiny, he lived and labored and died.

Whatever his faults, whatever his failings, he never faltered, he never wavered. In small things and in great, every occasion found him ready, and every opportunity was a renewal of his devotion.

Mr. Speaker, nearly twenty years have passed since I first met Mr. SUMNER. He had been sojourning for a fortnight in the iron mountains of Marquette, and came from the forest to the steamer to go up Lake Superior to the head of the lake.

As we passed from the harbor Mr. SUMNER said that for two weeks he had seen no newspapers, and was ignorant of all that had transpired in the outer world during that time. I had the pleasure of giving him the last dailies from the principal cities of the Union. As he glanced over the pages his attention became fixed, his eye kindled, he hurried from paper to paper, looking hastily in each, and then went for his portfolio and prepared to write. He looked at the clock, went out upon the deck, inquired the name of a rocky island we were then passing, and wrote, folded, and directed a letter. It was a beautiful Sabbath morning in summer. The waters of the lake mirrored the rocky outline of Granite Island and the mountains on the mainland. The scenery was beautiful, the air delicious, the passengers joyous.

The newspapers which Mr. SUMNER had received were full of records of the whole busy world. "But none of these things moved him."

He had learned from the newspapers that one comparatively obscure but noble man was languishing in prison in a Christian country, on the Christian Sabbath, for refusing to obey the behests of slavery and refusing to oppress the slave; and then Mr. SUMNER wrote to Passmore Williamson, in prison, that thrilling letter which not only cheered the prisoner in his cell, but electrified the Christian world.

But I will not dwell longer on such illustrations. To recount them would be to repeat the history of his life. Nor will I further eulogize the Great Commoner of the nation. Whether in intellect and genius he will rank among the more or the less gifted of the world's bright spirits, none will deny to him the proud position of usefulness and faithfulness to which he devoted his life. For him to have been either too high or too low, too great or too small, would alike have unfitted him for the grand achievements of his distinguished career.

It has been said that along our Pacific coast the light-house should not be placed on the lower headlands that receive the shock of the incoming wave, lest the waves should sweep away the foundations, and the fog-bank and the mist-wreath should too often obscure the beacon and conceal the warning light from the eyes of the imperiled mariner, nor on the overlooking mountain's height, where the mountain and the pharos would alike be encompassed by the brooding storm-clouds of those higher altitudes, but midway of these extremes, in that serene mid-region between the counter air-currents—those that sweep the ocean and the shore below, and those that uphold the cloudy firmament above. Thus, it may be, that along the borderland of human destiny he who shall have wrought the grandest benefit to humanity may have neither the warm affections and tender emotions that cluster around the homelier walks of life, nor yet the transcendent genius of him—

> Who on mind's high steep can stand
> And marshal with his sceptered hand
> The whirlwind and the cloud,
> Can write his name too deep a dye
> In lightning's traces on the sky.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I shall say but little, since no words I could utter would add to the fame of the illustrious statesman. And yet I come to offer a humble tribute to his memory from old free Kansas. The State I have in part the honor to represent, in its early struggles for existence and freedom, elicited the warmest sympathy of CHARLES SUMNER, and called forth from him some of the grandest parliamentary efforts that dignify the history of the Government.

His great speech on the crime against Kansas was not only animated by that spirit of lofty philanthropy which ever came naturally from his great, magnanimous heart, but was thrilled through and through with the highest conception of popular liberty in America. That speech, too, entailed on him long years of suffering, and was doubtless the means of prematurely depriving his country of services she ill could spare, and the world of a life as eminent as it was pure.

In the history of the past twelve years, among the galaxy of great men who may be styled the fathers of our second revolution; the men who when the storms beat and the winds blew, when the timid were timid and the faithless faithless, seized the very misfortunes and weaknesses which threatened the Government, and hewed them into the foundation-stones of a reconstructed Republic—among these men six names stand in bold relief: SUMNER, Chase, Lincoln, Stevens, Seward, Stanton, and they are all gone. They did their share of the work ably and fearlessly, and God Almighty blessed them in this, that ere they died they had the privilege of seeing peace and liberty clasp hands across a regenerated continent.

SUMNER was one of the best types of our public men. A scholar so ripe, an orator so eloquent, that as orator or scholar we may justly feel proud of him as the peer of any orator or scholar of any country or any time; a statesman who squared his political principles by the fundamental maxims of right and wrong; a politician whose sympathies were with the downtrodden and the weak, and who gave to humanity rather than to party; a gentleman, withal, whose life was so dignified and pure that even his enemies never dared with the breath of slander to sully his fame.

Some men are great actors, others eminent for executive ability; others are great thinkers. Among the latter no one was more eminent than CHARLES SUMNER. He seized the fresh but crude ideas as they floated up from the public mind, and molded them into symmetry. Always clinging to the fundamental maxims of equality and right, when dangers threatened the edifice that is the safeguard for the security and liberty of forty millions of people, he seized the very necessities and dangers that threatened the country and planted them as the pillars of a reconstructed empire.

Ours is a government of the people. We all feel amost acutely the necessity that the public pulse shall beat in unison with the outer and inner life of all our politics. He who aspires to this duty has a double task; to appreciate and mold public sentiment, and then to lead it. In both, CHARLES SUMNER was eminent. He stood like another Moses before the people. The public mind was oppressed with danger, and part of it befogged with prejudice. Old Constitution theorists had peddled their doctrines at every cross-road in the country. Many true men wavered, when SUMNER, standing with his compatriots and, like the ancient prophets, seizing the rod directly from the hands of God Almighty, the rod of eternal justice, smote it upon the troubled waters and bade the murmuring people "Go forward!"

Step by step they led them higher, higher, step by step, until, on the top of another Mount Pisgah, they, amid the uncertainties, the storm, and the darkness, saw the promised land of future American politics stretched out for the feet of a progressive people. When Mr. SUMNER spoke he spoke not only to the Senate Chamber—the Republic was his auditorium. His speeches went forth freighted with the best life and thoughts of the time; went forth to the whole country, to arouse a universal interest and provoke a universal utterance.

His sudden death was not the extinction of a life, but its apotheosis. His monument is built in the history of his country. To-day we stand reverently before the great dead, while all the shadows of conflicting opinion and the bitterness of partisanship have melted away.

Mr. PHILLIPS, at the close of his speech, presented the House with a series of resolutions, printed on white silk, from the Board of Trade of Cawker City, Kansas, which is as follows:

At a special meeting of the Board of Trade, held March 16, the board was called to order by the president, when, on motion, a committee was appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the sentiment of the board on the death of Hon. CHARLES SUMNER; after which the committee reported the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Whereas it pleased the inscrutable wisdom of Almighty God on the 11th of March, anno Domini 1874, to remove Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, of Massachusetts, from the vicissitudes of time to the unchanging realities of eternity: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, as citizens of the Republic, are proud of the record he has made as a scholar, a statesman, and a man.

Resolved, That CHARLES SUMNER was a man whose life inspires the philanthropist with new and better hope for the possibilities of human nature.

Resolved, That we honor him no less for his cool, calm, and catholic judgment in political affairs than we admire him for his fortitude, pertinacity, and unflagging zeal in behalf of down-trodden humanity.

Resolved, That we revere his memory for the uncommon purity and integrity of his private and political life, and that he passed untainted and unsuspected through a life time in an atmosphere laden with political corruption.

Resolved, That we, as an organization, without distinction of party, deem his death a national calamity.

Resolved, That his death has left vacant one of the few places in human society which is difficult to fill, and that his is with peculiar emphasis in the best sense—

> "One of the few, the immortal names,
> That were not born to die."

Resolved, That we will each wear in his honor a badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to furnish the following papers with a copy of the resolutions, requesting them to publish the same, and send a copy to this office, namely: Springfield (Massachusetts) Republican, New York Tribune, Washington Chronicle, and Cawker City Tribune. Also a copy to the sister of deceased, one to the President of the United States, and one to the Senate and House of Representatives.

E. HARRISON CAWKER,
THOMAS FLOWMAN,
F. J. KNIGHT,
Committee.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALBRIGHT: The memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, declaring against the system of moieties and the employment of spies and informers as a part of the Customs Department of the Government, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ARMSTRONG: The petition of citizens of Dakota and Iowa, for a post-route from Canton, Dakota, to Le Mars, Iowa, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BRADLEY: The petition of 78 honorably discharged soldiers, citizens of Michigan, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1700) restoring to market and homestead entry certain Indian reserve lands, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of the trustees of the Washington City Orphan Asylum, for relief, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, the petition of Webster M. Rains, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CROUNSE: The remonstrance of citizens of Washington County, Nebraska, against extension of patents for agricultural machinery, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. CRUTCHFIELD: The petition of Joseph McHenry, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DURHAM: The petition of A. C. Meadows, for relief, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GIDDINGS: A paper for the establishment of a post-route in the State of Texas, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HAGANS: The petition of the heirs of Benjamin Moore, for compensation for services of said Moore in perfecting certain improvements in the manufacture of small-arms, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HALE, of New York: The memorial of Charles N. Williams, postmaster at Elizabethtown, Essex County, New York, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HANCOCK: Papers relating to the claim of Santiago de Leon, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Moline, Illinois, for the construction of a double-track freight railway from the Mississippi Valley to tide-water, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Also, the petition of citizens of Davenport, Iowa, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. LAMISON: The petition of 17 citizens of Darke County, Ohio, against a duty on tea and coffee and any increase of internal taxes, and in favor of the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced by 10 per cent. the duties on certain imports, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LAWSON: The petition of Charles A. Wolf and 44 others, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1179) granting increased pensions to disabled soldiers, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McNULTA: Papers relating to the claim of George W. Silcox, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, the petition of John T. Silvernail, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NEGLEY: The petition of Margaret M. Dougherty, of Kenton County, Kentucky, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PHELPS: The petition of Henry Wiemler, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PHILLIPS: The petition of C. D. Bradley, of Marion County, Kansas, for relief, to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

By Mr. READ: The petition of Martha J. Harrison, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Thomas Dowdle, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SCOFIELD: The petition of citizens of Erie, Pennsylvania, for the establishment of a new judicial district in the State of Pennsylvania, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SCUDDER, of New York: The memorial of citizens of New York City, in favor of the settlement of international difficulties by arbitration, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SPRAGUE: Resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, in relation to crediting said State with arms used in suppressing the rebellion, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SOUTHARD: The petition of A. W. Search, of Muskingum County, Ohio, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia: The petition of J. R. and F. R. Brown, of Shady Grove, Franklin County, Virginia, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of W. A. and F. R. Brown, of Franklin County, Virginia, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: Papers relating to the claim of Huston Wyrick, of Maynardsville, Tennessee, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WOOD: The petition of citizens of New York, New Jersey, and elsewhere, for the passage of a law to regulate the transportation of nitro-glycerine, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WOODFORD: The petition of Joseph Tomas and 35 others, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1179) granting increased pensions to disabled soldiers, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of A. H. Bruns and 46 others, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of John R. Shields and 49 others, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of L. W. Fiske and 147 others, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of A. B. Pearce and 31 others, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Adam F. Brosh and 95 others, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Joseph Hadfield and 51 others, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of H. W. Pease and 34 others, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of George B. Squires and 23 others, of similar import, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 28, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Edwin John, clerk, and M. A. John, clerk for the day, in behalf of East Jordan Monthly Meeting of Friends, held at East Jordan, Whiteside County, Illinois, asking Congress to adopt and recommend to other nations the adoption of arbitration for the settlement of international differences instead of war; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition and accompanying papers of Rev. Ebenezer W. Brady, late chaplain of the One hundred and sixteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, now of Boone County, Iowa, praying to be allowed a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition and papers of Captain M. B. C. True, of Lincoln, Nebraska, formerly commissary sergeant of Company H, Second Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, asking to be mustered in as captain of the First Mississippi Mounted Infantry, and for pay for his services; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN presented four petitions, numerously signed by merchants, ship-owners, and ship-masters of Camden, Maine; of Bluehill, Maine; of Rockport, Maine; and of Deer Isle, Maine, praying for the enactment of such laws as will abolish the present system of compulsory pilotage on all ships or vessels duly registered or enrolled, at all harbors, rivers, and places within the jurisdiction of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have a petition of Franz Hermann Widstrand, a citizen of Minnesota, a gentleman of learning and research. The petition is rather longer than I would trouble the Senate by reading at this time. The first sentence reads:

To the Congress of the United States, North America:

Among the relics from old England that this Republic ought to get rid of is the English language.

I do not know to what committee that would properly belong.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Probably the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. RAMSEY. I would suggest the Committee on Education and Labor. I move that it be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented the petition of J. George Harris, of Nashville, Tennessee, praying compensation for wood and timber taken from his farm by military authority during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, relating to sums of money charged against that State for arms, &c., issued to it during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALCORN presented a petition of citizens of Tate County, Mississippi, and members of Coldwater Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, praying Congress to restore to the people of the cotton-growing States the taxes which they were required to pay on their cotton grown in the years 1866, 1867, and 1868, believing, in common with the entire population of the South and a large part of the people of the North, that the tax was not only unjust and oppressive, but in violation of the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the State Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry of the State of Mississippi in favor of the Fort Saint Philip Canal, as the most feasible and permanent plan of securing an uninterrupted outlet to the commerce of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, presented the memorial of Frank M. Jones, on the injustice to claimants of a limitation of fees in rejected and difficult pension claims, and praying the passage of a law to remedy the same; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McCREERY presented the petition of Mary Jane Ball, widow of James P. Ball, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of Maria Copeland, grand-niece and heir, and for the coheirs of Finseley Graham, deceased, praying indemnity for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. STEVENSON. I present a preamble and resolutions of the president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, adopted on the 22d instant at their office in Louisville, in which that board desire to correct certain misstatements of facts alleged to have been made during the recent debate in the Senate on the Portland Canal bill, and to disavow the charge that their refusal to surrender the canal has been prompted by private or selfish interests. I ask to have the resolutions read, and then I shall throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate for a word of personal explanation in regard to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky requests the reading of resolutions presented by him—the Chair hears no objection—after which the Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to submit a few remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

At a meeting of the board of president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company held at their office in Louisville, April 22, 1874, the following preamble and resolution were passed:

Whereas the board have seen from reported proceedings in Congress that the members of this board have there been represented as opposing the effort now and heretofore made to have the General Government pay the debts of the canal and render it free: Therefore,

Resolved, That such statement is untrue and wholly without foundation. For many years this board has been anxious, and is now anxious to surrender the canal to the Government, has repeatedly offered to do so, and is now willing and ready to do so upon being acquitted of their liability to the creditors of the company. The board submitted to their legal adviser the question whether they could surrender the canal to the Government and have it made free upon the mere assumption by the Government of the debts of the canal, and received for answer that it could not be so done. That opinion was promptly published, and, the board is informed, is sustained by the opinion of Justice Miller of the Supreme Court of the United States.

It has also been stated that the receipts of the canal are $350,000 a year. For the last nine years the receipts have averaged only $169,076.49 a year.

It has also been stated that this board has reported to no one. This, too, is untrue. It has regularly reported to the State of Kentucky, as was its duty, and to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States and any other Government officer, or committee of Congress whenever called upon, and the books and accounts of the canal have ever been open to the inspection of Government officials, and have been several times most carefully and thoroughly examined by parties appointed by the Government. They are now open to such examination. Further, it has been stated that no taxes have been paid to the State of Kentucky. The truth is, the canal has always and regularly paid taxes to the State for several years past, $4,500 a year. This tax was demanded and paid upon the idea that this is a State corporation. Under advice the board refused to pay taxes to the city of Louisville. During the continuance of the United States income tax this company was charged and paid the same like all other State corporations, and were required to retain and pay over to the Government the tax on interest coupons falling due against the company.

It has also been stated that the Savings Bank of Louisville (the bank in which the treasurer has usually deposited the funds of the company) is doing business on said funds. The truth is, the canal is now in debt to the bank, and has been all this year, the receipts, by reason of high water, having been unusually small. The board as long ago as 1867 ordered that funds accumulating in the treasury beyond the requirements of the company for current expenses, interest, &c., should be used in buying up bonds of the first maturing series, at the market price, for cancellation, and this policy has prevented the accumulation of idle funds.

It is also untrue that the last of the Kentucky resolutions of 1872 was manipulated by this board or any member of it. That resolution was drawn as it is because the attorney of the board thought the rights of creditors demanded it.

Those resolutions were prepared by the attorney of the city, the attorney of this company, and Mr. S. L. Ewing who was understood as representing the interest of Cincinnati in the matter.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, it will be perceived that the board utterly deny that they have ever opposed the effort now and heretofore made to have the General Government pay the debt of the canal company, take immediate possession, and render it free. The board declare that they have been anxious, and are still so, to surrender the canal to the Government; but they have been advised by their legal counsel, and they believe that they cannot safely do so unless the Government would in advance pay off the entire mortgage debt and interest of the company, and relieve the directors of all liability to the creditors of the company. The directors have been, therefore, unwilling to surrender possession of this canal upon the mere assumpsit of the Government of the United States, though made in the form of a congressional enactment, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay off both the principal and interest of these bonds.

The issue during the late debate upon this bill in the Senate between the board of directors of the canal and the advocates of the pending bill was very distinct. The former insisted that unless the Government of the United States will in advance pay off all the mortgage bonds, which I believe do not mature until 1876, 1881, and 1885, they insist upon their right to retain the possession of this canal, and, in utter disregard of the great commercial necessities of the people of the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys, will continue to levy this onerous tax upon the tonnage of the Ohio River passing through this artificial highway, while the friends of the measure reported by the Finance Committee insist that as the Government of the United States is now the exclusive owner of the entire stock of the canal company save the five shares held by these five directors, as the Government has at its own cost greatly enlarged the capacity of this canal by reconstruction and thereby largely added to its value, as it has assumed the payment of all the bonds and interest of the company and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to meet and discharge them as they mature, it had a right in the interest of commerce to take possession of this canal at once, permitting the mortgage lien to remain unimpaired, and providing that if the interest on this mortgage debt was not paid by the United States according to the true tenor and effect thereof the trustee in that mortgage was empowered to institute suit, serve process on the agent of the United States having charge of the canal as the terre tenant, and proceed to re-enter and take possession of the property.

Such was the issue in the late discussion, and such is the issue now. I never doubted the right of the directors to oppose the passage of the bill, though I regretted it. So far from casting any imputation upon these gentlemen for their action upon the pending bill, I took occasion promptly to say that they were all prominent citizens, of the highest character and credit.

The resolutions of this board which I have presented, and which have been read, show that they are unwilling to surrender the canal as provided for in the pending bill; not for selfish motives; not at all, sir; but because these gentlemen thought, and still think, and as they say are legally advised, that as directors they could not properly surrender the possession of the canal until the mortgage debt and interest were entirely paid off by the United States. They do not think themselves justified in taking the assumpsit of the United States, as provided for in this bill. Hence their resistance to the pending bill becoming a law.

So the statement made in the debate is not therefore untrue, as these resolves show that the directors were opposed to the passage of the bill providing for the immediate possession of the canal by the United States. That was all I maintained. During the debate I take occasion to say that I do not understand Mr. Justice Miller's opinion to sanction the position of this directory in these resolves, that the United States Government cannot take possession of this canal until the principal and interest of the mortgage debt are entirely paid off. I agree with that eminent jurist that the mortgage is an existing lien upon the canal and its receipts for the payment of the outstanding bonds and interest, which the Government cannot impair, invalidate, or destroy, because such action would be a direct violation of a contract. But I do not understand that Mr. Justice Miller intimated that, when the United States Government assumes to provide by express legislation for the prompt payment of all the mortgage bonds and interest as the same mature, and directs and empowers the Secretary of the Treasury to make such payments, allowing the mortgage lien upon the canal still to stand, the Government cannot take possession. I may be in error, but such is my construction of the judicial ruling alluded to.

But these resolutions assert that the statement during the debate that the board of directors do not make annual reports is untrue. Mr. President, I stand corrected. I accept the correction. I was led into error of statement by the fact that the law provided that when the United States became sole owner of all the stock in the canal the directors would not be required to report.

It is also true that the board have paid and continue to pay taxes.

Another alleged misstatement is that the tolls collected do not amount to $350,000 per annum, as charged in the debate. The resolution states that in the past nine years the receipts of the canal have not exceeded $169,075.49 a year.

An average statement of tolls for nine years does not disprove that the receipts for the year 1873 were $350,000, or that they will not reach that sum during the year 1874.

But I desire to take no issue with the board, however, on this subject. I desire, in support of my statement during the debate that the tolls amounted to $350,000, to refer to the source of my information. I now cite "the letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in obedience to law, papers relative to the canal at the Falls of the Ohio River known as the Louisville and Portland Canal," which contains the following statement from the report of General Godfrey Weitzel, who had charge, as "major of engineers of the United States Army," of this work. He says:

The receipts of toll from the 1st of January, 1872, to that time were very light, as navigation was almost continually suspended by ice, yet from that date to August 23, 1872, (when the canal was closed for repairs,) that is, in a period of about six months, $207,025.19 were collected for tolls. This sum is $26,099.79 greater than the greatest amount of toll collected in any one year (1866) previous. It is perfectly safe, I think, to assume that during the next year, if the rate of toll were continued at fifty cents per ton, the tolls collected would reach $350,000. If this be true, the rate of tolls should be fixed at about seven cents, when the canal comes into the control of the Government, in order just to pay running expenses.

That statement, it seems to me, is scarcely contradicted by the resolution of the directory that for the last nine years the average has been $169,075.49. Besides, I might remark that the nine years cited include the war, during which we know that the commerce of the country on the Ohio River was almost entirely cut off. The statement made in the debate was that $350,000 was the annual amount of tolls. I think I was justified by General Weitzel's report in making the statement that the receipts would reach that sum.

Touching the savings-bank I made no statement, Mr. President, whatever; I was not in the Chamber at the moment that statement was made. If the gentlemen who compose the directory had communicated either to my colleague or myself any information touching this canal it would have given him and myself pleasure to have made any correction.

I should be very unwilling to do any injustice to this board, and if

I did so it was unintentional. I have in discharge of my official duty been compelled to differ with this board by an earnest advocacy to make the canal free at once. I think the interest of the bondholders will not be impaired by their allowing the Government to take immediate possession of this work. I am sorry that these gentlemen, in what I think is a mistaken view of their liabilities, should interpose any objection. I have not, however, intended in any way to reflect personally upon them. The trustee in the mortgage is clothed with a legal title to the canal property. That lien is unimpaired by the bill which passed the Senate. The Government proposes not only to assume, but by special enactment to direct, the payment of the bonded debt and interest as both mature. If there is any default by the Government in a prompt discharge of the bonds and interest as the same mature, the trustee is authorized in the proposed act at once to institute legal proceedings for the recovery of the canal, to serve process on the agent of the United States; and the Attorney-General is directed to enter the appearance of the United States and the trustee will have a judgment for the property. Mr. President, who doubts the payment by the Government of every dollar due the bondholders of principal and interest of their debt? To do so would be to doubt the plighted faith of the Government. But I only rose to do justice to the directors by presenting these resolutions and disavowing any personal reflection upon them in my remarks on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be laid on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 514) granting to the Sierra Iron Company a right of way through the public lands for a railroad and telegraph, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 16) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, together with an amendment of the House of Representatives thereto and resolutions adopted at a public meeting in the county of Storey, in Nevada, and a very large memorial signed by citizens of the same county upon that subject, have directed me to report back the same and ask that the committee be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change of reference will be made.

Mr. SARGENT. I will not oppose that reference ordered by the majority of the Committee on Mines and Mining, but I wish to remark that I think it is an improper reference. The bill treats solely——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that debate is not in order.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask leave, then, to make a few remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to submit a few remarks on the reference of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no pending question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I have no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall not detain the Senate long, especially as the question is not now debatable. I will say, however, that in my judgment the only question raised is a question of policy and not of law. All this legislation originated with the Mining Committees of the respective Houses, and those committees are peculiarly fitted by their constitution, by their knowledge of this subject and the experience of some of their members, to pass on the question. On consideration by the committee, however, it has been ordered that the subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I can only hope the Committee on the Judiciary will look at the policy of the measure as well as at any question of law which may be suggested.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 248) to facilitate the trials of criminal causes in the western judicial district of Arkansas, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 602) for the relief of John Barry, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of John R. Polke, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1773) for the relief of Samuel E. Rankin, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1774) for the relief of Matthew Whitehead, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Moses Googins, father of Andrew A. Googins, late a private in Company D, Thirty-first Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, who was captured and incarcerated in a rebel prison and never exchanged, praying that the amount due his son for services be paid to him as the sole heir, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 334) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Cabell, of Texas, to report adversely thereon and move its indefinite postponement, a bill for that purpose having already passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 466) to remove the disabilities of Raphael Semmes, of Alabama, to report it adversely and move its indefinite postponement. There is no petition in favor of the relief by the claimant, and the committee would not be disposed to pass it at present if there were one.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2702) to relieve John Forsyth, of Alabama, of political disabilities, to report it adversely. There is no petition in this case, but if there were we should move to postpone the bill indefinitely. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3027) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Van Ranselear Morgan, Thomas M. Jones, and Charles H. Fauntleroy, of Virginia, and A. S. Taylor, of Maryland, to report it adversely. We have made careful search, and in neither House is there any petition for this relief. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3086) to remove the political disabilities of George E. Pickett, of Virginia, have instructed me to report the same adversely, there being no petition in either House.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask that that bill go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go on the Calendar with the adverse report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will not ask for that, because it incumbers the Calendar and is liable to come up when gentlemen are not here and be passed, contrary to the fixed disposition of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I propose to get the petition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A petition after the bill would be a little out of order. If the Senator would like to have it recommitted to the committee, he can send us the petition and we can examine it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Then I will make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be recommitted.

Mr. JOHNSTON subsequently said: I ask the Senator from Vermont to withdraw his report in the case of Pickett, in order to give me an opportunity to get the petition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill has already been recommitted on the gentleman's motion.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Very well; let it stand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3091) to release J. W. Bennett from political disabilities, to report it adversely, there being no petition. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3093) to relieve David A. Telfair from political disability, to report it adversely. There is no petition in either House, and I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 252) to remove the political disabilities of John Julius Guthrie, of North Carolina, to report it favorably. There is a petition in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 523) to remove the disabilities of Thomas M. Jones, of Virginia, to report it favorably. This party has a petition, and his bill is correct in form according to the usual method of practice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 325) to remove the political disabilities of Van R. Morgan, of Virginia, to report it favorably, there being a regular petition and proper papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1915) to remove the political disabilities of Henry H. Sibley, a citizen of Fredericksburgh, Virginia, who has a proper petition, to report it favorably with an amendment confining it to political disabilities rather than to legal ones, according to the usual form of passing such bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2866) relieving the legal and political disabilities of Fitzhugh Lee, to report it with an amendment confining it to political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment, and a similar amendment of the title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2701) to relieve William G. Jones, of Alabama, of political disabilities, which is correct in form, to report it favorably. It is accompanied by a petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 674) to relieve C. D. Anderson of his legal and political disabilities, to report it with an amendment striking out the words "legal and," so as to make it in the form hitherto followed by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2359) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to reserve from sale ten thousand suits of old and disused Army uniform clothing, now in the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and to transfer the same to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the issue of clothing to certain enlisted men of the Army, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 726) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 321) authorizing appointments and promotions in the Medical and Ordnance Departments of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 319) making retirement in the Army and Marine Corps after a certain age obligatory, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2223) for the relief of Robert F. Winslow, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 686) for the aid of geological and other surveys in the several States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. STEVENSON subsequently said: I ask that the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs touching geological surveys may be placed on the Calendar. The report was ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A STEAMER.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 369) to change the name of the registered steamer Oakes Ames to Champlain, to report the same back without amendment, and ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 742) for the relief of Henry A. Webster, V. B. McCollum, and A. Colby, of Washington Territory, pre-emptors on the Makah Indian reservation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CHANGE OF LOCATION OF A BANK.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1573) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the question is taken, I should like to inquire how that stands in the order of business—how far down the list?

The CHIEF CLERK. It is No. 226 on the order of business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where did we leave off the last time?

The CHIEF CLERK. At No. 178.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that we are not far off from his bill in the order of business; and if we take up the unobjected cases and go straight through, we shall soon hit his bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. This is an important question; and I should very much like to see it settled now if the Senator from Vermont will allow it to be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not the slightest objection except that other committees make reports and everything goes on the Calendar, and bills at the bottom of the Calendar will not be reached, unless by this jumping process, if we do not go straight through.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. It is a matter of local interest, and I hope the bill will be acted on.

Mr. WRIGHT. If I can have the attention of Senators, I will remind them of the fact that this bill was reported adversely by the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does seem to me that the Senate ought not to take up this bill at present until there is an opportunity for debate. As a matter of course, the morning hour will soon pass around; and it is only consuming time unnecessarily.

There are certain objections to this bill. The Committee on Finance heard patiently the parties who seek to have this bank removed, and reported adversely to the bill. It is a proposition to transfer a bank with a capital of $50,000, a bank with scarcely any business, from Hagerstown, Maryland, to the city of Washington, where under the general law no bank can be organized with a capital of less than $200,000. There were quite a number of legal objections made to the removal of this bank. The question needs some debate, and I submit to the Senator from Maryland whether it is better to take up this matter in the morning hour. He may call it up at any other time, and I am willing then to meet the case; and if, after debate, the Senate think under the circumstances that it ought in this particular case to consent to remove this bank, in deference to the wishes of the Senator from Maryland, I shall have no further objection. But there are very serious objections to the establishment of a precedent of this kind. It is the removal of a bank with a capital of $50,000 from Hagerstown, Maryland, to Washington, District of Columbia. In the first place, the bank itself is in a languishing condition, admitted to be so, and the reason it is desired to remove it here is because it is in a languishing condition. It has a capital of only $50,000, when by the general banking law no bank can be organized in the city of Washington with a capital of less than $200,000; and for obvious reasons. It is also a transfer of a bank, not within the general law, from a place with more than its share of circulation, to another place with less than its share of circulation; but it is the transfer of a bank from the State of Maryland, in one jurisdiction, to another jurisdiction which has already got more than its proportion of bank circulation.

These are considerations that influenced the committee, after hearing the parties interested, to report against this bill. As a matter of course, the Senate may pass it if they please; but it ought to be taken up at a time when we shall feel at liberty to state the objections to the bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I can see no objection to this transfer. It is true this bank has but $50,000 capital, and that is probably one of the reasons it did not succeed in Hagerstown; but the great reason is that Hagerstown is in the midst of an agricultural region where they do not want great banking facilities. Mr. Tome, the gentleman who has bought this stock, is a man of means living near Havre de Grace, in Maryland, a man that I have been acquainted with for years, who is worth several hundred thousand dollars, the result of his business capacity and care as a banker and as a dealer in lumber. I am sure if he gets charge of the bank it will prosper as everything he has undertaken has prospered. I trust we shall dispose of the bill at once and be done with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1573) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, now located at Hagerstown, Washington County, Maryland, to change its location to the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia; but the capital stock of the bank shall be increased to $200,000 before beginning business in the city of Washington, and its name shall be changed to the Citizens' National Bank of Washington City. Whenever the stockholders representing two-thirds of the capital stock, at a meeting called for that purpose, shall execute a certificate under the corporate seal of the bank specifying such determination, and cause the same to be recorded in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and shall publish notice of such contemplated change of location in two weekly papers in Hagerstown not less than four weeks, thereupon such change of location and name shall be effected, and the operations of discount and deposit of said bank shall be carried on in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senate has now presented to it for the first time the question whether it will establish as a precedent the transfer of these banking incorporations from one jurisdiction to another. Thus far I believe the question has never been presented to the Senate. There has been one case where there was a transfer from New York to Indiana, but that bill was passed without any consideration whatever, was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, perhaps without a meeting of the committee, after a mere consultation, and it passed the Senate at once, immediately on the report.

When this bill was presented to the Finance Committee we for the first time took that question up and proceeded to consider whether as a matter of policy, as a precedent that could be safely followed, it was advisable to provide for such transfers. The chairman of the committee has already pointed out the objections that obtain in this particular case. We have at times transferred banks from one county to another in the same State where they have the same laws touching taxation and matters of that kind; but there has been no case except the one to which I have referred where there has been a transfer from one State to another.

The Committee on Finance, after examining the entire question, reported adversely to this bill. It is proposed to take a bank that is in a failing condition, that it is admitted by its friends, as the case was presented to the Finance Committee when the question was under consideration, is almost compelled to go into liquidation where it is, and to transfer that crumbling institution to this District, where different laws obtain with reference to the amount of the capital stock and with regard to taxation, and to be managed by the same persons as chief managers who manage the institution where it now stands, or if not to be managed by them, then it is proposed to transfer it into the hands of other persons in a new jurisdiction where there are new rules with reference to taxation.

If this practice is to obtain, the consequence will be that banks will obtain these special privileges in a State where the taxation is according to one rule, and after they have been running for some time and they find the taxation is not such as suits them, or the laws and rules and regulations obtaining there are not such as suit them, then they will ask to be transferred to some other jurisdiction where there are different rules and different laws in reference to taxation.

There is no trouble about this matter. These men can let their bank go into liquidation; they can withdraw their circulation and come to this District if they want to do so; but I submit that it is a most unsafe and dangerous precedent for Congress to establish, after a bank has been in operation the length of time this has been, to transfer it from Maryland to the District of Columbia; for by the same rule you can transfer from Maine to Iowa, or from South Carolina to Minnesota.

This question is fairly presented to the Senate now, and we are to determine it for the first time. If we shall establish this precedent, then there is no ground upon which the same transfer might not be claimed with reference to any and every other bank in other States.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I wish to make but one remark. This bill passed by a large majority in the House of Representatives; nor is the adverse report here the unanimous report of the committee of this body. There is no trouble about the matter. The bill having passed the lower House, it came here with the expectation that it would certainly pass this, and therefore when the honorable Senator [Mr. WRIGHT] says that the bank is in a languishing condition, he should remember that that originated out of the fact that the bill passed the House, and it was not conceived for a moment by those interested in it that there would be any hostility to it here. That is all I have to say.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do I understand the Senator from Maryland to say that the present condition of this bank has grown out of the fact that this bill has been pending so long?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. From the time it first originated in the House of Representatives.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator from Maryland cannot certainly have forgotten that this fact was stated to the committee, three months ago at least, as a reason why this transfer ought to be made, because of the then condition of the bank.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Not the condition of the bank itself; but it was said in the committee that there was plenty of banking capital in the town and vicinity; that there was a State bank in Hagerstown and also a national bank, and one six miles from it, and two or three savings or loan institutions, and that therefore it could be spared, and that neither did the community nor the stockholders object to it. All were satisfied, and the stockholders generally desired the removal. The only trouble about it was that as soon as it was ascertained that the bill had passed the House of Representatives the bank at once measurably ceased to do business, for every one took it for granted that the removal would take place. That accounts for the condition of the bank at the present time, as stated by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yet the fact remains, as I understand, that all those banking facilities to which the Senator refers were substantially where they are now when this bank was established. These men went into the business with their eyes open and established this bank there. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows the fact that the capital of this bank was impaired largely. My recollection is that the Comptroller was decidedly in favor of the report as made by the Committee on Finance; that is to say, that there was no necessity for this removal, and that this was a most dangerous precedent. Now, that the Senate may understand this question and know where we stand, I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SCOTT, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call being concluded, the result was announced—yeas 39, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, and Wadleigh—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckingham, Clayton, Conkling, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Hamlin, Ingalls, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sherman, Windom, and Wright—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Brownlow, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Goldthwaite, Hager, Harvey, Howe, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, and West—19.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3160) in reference to the operations of the shipping commissioners act, approved June 7, 1872, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills on the Calendar will be taken up in their order.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (H. R. No. 1562) for the relief of Jacob Parmerter, reimbursing him for defending a suit brought against him for an official act.

Mr. INGALLS. I think there is a mistake on the Calendar as to the point where it was left off. The consideration of the Calendar was supended at Senate bill No. 499.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The understanding was that this bill should be laid over and not lose its place.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was not the understanding, at least on my part, for I suggested that it be laid over, and somebody asked that it lie over informally, but I said let it go over on the Calendar as if laid aside in the regular way. I should have no objection to its coming up now if the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] were in his place to explain it. It involves a question which was considered the other day by the Judiciary Committee, and the result of which as found by the Committee on the Judiciary was exactly the reverse of this. There may be a distinction between the propriety of indemnifying a collector of customs and indemnifying a judge of a United States court.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is not referring to the same bill that I am.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am referring to the Parmerter bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I am referring to the bill (S. No. 499) to authorize the issue of a supply of arms to the authorities of the State of Nebraska.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was suggesting in support of what the Senator said that the Parmerter bill went over in the regular way, so that Senate bill No. 499 should be resumed.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not urging the consideration of Senate bill No. 499 at the present time; but I desire that it shall not lose its place on the Calendar, as it seems to have done from the printed list.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there is any doubt, let this bill be laid aside now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside and the next bill on the Calendar will be read.

A. B. DYER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow to Captain A. B. Dyer, now brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance, in settling his accounts, the sum of $9,853.42, and such outstanding checks as may hereafter be paid by the Treasury Department and charged to his account, the whole not to exceed the sum of $11,709.29, that being the amount deposited to his credit in the United States depository at Norfolk, Virginia, in April, 1861, as certified by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and transferred by the depositary to the rebel authorities at Richmond.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire what committee reported that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report? If there is I should like to hear it.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. LOGAN on the 10th of March:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 498) for the relief of Captain A. B. Dyer, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

The committee are satisfied, from an examination of the evidence, that the report of the Military Committee of the House contains a full and sufficient statement of the facts; it is therefore adopted as the report of this committee, and is in the words and figures following, to wit:

["House report No. 78, Forty-third Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 498) for the relief of Captain A. B. Dyer, present the following report:

"From the testimony presented to the committee it is shown that the claimant, in the spring of 1861, was in command of the Fort Monroe arsenal, and charged with the disbursement of public moneys on its account, part of which public moneys had been placed to his credit by the Treasury Department with the depositary at Norfolk, Virginia; that he used all proper endeavors to withdraw this money, and that his action in the premises was approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury.

"From the reports on file in the Treasury Department it is shown that, on April 13, 1861, the sum of $11,709.29 was to the credit of his disbursing account on the books of the depositary at Norfolk.

"The amount mentioned in the joint resolution for his relief which passed the House of Representatives on January 16, 1866, was $9,778.42, as shown by his check-book, but since that date an outstanding check for seventy-five dollars has been paid by the Treasury Department and charged to him, making the amount charged against him on the books of the Treasury $9,853.42.

"The committee are satisfied, by the proofs in the case, that he is entitled to the relief asked for, and report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would ask the chairman to explain the difference between the $9,853.42 that the report says he is entitled to and the $11,709.29 which is made the limit in the bill. I do not understand from the report how the difference is made up.

Mr. LOGAN. That is because the accounts are not all settled, and there can be no settlement without the action of Congress, and the $11,000 is the extreme limit to which the allowance can go. I am willing that the bill may be amended so as to say it shall be limited to the amount actually paid. That was the intention.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The report shows exactly nine thousand and odd dollars with this last check charged to him as the actual loss. My suggestion is that the bill be limited to what he has really lost. If it turns out that he lost more he must come again.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection. The report shows exactly the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to amend the bill by striking out the amount in the bill, "$11,709.29," and striking out all about outstanding checks, and inserting "$9,853.42."

Mr. LOGAN. Let the last sum agree with the first and then it will make no difference.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River;" in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 363) for the relief of Lucius A. Rountree;

A bill (H. R. No. 1763) to permit Edward Savage, of Minnesota, to enter one quarter-section of the public lands or any legal subdivision of the same; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2206) to grant an American register to the bark Azor.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed this day the act (S. No. 193) for the relief of Uriah Porter.

The message also announced that the act (S. No. 192) for the relief of Siloma Deck, having been presented to him on the 16th of April, and not having been approved and signed by him nor returned to the Senate, in which it originated, within ten days (Sundays excepted) as required by the Constitution, had become a law under the provisions thereof.

DAVID A. TELFAIR.

Mr. RANSOM. This morning, while I was not in the Chamber, the Committee on the Judiciary reported adversely on the bill (H. R. No. 3093) to relieve David A. Telfair from political disability, and it was postponed indefinitely, because of the absence of a petition from this gentleman asking for the removal of his disabilities. I ask unanimous consent to have the vote reconsidered and the bill recommitted with his petition, which I now have.

The vote indefinitely postponing the bill was reconsidered.

Mr. RANSOM. I now present the petition of David A. Telfair, of North Carolina, praying the removal of his political disabilities; and I move that this petition be referred, and House bill No. 3093 recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 3160) in reference to the operations of the shipping commissioners' act, approved June 7, 1862, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BANKING AND CURRENCY—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of Friday last, which is the bill (S. No. 446) to restore the rights of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. WRIGHT. It will be remembered that on last Wednesday, on the coming in of the message of the President vetoing Senate bill No. 617, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] then in his place, gave notice that he would call up that veto message and bill this morning at the expiration of the morning hour. The Senator from Indiana is absent; but I understand that he is quite willing that the question should be taken up and does not insist that any postponement should occur by reason of his absence. I therefore move to postpone the pending measure and all other orders, and proceed to the reconsideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes, together with the veto message of the President thereon.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to correct the statement he has made. He was absent and I was present at the time. No notice was given of a motion after the morning hour should have expired to-day to proceed with this bill. I am quite sure of that. On the contrary, this was what transpired: on the reading of the message, I moved myself that it lie upon the table and be printed, which was the order of the Senate. Subsequently the Senator from Indiana remarked that I had not specified a particular day, although I had given reasons for not proceeding to-day, when I would move to take up the message; and he suggested Tuesday of this week. A little colloquy occurred in which, assigning as my reason for not taking it up on Tuesday the expected absence of Senators and other things, I declined to accede to that, and inquired of the Chair whether he understood that there was any understanding or arrangement of that sort, to which the Chair replied that he did not; and there the subject was dropped. No notice whatever was given by any Senator that on Tuesday or any other day he would move to proceed to the consideration of the message. I state this now as mere matter of fact, to correct the statement made by the Senator from Iowa, as I believe that occurrence took place in his absence.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am not aware that it would make any essential difference whether I was mistaken in reference to the actual facts or not. I think the report in the RECORD will show that the Senator from Indiana stated—perhaps he did not give notice formally—that he would call it up to-day, and indicated to the Senate that he would expect to press the matter at this time.

Mr. CONKLING. He simply suggested that to-day should be agreed upon.

Mr. WRIGHT. At all events, I think it is fair to state that the expectation was that the question should be presented at this time; and I therefore make the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed with the consideration of the bill (S. No. 617) to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes, returned by the President of the United States with his objections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no charge of this bill, of course; but the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] requested me to say, if it should be asked to be taken up before his return from Boston, where he has gone, as Senators know, upon a mission that was imperative, and which has relation to the same subject to which the Senate yesterday gave its attention, that he desired that the bill should not be taken up until his return, which will be, I suppose, (as he speaks to-morrow,) on Thursday night, so that he will be here on Friday. I say that for the sake of the Senator from Missouri, who desires, as every Senator naturally should desire, to be present when so important a measure is considered by the Senate, and when it is so desirable as it seemed to him and as it seems to me that the Senate should be as full as possible, so as to get the best judgment of the whole body of the representatives of the States and the people on the subject. I hope, therefore, that the Senate, out of consideration to the one circumstance that I have named—and that is the only one I rise to now—will decline to take up the bill to-day and that we may have an understanding, if it shall suit Senators, to take it up on Friday next.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This motion I suppose is amendable. I gave notice——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion can be divided by taking the question first on postponing the pending order, and then on proceeding to the consideration of the bill named.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then I ask that it be divided in that way, with a view of calling on the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 1, the civil-rights bill. Notice was given some time since that that bill would be moved; and if it is postponed for every subject that comes up the session will slip away, we shall soon have the appropriation bills here, and it will not be considered at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is the unanimous desire of the Senate to have a vote on the veto message presently; but we know very well that no practical result will occur from that vote, and therefore it is perfectly right that the Senate should fix a day for taking the vote that will enable every Senator to be present. I was not here the other day when the message came in, and therefore I do not know what then occurred except from the RECORD. I trust the Senator from Iowa and all the Senators will agree that this matter may be fixed, say for Friday or Monday next, when I hope we can take it up and have a vote without objection and without debate.

So far as I am individually concerned, I am perfectly ready to vote to-day; but as no notice has been given of the purpose to act to-day, as no time has been fixed, as this is a question of great importance on which every Senator would desire to vote, as one of our colleagues is properly absent for a public reason known to every one—one that he could not avoid, one which in the ordinary deference that is shown on such occasions we ought to look to—it does seem to me that it is reasonable that this matter be postponed until, say Friday or Monday next; and, if it is in order, I will move that the bill be made the special order for Monday next, and I trust we may have a vote then without debate. So far as I am concerned I have no desire to debate the question. After a three months' debate on the whole subject-matter I think it would be cruel, in the present condition of public affairs, for us to have another enlarged debate on the veto message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the pending and all prior orders be postponed and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the finance bill. The Senator from New Jersey calls for a division of the question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I withdraw that call as the same result may be reached without it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to state to the Senate that I have received information from my colleague-elect that he desires to be here to vote on the finance bill, but he has been detained by the circumstance that the lieutenant-governor, on whom the office of governor falls when he retires from it, is absent from the State, and not anticipating that the vote would not be taken as early as to-day I have not notified him, so that he has not been able yet to leave the State of Massachusetts. If a day be fixed far enough in advance for a dispatch to reach him and for him to reach the Capitol I shall be glad to have it fixed at as early a day as that.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it has ever been the habit of the Senate to consult the convenience of its members as to the order of business, especially when so doing works no injury to the public interest. Not wishing to forsake the ancient courtesy of the Senate, I cannot, in view of the facts before us, vote for the motion of the Senator from Iowa. There is fair and just reason for deferring the vote upon the bill referred to, and no public interest will be advanced by immediate action upon it. Several Senators are absent. One of the seats of Massachusetts has by reason of death been vacant for weeks; and if every reason for delay were left out of view except that he who has just been chosen to that seat, and who is detained in Massachusetts by pre-existing public duties, wishes to be here when the vote is taken, that reason alone would govern me. Other Senators are somewhat similarly situated.

The ordinary mode of providing for absences is by what are called pairs. This case is one in which every name on the roll should be answered. It is not a case adapted to pairing off. Various considerations make a pair awkward and objectionable. The bill can become a law only by a two-thirds vote. Whether two-thirds shall be found in its favor or not, a pair, in logic and fair offset, should be a pair of two on one side and one on the other; this is the rule on which in like cases pairs have been adjusted in the past. Such an adjustment would not be consented to probably now were we to endeavor to obtain it for absent Senators, and even if negotiations and arrangements would succeed, why should we resort to them, what good can we do by pressing this matter to an instant conclusion? We ought to agree quickly; I trust we have reason and wisdom enough to agree upon a bill which will command a majority in both Houses and the approval of the President also. In my opinion we shall be blamable if we fail to do so; but efforts to do this need not wait an instant for final action on the already defeated bill. It can hardly be supposed that two-thirds will be found in favor of a vetoed bill which in its first flush secured but five majority, and that in the absence of several Senators who would have voted against it. Indeed, except that the Constitution requires the Senate to reconsider the bill, it would not be worth while ever to act on it again. Be this as it may, neither the Finance Committee, nor the Senate, nor any single Senator need wait an hour in devising further legislation in order to dispose of a bill already past resuscitation.

I ask, then, why should we attempt to vote to-day rather than to-morrow? Why should we be churlish of courtesy in order to make haste? If the Senator from Missouri, absent in consequence of the death of a member of the Senate, wishes to record his vote, and there were no other reason for a little delay, why should we deny him so harmless a favor when no substantial good can be pleaded for doing it? So of every other absent Senator.

I am ready to vote to-day. I am content to take the vote, leaving the bill to speak and the message of the President to speak each for itself. I have no wish to bring on a debate, though I do not shrink from it. I know of no Senator who will insist on debate; and if a mere vote is all that remains of the proceeding, I submit that the considerate and courteous course toward absent Senators is to take up the bill now by consent and fix a day and an hour for the vote, giving time to the absent to reach their seats.

Turning now from things of the past, I wish to say a word about things of the present and the future.

Business halts and waits for final action in Congress. Unfortunately, as I think, the idea gained great prevalence before the session opened that something must be done by Congress to cure the panic and its wounds. The public mind was possessed by the belief that legislation in Congress was the "be-all and end-all" of business needs, and waiting and hesitating under this impression the country has suffered greatly. We ought to act promptly, or learn and declare promptly that no action will occur at the present session.

For one, I am ready to surrender any special views or preferences I may have in order to harmonize and act with those who differ with me. I will not depart from the principles at stake; but in all else, in all matters of detail, I will go to the verge in order to agree on a bill acceptable to a majority, of such character that the President can unite in approving it. Such an effort ought to be made calmly and dispassionately, and made without delay. Believing that a majority can be found in the Senate animated by a spirit of conciliation, the subject presents no difficulties which may not in my belief be solved and surmounted.

To this work we can all address ourselves at once, without waiting a moment for the last formality which awaits the measure now on the table.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I believe I am as willing to be generous as any Senator here; but I cannot really understand the desire there is on the part of some Senators to postpone this vote. I am as willing to accommodate the Senator from Missouri, for that appears to be the only point in this case, as I am any other Senator; but I am not more willing to accommodate him than any other Senators. But why we should act as if there was importance in the presence of a Senator here on a vote that no one expects to be carried by two-thirds majority is something that I cannot understand. I presume every Senator will vote as he did before; but I know nothing about that; I know I shall, as far as I am concerned. There are Senators who would vote with us—if I may use that expression—who are not present; but we do not ask delay on their account. We know their presence would not change the result. It may be far more important to this country that certain gentlemen should record their names in reference to this measure than I now appreciate. I do not claim to have capacity to understand the great importance of the recording of votes on this question at this time. Still it may be very important.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW] has been absent for weeks in a feeble condition. I hear no man appealing to the Senate to postpone this matter for that man in his unfortunate condition. There is a new Senator-elect from Massachusetts; and it seems to be important that he should record his vote. His vote has not been recorded. Why the importance of recording it now? I cannot understand. I cannot see the great importance of it. I do not know that this event is of such a great and grave character that the Senate should postpone it for two days, for three days, or for five days, to secure the presence of any Senator on either side. It may be so, however; and if I can have my dull comprehension so enlightened on this subject as to satisfy me that my generosity ought to reach to that extent, I shall certainly be willing to do it. We are willing—and when I say "we," I am at least—this morning to take the vote without a word of debate. That was my intention when I came into the Senate. I do not know whether it is desirable on the part of Senators who voted against this bill to debate it or not; and certainly it is very immaterial to me whether that is their desire or not. As to whether it is our desire or not will be answered when the time comes. I did not suppose there would be anything said in reference to the message on the bill, or about any future action on the subject-matter. I did not know that we should be called upon to consider future action in reference to this vote. However, one of the Senators says that this bill might be postponed and something might be done for the purpose of relieving the country. I am not going to say whether we have tried to do anything to relieve the country or not; I will let that go; but if we are to infer from what is on our table anything as to what might be done that would be agreeable, I cannot imagine what it could be. I cannot conceive in my mind what kind of a bill Senators have reference to that would be agreeable in this state of the case.

I am perfectly submissive. I am willing to submit to whatever the friends of this measure desire. If they desire a postponement, I have no objection. If they do not, I am ready to vote now, whether there are six men here or fifty who stand by me, and I think it is very immaterial, so far as the result is concerned, whether Senators that are absent will be present, or whether some of us may be absent at the time to which this postponement shall be made. I presume nearly every Senator here feels friendly one toward the other; at least I hope so. I know I am so insignificant that if I were absent for a month no Senator would get up and ask for the postponement of a bill until my return. I have never heard of such a thing on my account, and do not expect it to be done. It depends, I suppose, on the importance of the individual as to whether his vote is to be recorded or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say to my friend from Illinois that I did not ask the postponement for Mr. SCHURZ on my own motion or as a volunteer, but because he requested me to say to the Senate that which I did say, and which I understood him to say had the approval of a good many Senators to whom he had spoken on the subject.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not doubting that at all. I will not mention names; but a Senator spoke to me this morning and said that on this bill he was paired with Mr. SCHURZ, and I supposed from that information that Mr. SCHURZ left with the understanding that the bill might be voted on before his return.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, if we can judge of what may be the action of the Senate by what has fallen from the lips of Senators this morning, it is at least probable that there will be no discussion on the reconsideration of the bill that the President of the United States has returned to us. If that be so, I concur in the general opinion which has been expressed. I do not see the great importance of voting upon it to-day over voting upon it on Friday or Saturday. The Senator from Illinois suggests that it is not, in his judgment, of so much importance that we should extend the time as a mere act of courtesy to absent Senators. That is his opinion clearly; and yet it is equally clear, as the Senator knows, that in the minds of the absent Senators it may be more important than it is in the opinion of the Senator from Illinois. The Senator from Illinois may deem it less important than they do. I, too, had a conference with the Senator from Missouri, as well as the Senator from Vermont; and I do know that the Senator from Missouri desired very earnestly to be present when the vote should be taken upon this question. He so expressed himself to me in unequivocal and emphatic terms.

Mr. PRATT. I should like to inquire of my friend from Maine whether the Senator from Missouri did not pair on this question before he went away?

Mr. HAMLIN. I think he did say to me that he would endeavor to secure a pair, not knowing what would be the action of the Senate, but still expressing in terms beyond any doubt his earnest desire to be allowed to vote upon the question. I so understood him; and he said to me that he should make that effort to pair for the purpose of saving his vote if the matter were pushed to a vote. But, I repeat again, he earnestly expressed the hope and the desire that the courtesy of the Senate would be extended to him, so that he might have the opportunity to record his vote.

Now I want to say one word to my friend from Illinois. When he leaves this Hall for any occasion, either private or public, and suggests to me in terms half as earnest as did the Senator from Missouri that he desires to secure his vote upon a given measure, I will pledge him my vote then and at all times that he shall have that opportunity, as I will to every other Senator of this body.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there to make a remark?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to any Senator applying to the Senate to stop its business for his benefit; but I will say to my honorable friend from Maine that I shall never ask him or any other Senator in this Chamber to postpone the business of the Senate on account of my absence. I will seek a pair, so that my record shall be clear; but I will never ask to stop the wheels of legislation on my account.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have been here longer than the Senator has, and I never yet asked the postponement of any question in this body to accommodate me, and I think I never will. Still if other Senators deem a vote upon any given question important to themselves, I certainly, as a matter of courtesy, will give it to them.

Perhaps there is no member in this body who has been more restive under the long debates that we have had here than myself. I have taken occasion two or three times to express my opinion of those debates; and I think we may economize time more in doing that than in not postponing any business, but extending or fixing the time when we shall take this vote, while we have other subjects that will engross our attention, and subjects, too, that we must meet, discuss, and decide. Why, here is the question of Louisiana. It will come up like Banquo's ghost, and this is crowding it out, and the quicker we can cut the head off the ghost and be done with it, the better. Then my friend from New Jersey has intimated to us that another important question, in which I too am interested with him, is ready for our discussion and our deliberation. I only say that to me it will be indeed a marvel if this body has so far forgotten its ancient courtesy and its dignity that we will not extend to the Senator from Missouri the right to be here and record his vote on this measure if he wants to do so, whether we regard it as important or not.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I have great reverence for the courtesies of the Senate, and I think they should be continued through all time. But it is not a month since in this Senate I said to the body that I had received a telegram announcing to me a great calamity as I believed it to be, in a death in the family of one of my friends and the fear that another death would soon happen in my own family; and I asked the Senate not to adjourn that day, but to finish the question which was then before them which was in my charge, so that I might go home and see the people that I desired so much to see. The Senator from Missouri was in his seat, and he did not say one word in behalf of my agony, neither did a single member of the Senate. The business of the hour was forced upon me, and I was compelled to remain here without being able to go to see those whom I desired so much to see. The question then was only one of convenience to a Senator who had made up his mind to make a speech on that day, authority for which he had had from the Senate a few days before; but I was not allowed to go home. I can see no reason why, after so great a discourtesy to me, a Senator who was here and could have paired on this question should control the whole body of the Senate in his absence. Why is it now that this courtesy is to be extended to him when it was denied to me when I had much more reason for desiring it, and when the Senate in its great love of courtesy ought, I think, to have allowed it to me?

The question which is to come before us on the veto message is one of great public importance, one which ought to be settled now, and one upon which the Senator from Missouri or any other gentleman who is not here can have his views known to the whole country. There will be no trouble in his having the newspapers state upon which side he would have voted; and the mere making of a speech I do not think will affect the question, no matter how eloquent it may be. Courtesy is delightful between individuals, and for all time in the Senate it has been observed; but it is queer that just now on a great public question it should be urged with so much vehemence, when the other day, when it was only a question whether a gentleman ought to speak one day or the next, it was refused to me.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, if my memory serves me, when the veto message was read in the Senate the Senator from New York arose and stated—I speak from recollection mainly—that it might be necessary for the purpose of the examination of the message and the consideration of the question to take up that day and the following one, and that doubtless, as had been our custom, no session would occur on Saturday; and alluding to Monday of the following week, stated that memorial exercises would probably occupy that day; and while not fixing the day following, Tuesday, (which is to-day,) he intimated that an early day of the week the subject should be considered; as I and others understood it, virtually fixing Tuesday, without naming the very day, for its consideration. The Senator from New York stated what would occupy the preceding days, including Monday of this week, and then said that at an early day of this week the subject should be considered. At a later hour in the day the Senator from Indiana, if my recollection serves me, called up the subject and gave notice that he would on Tuesday, to wit, to-day, call up the subject. The Senator from New York, I think, answered the Senator from Indiana by stating that there were Senators absent and that he intended to be absent, perhaps he might not be here. Now, if I understand the question and what has been expressed by what may be termed both sides of this question, it is proposed, as far as disclosed here to-day, to take the vote on the message without debate. Practically I can see no object to be gained by delay. True, the Senator from New York and the Senator from Maine have stated that a certain Senator is absent, and therefore in deference and out of courtesy to him the whole Senate should arrest its business.

In this connection let me say that the mover of the proposition to consider this question to-day is quite ill upon his bed, unable to be present. The Senator from Indiana does not ask the Senate to postpone this question until he is able to be present. Although making the motion to take it up and not able to be here, still, according to the understanding generally, or more partially—I cannot now say—no one proposes to defer so far as he is concerned, and he does not ask that on his account the question be postponed, but allows it to be called up by some other Senator for the purpose of carrying out the understanding, as he understood it, of last week.

Now, if the vote of the absent Senator to which the Senator from New York referred has no material effect on this question, why prolong the subject, why defer it until next Friday? Certainly we already have had one week's notice. I think it was on Wednesday that the message was submitted to the Senate. It is to-day Tuesday. We have therefore had one week's time to consider it, and let us take up the question to-day. Suppose it is deferred one week longer, may there not be other Senators absent then? In justice to them, as well as to the Senator from Missouri, it would be claimed to postpone it still later. I can readily understand, if there was a disposition to debate this question, why the Senator from Missouri might desire to be here, as he is so fruitful in debate, and why the Senators who are co-operating with him might be anxious to defer for the purpose of securing his valuable aid in their behalf, but, as it is stated now that it is proposed not to debate, why defer when his vote cannot possibly affect the question? As has been stated, the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BROWNLOW,] unable by physical prostration to be present now, is not paired, and I am told, and I understand, that the Senator from Missouri is paired. This takes the vote of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNLOW] from the supporters of the bill, and we make no complaint of this, but prefer to carry out the understanding by voting now even at the loss of his vote.

I cannot understand what object is to be gained by a postponement. Certainly we cannot amend this bill; we must either vote for or against it. Therefore this bill can have no bearing upon any other bill that may be proposed or may be in process of perfection, if there be such. Hence it seems to me we should proceed, unless there are Senators here who feel in duty bound on the question of courtesy to defer to the request of the Senator from Missouri. If that be the turning-point, I am not to be outdone on the question of courtesy; but so far as official duty is concerned, so far as legislative progress is demanded, I think the Senator from Missouri, the Senator from New York, all Senators, have had ample notice by the week's intimation that the bill would be taken up to-day.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Will he state one reason of substance, independent of the will and wishes of any Senator, why a vote should be taken upon the pending bill to-day rather than to-morrow?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will answer by asking the Senator from New York substantially the question that he has put to me: What possible gain will there be by a postponement of this question until next Friday?

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I do.

Mr. CONKLING. We shall gain this fact: Being asked virtually by the newly-elected Senator from Massachusetts, whose seat has been vacant so long, that the representative of that State may be permitted to record his vote, we shall give him that opportunity; it costing us nothing—nothing. I stop there, thinking that that is a sufficient answer.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The answer of the Senator from New York would be conclusive, in my judgment, and control my action, if the newly-elected Senator from Massachusetts had been present and voted upon the bill. The Senator has been elected since. He did not participate in the proceedings on this bill tending to its passage. If it were the case of a Senator who had participated and who had been taken ill, and had made the request, I could readily see there would then be a clear case; but as the Senator from Massachusetts was not present, it seems to me no injustice whatever can be done him by action to-day. It now appears to me from the answer made by the Senator from New York that the object is more to secure an additional vote upon his side, which from his stand-point upon this question cannot affect the issue, for it requires a two-thirds vote to carry the bill now, and no one claims that.

Mr. CONKLING rose.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Let me conclude my answer, and then I will give the Senator from New York all the time he wants.

Mr. CONKLING. I merely want to understand——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. From my stand-point I am satisfied that we cannot carry this bill by a two-thirds vote. It would be a stultification of my intelligence to suppose or believe it could be carried, when we passed it by a majority of only five; but I say that upon no snap judgment, but upon notice of a week, we are here to-day in accordance with the intimation given by the Senator from Indiana, and in simply following out that indication I say, when it is interpolated now that a Senator must come who was not a Senator when the question was argued in order that his vote may be counted, it seems more, in my judgment; that it means an increased vote rather than courtesy to a Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. Now may I understand my friend?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Very well.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand him to maintain that the fact that Massachusetts by reason of death has been as to one-half her voice silent upon this question all these weeks is a reason why she should be denied now the consideration which otherwise would be given to her? Shall I understand the Senator to argue that because death has vacated one of the seats from that State, therefore we should not wait for the Senator to reach here as we would do had death not occurred and had the State been heard on all these questions? If so, I think the argument is very extraordinary.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Not because of the death of a Senator, which I lament as much as any other associate. I hold the Senator from New York to the precise issue. The newly-elected Senator from Massachusetts never participated in the debate or cast a vote upon this question. His vote could not change the result had he been present on the passage of the bill, for it carried by a majority of five.

I cannot therefore see it in the light of the Senator from New York; and I must repeat that if the question had turned upon a single vote, I could readily see how it might be prudent, necessary, and just that Massachusetts should be fully represented here. I may remind the Senator that such a contingency of a close vote was prudently looked after. The Vice-President was present at the last stages of the bill, that in case there should be a tie Massachusetts might be fully represented upon this floor; so that there were no rights jeopardized. I say that the Senator's point would be a strong one if the passage turned upon a single vote; but it did not when we had a clear majority besides on the passage, and now require a two-thirds vote to pass the bill. Apply to every State the position the Senator takes. Suppose there might occur the death of Senators in many of the States of the Union, would we on that account arrest all business of the Senate, without just regard to the public interests?

Mr. CONKLING. But if my friend will further pardon me a moment, does he know that every Senator is to vote again on each side as he voted before? And if he does not, what arithmetic teaches him that there is to be four majority for the bill? How does he know that there may not be only one majority against the bill, or some other majority either way? In ignorance of that fact, how, even by his own argument, can he deny a State its right to be here and to be heard?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator from New York is so fruitful and suggestive in his scope, so much more ingenious than the rest of us, that he forecasts the future while I have reference to the past. There is the difference. I was not alluding to what might occur. I was alluding to a fact already occurred, and I should have been disclosing unwarrantable ignorance to have said that the vote would be a majority of five upon a future vote. That depends upon a contingency. I was speaking of a vote already taken and recorded on our Journal, on the passage of the returned bill, by a majority of five. The Senator cannot divert me by supposing that the vote might be otherwise when taken a second time. I am speaking simply upon a fact, and reminding the Senate that in the case of the new Senator from Massachusetts it is doing him no injustice, as he did not participate in the proceedings which ended in the passage of this bill by a clear majority; and upon that hypothesis I said, which I now repeat, that if he had been here it would have but reduced the majority to four, ample to have carried the bill, and therefore no injustice would have been done to Massachusetts. I have no disposition to do any injustice to any State. I am as ready as any Senator to do justice, and will close what I have to say by suggesting that if any two, three, or half a dozen Senators here upon either side rise in their seats and say that upon a question of courtesy they feel themselves bound to defer to the Senator from Missouri, with the understanding upon both sides that we are to have no discussion, I am willing for one to defer to courtesy by postponement, while I believe it better to act at once.

The quicker way to strike down the "ghost" alluded to by the Senator from Maine on another bill—and perhaps by illustration employing a ghost in this bill, for in the minds of some it is hardly known whether it is contraction or expansion, and therefore ghost-like, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont—the quicker way will be to take a vote without debate now. I do not share in the implication that this bill contains a ghost, for I am satisfied there is an increase of currency in it, but very moderate expansion. Believing that there is more substance than shadow in it, I am willing to determine its fate by a vote now. I urge this to avoid all possible and probable irritation that may arise from a debate. No good can come of it. Crimination and recrimination will follow an extended discussion of the merits of the bill and the President's message. I am studying harmony. I urge such co-operation as will save us acrimony, which is only productive of evil rather than good.

Congress and the President, co-ordinate branches of legislation, are at issue. Let the merits lie where they will, can we gain anything by arraying each other upon an honest difference of opinion? I trust the vote will be taken in silence.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I sat about twenty minutes in a perfect maze at what was said by my friends on the right; but they seemed to me to be playing at a game of riddles which I could not, by any force of my intellect or scratching of my old head, comprehend. Here was the leader of the Administration insisting on postponing a vote on this bill, although it was perfectly apparent that the bill could not pass, could not obtain two-thirds of the votes of the Senate; and here were those who knew that a vote must kill their bill, which they had advocated, insisting upon that vote being taken, and their measure being thoroughly laid out, or, to use the figure which seems to prevail so much, "their ghost being laid." That is very difficult for a dull man to comprehend; I could not understand it at all; but now I begin to get a little light upon it.

It seems that those who advocated this bill insist upon a vote now. Why? That they may condemn the Administration by having a majority of the Senate vote against it, and the leader of the Administration wants to postpone it in the hope that there may be a majority of the Senate to support the Administration. Now, I am a very indifferent sort of man in that contest. I am pulled by contrary emotions. I was against the bill before, voted against it, will vote against it again; and yet on the other hand I am not a supporter of the Administration, and I do not know exactly that I should follow in the path of my distinguished friend from New York who marshals his hosts always with so much skill, and generally with so much effect. But really, as a practical question, it is a very strange thing that there should be any difference about this matter. Let the vote come to-day, or let it come to-morrow or next day or the day after, the fate of the bill is sealed; and if there is to be no debate upon it, then it matters very little when the vote shall come.

Nevertheless, there is some force in what the Senator from New York has said, that upon this bill there should be as full a representation of the States as possible, the Senate should be as full as possible; and, therefore, although the postponing of it may have the effect of supporting the Administration by a majority vote of the Senate, especially if the intimation of the Senator from New York is true that some of those who voted for the bill before have seen the error of their ways——

Mr. CONKLING. There was no such intimation from me.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator got from me more credit, then, than he was entitled to.

Mr. CONKLING. I simply asked the Senator from Michigan whether he knew that every Senator on each side would record himself again as he did before; for unless he knew that, he could hardly say that the presence of Massachusetts would still leave a majority of four in favor of the bill. That was all.

Mr. THURMAN. I know; but it was a very pregnant question, and I may be pardoned if, in my dullness, I thought it meant a great deal more than it implied as the Senator now explains it. What I was going to say is that notwithstanding a postponement may have the result of sustaining the Administration, if the Senator from New York can obtain it, yet in view of the fact that one Senator is absent and that another State is only half represented and will be fully represented in a few days, I shall be bound to vote for the postponement.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I think there must be something underlying this discussion which I know nothing of, for I cannot understand what importance there possibly can be whether the vote is taken to-day or to-morrow, particularly if there is to be no debate. I would prefer to have a little debate on this subject. I think we could show that the President of the United States in his veto message has placed himself before the country in a way that cannot be sustained, that his veto message is in direct conflict with the message——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont will state his point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The point of order is that on a motion to take up a bill the merits or demerits of the message on which we are to vote are not before the Senate and cannot be debated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order as made in this case. The question is whether the Senate will postpone and take up, and the Chair understands that all the speeches that have been made have been made on the Louisiana bill, which is the unfinished business. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I apologize to the Chair, inasmuch as the Chair had not stated to us that the Louisiana bill was before the Senate, as I heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had stated that distinctly when he announced that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then my respectful apology is due to the Senator from Missouri as well as to the Chair. I had the impression from the discussion that it was something about taking up the veto message; but it seems I was mistaken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the Louisiana bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate but a very short time; it is not my intention to debate this question at this moment; nevertheless I am glad that the Senator from Vermont raised the point of order, because it sustains me in the position that I took a while ago. I should like to discuss this question to show the position occupied by gentlemen who have voted with the Senator from Vermont upon this very measure. I know that the debate will not be protracted; hence I can very well understand how sensitive those gentlemen are on this subject; but I will not take advantage of that fact at this time.

I rose merely to state that there must be something underlying this discussion which I have not thus far been able to perceive, for I cannot see that it is of any great practical importance whether this vote be taken to-day or to-morrow or at a future day not far off. It is said by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber with whom I have voted on this financial question that the vote on the veto is to be taken without debate. As far as I am concerned individually the Senators who have made that statement have spoken without authority from me. I would like permission, if I had the opportunity and it were agreeable to the majority of the Senate, as I am afraid it would not be, to discuss this question whenever it does come up. I am prepared to show that the position we took can be maintained before at least the western portion of the United States, that this bill is a bill of great importance to that vast section of the country; that, if something is not done of the nature which this bill provided, that portion of the country will suffer enormously. I do not wish to present these views in a mere partisan aspect. I should like to present those views again as they have heretofore been presented to the mind of the Senate; but notwithstanding, I repeat what I said a while ago, that I will not do so just now.

Now, sir, to conclude a debate the importance of which I do not understand myself as to whether the vote shall be taken to-day or to-morrow or at a future day not very far off, I would state that my colleague is absent from the Chamber; that he is absent in the discharge of a most delicate duty, and the very nature of the duty which calls him away from us entitles him, to say the least, to very great consideration. Therefore in view of the fact that my colleague is absent in the discharge of the duty to which I have referred, I would suggest and express the wish that the further consideration of this subject be postponed to next Friday. I do not see that it can make any very great difference; I cannot see that any public interest will be injured by that postponement; and in the discharge of the duty which I believe I owe to him as his colleague, which he would do to me, I trust the majority of the Senate will postpone the consideration of the bill so as to give him an opportunity to return and record his vote upon a measure in which he has taken such a leading part.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the suggestion that this vote be taken without debate I think is the result of the judgment of two, three, or four Senators who have thought that that was the better course. Certainly it could not have been the result of a general consultation of Senators. So far as I am concerned I desire that this matter be debated, and I think we have reached a point, and perhaps for the first time reached a point, where discussion will be of great use to the people of the country.

Now I am very sure that if this question is taken up to-day instead of on Friday next there will be a debate upon it. I do not know but that I might be willing to concede on Friday next, if such was the general desire of the Senate, that the question should be taken without discussion; but if, contrary to the suggestions which have been made, it is insisted that the bill be taken up for our action to-day, then I certainly shall desire to be heard upon it before the final vote is taken. I am prepared, as I think are many Senators around me, to discuss this matter fully and fairly, and to vindicate that declaration of the President made in his veto message that the theory on which the bill is founded "is a departure from true principles of finance, national interest, national obligations to creditors, congressional promises, party pledges on the part of both political parties, and of personal views and promises made by me" (the President) "in every annual message sent to Congress and in each inaugural address." I think that that is capable of demonstration; and if it is true that the bill which was passed was a violation of congressional and executive promises by previous legislation and popular speeches, it is well that that should be understood by the country and understood by the debates that go out from this Chamber.

Something has been said about our disposing of this bill in order that we may get at a measure that will satisfy all parties. Sir, I do not believe it is possible to frame in this Congress a bill which will satisfy all parties. I believe that a bill having that end in view is likely to be dangerous to the prosperity of the country. I speak for myself when I say that I will vote for no measure that contains one dollar of inflation, unless in connection therewith there is full provision for the redemption of that dollar which shall be issued.

Gentlemen talk about relieving the country. It is these congressional agitations which agitate the country. Had it not been for this long discussion, had it not been for this Congress, these questions would have been settled and business would have returned to its normal state, the country to its ordinary condition of prosperity, two months ago. It is these agitations, these assumptions on one side that the people were clamoring for currency, and on the other, in some degree certainly, propositions of contraction, which have thrown the business community in a ferment, which have led the people to think there was some evil in their midst, in their business relations, which could only be cured by the legislation of Congress. I believe that business during the last few months has been struggling against this cause, going out from Congress, more than from its normal and real condition; and if we could lay these propositions on the table and not revive them in any form, there would be a general recurrence to ordinary business in every part of the country.

Sir, I do not believe that the call for inflation which is insisted upon on this floor has any sincere backing in any part of the country, unless perhaps I might say in some portions of the South. As I take up papers from the West, and not the leading papers, but little papers in communities separated from the ordinary influences which go out from this capital, expressing the opinions of small constituencies, apparently suggestions of individual minds or of small communities, I find that they sustain this veto, and that they denounce all schemes of inflation. I find, furthermore, that some of the grea leading papers of the South, for instance like the Louisville Courier-Journal, also denounce inflation and praise the President for the stand he has taken in this veto. I believe that the country is instructed up to the point by the discussions which have already gone on, and which we may still further have, that we have spread out to the people and are thoroughly understood by them, that these measures of inflation are simply painting the hectic flush upon the check of consumption; and that they are not subserving any useful business purposes. I think the gentlemen who have clamored for these things upon this floor, many of them, will find that their constituents do not agree with them in these schemes. In order to promote that result which I believe is necessary for the safety of the country I am disposed to have discussion upon this bill. I do not know but that I may change my mind upon that before Friday next if it is postponed until that time; but if it is not so postponed, then certainly I shall ask that there be discussion of the proposition.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Mr. President, it has been said by some Senators this morning that probably some bill could be matured that would satisfy everybody, pass almost unanimously, and receive the signature of the President.

If that can be done every sensible man will rejoice, and every Senator who desires such a consummation ought to labor to that end. And the question is, what course will be most likely to accomplish such a result? The bill now on our table has been returned by the President with his objections; and the Constitution makes it our duty to reconsider the bill. It is well known to all of us that this bill cannot be passed by the requisite majority of two-thirds. Then, of course, Congress must consider and pass some other bill, or no relief whatever can be granted at this session. What, then, is the best way to smooth the elements and secure the enactment of some other bill? Is it to keep this veto hanging here and thus from day to day increase the irritation this debate discloses; or shall we dispose of it to-day, and, that being out of the way, go good-naturedly to the task of maturing another bill? The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] who evidently desires, in the interest of the party to which he belongs, to create as wide a disagreement as possible in the ranks of the republican party—and with consummate skill and cunning he has been putting his finger upon every spot he hoped to find sore, hoping, no doubt, to drive on a general and an angry debate over this veto—my facetious, eloquent, and able friend from Ohio is astonished at this debate, astonished that the friends of the Administration should dread a victory, and therefore vote to postpone the consideration of this bill. He is also astonished that the friends of the bill desire to take it up, when its fate is sealed and its death certain. He says they seem to wish to have their languishing bill absolutely killed; this, he thinks, is unnatural.

Well, Mr. President, if a painful thing must be done, a brave man desires to have it done quickly. When the bill is killed our anxiety will be over, and that will be a measure of relief. My friend is so constant a reader of the Bible that I venture to remind him of the experience of King David. When his child was sick he fasted and "lay all night upon the earth." But when he was told that the child was dead he "arose from the earth, and washed, and anointed himself, and changed his apparel; * * * they set bread before him, and he did eat." After this another child, a son, was given to him; "he called his name Solomon: and the Lord loved him."

Mr. EDMUNDS. He did not go and cut his head off, probably. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARPENTER. Nor do the friends of this bill propose to cut its head off. But there is a power in this Chamber as potent over this bill as was the providence of God over the life of the child of David. This bill is doomed. It is wounded to death by the veto; it must die. And the quicker this inevitable fate is reached the quicker shall we, its friends, recover from our mourning. Let what must finally be done, be done to-day; and then we will bathe and dine and be ready on the morrow to meet the Senator from New York, who proposes that another bill be considered to please everybody and grant the needed relief. [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARPENTER. Always.

Mr. THURMAN. Does he propose that the fathers of this bantling shall perform the same penance that David performed?

Mr. CARPENTER. My friend from Ohio will be compelled to endure for the present his curiosity as to the course the friends of this bill will pursue. He will neither be consulted nor informed in advance of action in the Senate upon that subject. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will dispose of this matter to-day by a vote. And when this bill is disposed of we will see what can be done next.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I am obliged to differ from those with whom I have previously acted upon this question. As has been said we have had long debate; there has been said upon this subject all that is needful; the country is impatient of the long delay; and there is no reason, in my judgment, why the Senate should further delay to act. Furthermore, for the purpose of allaying the angry excitement that has just sprung up about this bill and for the purpose, when that is allayed, of passing to some measure that, being a compromise, will be satisfactory in some degree to the parties in this Chamber and to the country, it is desirable, as has been stated, that this measure should be disposed of, and disposed of as soon as possible. For these reasons I am in favor of taking up this measure and disposing of it without debate.

It has been suggested here that courtesy to a Senator who is absent requires that this question should be postponed. If that is the rule which is to govern this Chamber, then farewell to the day when any business will ever be acted on. There never will be a time when some Senator who desires to vote on some measure will not be absent. The Senator from Missouri could have paired, or did pair. His presence or his absence here will not affect the fate of this bill. His position upon it is so well known before the people of this country that the absence of his vote will not affect him in any degree whatever; and, it seems to me, I confess, absurd that it should be argued here that because the Senator from Missouri is absent, therefore the Senate should delay action upon a measure of this kind which has been debated for months.

Furthermore it is suggested by the Senator from California that we should postpone this bill for the sake of having further debate. The country has been talked to death upon this matter. The country demands that talk should cease and that action should be had; and if the Senator or any other Senator here promises that the result of delay is to bring about a new debate, then in behalf of this country I urge that the matter be brought to a close now.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that my remark was just this: that if this measure was taken up to-day there would unquestionably be debate upon it; I intended myself to debate it, but if it went over to Friday, I did not know but that I might waive the privilege which I had as a Senator of speaking on the question.

Mr. CONKLING. I think I am warranted by what has been said by some Senators friendly to the bill in hoping that we may come to such a decision as is indicated now by the Senator from California: and therefore I ask that by general consent we fix Friday at two o'clock to take up the bill and vote upon it then without debate. This I know is deemed objectionable by several Senators who intend to vote for the bill. I hope the Senator from California, as he indicates, will consent to it, and that the Senator from New Hampshire will also find no objection to it I hope, the proposition being that on Friday at two o'clock it be taken up and voted upon without debate. I ask the Chair to ascertain the sense of the Senate, if he will, and see whether any Senator is seriously incommoded by this arrangement.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent to an understanding that the bill vetoed by the President of the United States shall be taken up on Friday next at two o'clock and voted on without debate.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Chair allow me to hear my friend from Iowa for a moment?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will state to the Senator from New York that when the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] obtained the floor after the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] had concluded his remarks, I endeavored to obtain the floor but was unsuccessful. I understood the Senator from Missouri to make an appeal in behalf of his colleague who is absent, and based upon an agreement, or perhaps a promise made to him at the time he was leaving, that he would appeal to the Senate to have this question postponed until Thursday or Friday. Am I correct in the assumption?

Mr. BOGY. Until Friday. My colleague cannot be back before Friday.

Mr. WRIGHT. What I wish to understand is this: Does the Senator from Missouri say that he asks, in virtue of a promise that he made to his colleague, that this question shall be postponed until Friday?

Mr. BOGY. I have not paired with my colleague. I only expressed a wish that the subject might be postponed because of his absence, and because I told him I would use all my influence, if I had any in this Chamber, to bring about this postponement.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I understand the Senator from Missouri to appeal to the friends of the bill, he being a friend of the bill as I understand, in virtue of that promise to his colleague, that the question shall be postponed until Friday.

Mr. CONKLING. He has said so virtually; he does not hear the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BOGY. I did not make an appeal. I expressed my wish on the subject, giving the reason why I wished the bill postponed until Friday.

Mr. WRIGHT. Now I wish to understand whether there is any objection on the part of any Senator to an agreement that we shall take the vote on Friday at two o'clock without debate?

Mr. BOGY. I will say this in answer to the question. I am in favor of postponing the vote on this subject until next Friday for the reason which I have already given; that is, the absence of my colleague; but I am not willing so far as I am individually concerned as a member of this body to say that the vote shall be taken without debate. It may be that I shall not debate the question; but it may be that I shall be disposed to do so, and I do not wish to be estopped from debating it if I shall think proper to do so.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to have a clear understanding. If this question can be postponed until Friday with unanimous consent that we have a vote then without debate, I am willing to agree to it. If there be any objection on the part of any Senator to that, if it is indicated that there will be then debate, I shall insist on a vote at this time.

Mr. CONKLING. Having the floor at the time I yielded to my friend from Iowa, my wish was to see whether we cannot succeed in gaining assent to the proposition to postpone until Friday; and therefore as time does not allow me to consult the honorable Senator from Missouri in conversation, I ask him if he will not, in order that we may go on with some other matters now awaiting consideration, yield his half inclination to debate, and consent that we may fix Friday at two o'clock to dispose of this bill?

Mr. BOGY. I am perfectly willing. That is what I have attempted to say—that the question ought to be postponed until Friday at two o'clock without any understanding as to the fact whether there shall be any debate or not.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, he does not notice the point of my appeal. He sees of course that if he interposes that condition he breaks up all arrangement. He disables the Senate—because one objection will have that effect—from coming to a conclusion which I hope may be satisfactory to everybody. I ask the honorable Senator whether any remarks he may wish to submit upon this question will not be equally satisfactory if submitted upon some other financial measure, of which, doubtless, there will be several; and if he will take it into consideration, I think he will allow us to dispose once for all of this vexed question by fixing a time to vote without debate: he has heard Senators declare that if there is to be debate, they will object to an arrangement on that ground. The Senator now holds in his hand alone the opportunity to put an end to this matter in a way apparently satisfactory to all others and gratifying to those who are committed by promises and assurances made to Senators not here. He will enable them to put an end to the whole thing and at the same time to carry out some private understandings, and I think he will reserve every right and convenience of his own as to any remarks he may design to submit, as there will be many occasions, and soon, when he can express his opinions as freely and as cogently as he could do on the particular measure now lying on the table. Therefore I renew my appeal to the Senator, and I ask him, if he will, to give his consent that Friday at two o'clock be fixed not only, but that the condition insisted upon by other Senators may be made a condition also, namely, that the vote shall be taken without debate.

Mr. BOGY. I cannot consent to be an obstacle in the way of carrying out the wish of the majority of this body; and if it is left to me alone to assent to a proposition of this kind, I cannot hesitate as to the course to pursue. I am aware of the importance of the bill. I think it is important for those who have agreed with me heretofore; what they may do hereafter I cannot say; but nevertheless, as was well said by the Senator from New York, there will be plenty of opportunities to present such views as I may entertain, and it is not very important that I should insist upon debating this very question. I will therefore yield that point also, because I think it is of the greatest importance to the country and the commercial portion of our people that, so far as possible, one step should be made toward quieting the public mind in relation to the financial question. In view of that fact I will, so far as I am concerned, consent to abide by the wish of the Senate and not insist on debate.

Mr. CAMERON. It seems to me that now we are coming pretty near a solution of this question. Apparently we cannot settle the matter to-day. There will be debate, and perhaps it will take three or four days to reach a result if debate begins to-day. But it seems now pretty well understood that we may take it up and vote on Friday without debate and conclude the matter at once. I am more anxious to get a bill which shall benefit the country than I am to show my determination to support the bill which we passed the other day. I want to benefit the country; and if my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] were not a partisan, I would appeal to him to join me. I think the better way for us is to take this offer and set Friday at two o'clock as the hour for taking the vote. I trust the gentlemen with whom I am acting on this question will agree with me in this. If it is proper, I will make the motion that the message be postponed until Friday at two o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion would not be in order at present, the bill referred to not being before the Senate. The Senator from New York has requested that there may be unanimous consent and a general understanding that this bill be taken up, considered, and voted upon on Friday next, at two o'clock, without debate. Is there objection to that proposition?

Mr. MERRIMON. I am disposed to be as obliging as anybody if I can be so without compromising what I believe to be the public interest. This measure is one of too much importance to be passed over lightly or by a silent vote. I believe that those who advocated this measure owe it to themselves and owe it to the country to examine thoroughly the message sent to the Senate by the President and give the country to understand whether it rests on solid ground or not. I do not believe it does, and for one I shall claim the right, when the matter comes up, to state the reasons why I do not so believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina objects to the arrangement proposed.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say that I would very cheerfully, and will, if the Senator from North Carolina should revise his present idea, agree to the proposition suggested by the Senator from New York, although I say to him now in all frankness that I do not think such an agreement to a silent vote upon the bill will produce the result that seems to be desired, to wit, prevent a discussion of the presidential veto, because some other measure is sure to come up——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Louisiana measure, for instance, which is up now and is being debated. [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. Yes; the Louisiana measure; and some Senators who voted for the bill that has been vetoed will feel it to be their duty, as do the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Missouri, and perhaps others, to review that veto and to discuss it, and they will discuss it in such wise that according to the common course of human nature the friends of the President will come to his rescue. A debate, therefore, is simply unavoidable. Nevertheless, I am willing for one that the vote may be taken to-day or any day, in silence, on that veto; but it will not accomplish the purpose which seems to be at the bottom of the request, or I suppose it is, and I do not find fault with that purpose, to procure action without any discussion of the presidential veto. A discussion of that measure is sure to come. That veto is too important a measure. It will be historic in this country, and it cannot pass without being discussed.

While I am on this subject, and this being very pertinent to the Louisiana bill which is under consideration, I wish to say one thing more. I have thought from the first that there was but one way in which an agreement could be arrived at by a majority of the Senate upon the currency question—not perhaps a proposition to which I would give my support, but a proposition which might command the support of a majority in Congress. Sir, in the British Parliament, under circumstances such as this country has been placed in for the last five months, an administration that failed to produce a measure and make it an administration measure and stand or fall upon that measure, retain office or go out of office on that measure—an administration which would refuse to do that could not hold office twenty-four hours. And I have thought that although we do not turn out administrations in this country upon an adverse vote of a House of Commons as they do in England, yet if we were back to the days of old Andrew Jackson or Martin Van Buren we would have an administration measure on which the administration would stand or fall.

Sir, when the sub-Treasury bill was introduced during the administration of Mr. Van Buren there was no hesitancy on the part of the administration to take the responsibility, and so it has been from time to time that an administration did not suffer measures to drift along in the troubled channel of congressional debate without ever letting its purposes or its wishes be known or its influence be felt. Now, it is said that although that has been done, and the bark that was launched on the waters has struck upon a presidential rock, yet something may yet be arrived at by way of compromise which can command a majority of the votes in Congress and the presidential approval. Well, sir, if something can be done to that effect, and that will be of benefit to the country, no one will rejoice more than I, and no one will give a proper measure, one that I believe in my conscience to be proper, a stronger support than will I if it shall have that effect, no matter from what part of the Chamber it may come, whether from the Administration side, if there is any Administration side any longer, or whether from the opposition.

But, sir, my own belief about it is that if the course had been taken which has been taken by strong administrations heretofore in the history of this country, which is taken always in England, and upon which an administration agrees to stand or fall, we should have been out of this difficulty long before this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I like that speech. [Laughter.] It sounds so like old times, and it sounds like the future times if this Administration could only be broken down. My friend from Ohio has given us a foretaste of what he is looking forward to if this Administration should be broken down; of how no man would be suffered to live in the democratic party in this Chamber or out of it who did not bow to the presidential will; and he, naturally enough, takes an interest in the question. He has a perfect right to do so. But, sir, the distinction between republican and democratic administrations is, and it has always been so, that in republican administrations the Chief Magistrate attends to his own constitutional business and does not undertake to dictate to Senators or Members of the House what they should do in order to carry on the business of the country, whereas in the good old times of Andrew Jackson and such, if any democratic Senator failed "to come to time," "to go it through thick and thin," right or wrong, he was "read out of the party." So far as his personal opinions went, saving the last clause in later times, of his right to differ personally about the Wilmot proviso, but bound always to vote with the administration then, right or wrong, before that, and with that exception, no Senator was allowed to have a position in his party who did not stand by the administration. It was for that reason that the people of this country broke down the administrations which had preceded that of Mr. Lincoln, the democratic administrations, because they were not suited to carry on the liberties of the people. It was because under those there had been constant aggression through executive and administrative influence chiefly, more than all others, against the liberties of the citizens of this country and against those equal protections of the laws which now live in your constitutional amendments, and that brought on all our woe, as the saying is.

No, sir; it is no criticism upon the administration of the present President of the United States that a majority, if you please, of Senators who think as he does upon general political questions think as he does not upon this question. They are still just as much entitled to be in the party and of it, according to the principles that regulate the republican party, as I understand them, as have those who happen to-day to think as the President does. It so happens that the Constitution of our country was not framed upon the English precedent; it so happens that the people of the United States who ordained our Constitution did not leave it like the British constitution, that the King should have his party in Parliament all the time, and when his party in Parliament failed all the advisers and officers of the King should depart from their offices and somebody else should come in, and then on the next day, they being overturned by an adverse vote, somebody else should come in; but we undertook to have an ordered government of the people, whose departments should be separate and distinct, each department responsible to the people and not to the others for the propriety with which it managed its part of the affairs of the nation. So it has come that administrations neither press measures, except in the constitutional way and as the Constitution provides, nor do Congresses cease to be supporters of parties and administrations because they differ with him who happens to be Chief Executive of the nation for the time being.

But, as I have said, in the good old times now so long ago, when things reigned in their English purity, and when men like Jackson and Van Buren carried Senates with a high hand and compelled obedience, as if Senators and Representatives were serfs owing a feudal allegiance to their lords, and were compelled to "come to time," as the saying was, it went differently; and the consequence has been, as a Senator behind me has reminded me, that he tried to uphold Mr. Van Buren in that way under this coercive notion of party discipline that the Senator from Ohio believes in, and the result was that the whole house tumbled down together. We believe in the fourteenth amendment and in the right of every Senator in our party to have his individual opinion; and when we ascertain that we cannot act together for the general good of the nation and at the same time have individual independence about particular measures, it will be time enough for us to dissolve without the assistance of that party whose name is so long ago.

But, Mr. President, this perhaps is a little apart from the Louisiana question. [Laughter.] I should like to have the Secretary read the Louisiana bill, as I have not heard it for a good while. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is strictly in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will waive that request, and now return to what I rose chiefly to say; and that is to repeat what I said some time ago which Senators did not seem to hear, and that was that I was authorized and requested by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] if this question should come up, to ask in his behalf that it should be postponed until his return; that he went away from here almost, as you might say, under the order of the Senate; at the request of the city of Boston in its municipal capacity, the home of Mr. Sumner, to deliver an oration to-morrow in memory of his decease. Under such circumstances, if that Senator desires to be here for his personal feeling or gratification upon that measure, which will not be harmed by two days' delay, ought we not to grant him that grace? He has not gone about his own business. He has gone about the business of the Senate in a character and capacity that he could not well refuse. Therefore in his name I appeal to Senators, if I can be allowed to appeal in his name and at his request, not to press this measure to consideration until Friday, when he may be back.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, when I entered this body five years ago, there was one man who was facile princeps in the republican party on this floor. He was a man to whom that party owed more for its very existence than to any other man or ten or a hundred or a thousand men who lived. In the course of time that man, in the exercise of his right to think for himself, saw fit to differ with the Administration on a great public measure; and the result was, as we all know, that he was humiliated in every form that the republican majority in this Senate could humiliate him; that he was thrust out of that committee at the head of which for so many years he had served, and with such distinction and such benefit to the country, and that the time came when that Senator had to seek—no not to seek, but to obtain—a place on humble committees of this body by the votes of the democratic Senators in their caucus. Ah, Mr. President, with so signal a case before us and with the eulogies yesterday pronounced ringing in our ears, I think it will not do for the Senator from Vermont to talk about the independence that is tolerated by the republican party——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. THURMAN. Is it perfectly fair to interrupt me just now?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the Senator's consent; but as it is not agreeable to him——

Mr. THURMAN. I do not like a speech interjected into the middle of mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have never said that the President of the United States should exercise any improper influence in passing measures or preventing measures from being passed through Congress; but I have said, and history will bear me out in saying, that from the time of George Washington and the influence he exerted to procure the ratification of Jay's treaty down to this very day, there never has been a strong administration that commanded the approbation, nay the admiration, of the people, that did not let a lawful, legitimate, and proper influence be felt in the Halls of Congress; not a proscriptive, not an unjust, not an improper influence, but that kind of influence which is expected from the great head of a party, so as to prevent that party from being dashed to pieces by collision among its own members. That is what I say, and that is what the history of the country will bear me out in saying; and the Senator from Vermont would not himself vote for a man for the presidential office who would be so weak, or so blind, or so dull as to let his party revel in the beatitudes of collision, of strife among themselves, without raising his finger to produce harmony in their ranks.

I cannot say that that exactly has been the fault of our administration. When the San Domingo project was before the Senate I think that the opinion of the Executive was very well known. I think that the exertions of the Executive were very plainly felt. I think that that provision in the treaty made by Babcock that the President should use his influence with the Senate of the United States was most faithfully executed. But now, when it comes to a question what shall be done on the great subject of the currency, whether we shall drift off into an illimitable sea of irredeemable paper money on the one hand, or whether we shall rigidly, rigorously, and with unnecessary haste go back to specie payments on the other, or whether we shall take a wise middle course that shall bring us back to a sound currency without unnecessarily disturbing business or oppressing any class of the community, we are told forsooth that it is the duty of the President to wrap himself up in a cloud, hidden from the eyes of Congress, let his own party array themselves in nearly equal divisions on the question, and finally suffer a measure to be enacted which, according to his own principles long avowed, he would be bound to arrest by his presidential veto.

Well, sir, I must say that I am getting nearer to the Louisiana bill than any one has done yet, for that is a bill that brings into view the action of the President of the United States; and it so unfortunately happens with me whether he acts affirmatively or whether he does not act at all, in either event my judgment condemns him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Ohio has again defended the propriety of Administration influence over the councils of Congress, not the influence of formal messages such as the Constitution contemplates, but that more powerful and secret influence, as it may be called, which democratic administrations were so accustomed to exert; and, in defense of the propriety of that apparently, he refers to a republican administration, that of George Washington. I suppose that was republican; I do not remember the time, but I imagine it was.

Mr. THURMAN. The democrats were called republicans in those days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Vice takes often the name of virtue, we are told by the poet; and if I were a democrat I believe I would call myself a republican in order to hold out to the public some title to political respect. But he alludes to Mr. Washington's interference for the ratification of the Jay treaty, so called, as being, I suppose, a just subject of executive influence. Now, I hope I do not misunderstand my honorable friend. I hope I do not understand him to say that. If what we are told of the influence of General Washington about that treaty is true, but which I do not believe, the President of the United States committed a great wrong against the Constitution of his country, and a great violation of his duty. Does the Senator from Ohio mean to say that it is fit under our form of government, or any other that is a rightful government, that one department of the Government shall by threats of displeasure, or by offers of reward or office, undertake to control the Senators of States or the Representatives of the people in their conscientious and sworn action upon public measures? Does the Senator mean that? And yet if he means anything by referring to the interference of General Washington with the Jay treaty he means that back-door and underhanded influences were used, that Senators were appealed to by the hope of reward, or were appealed to by the threat of displeasure and disappointment in respect to matters as to which they might expect to have some influence if they acted as pleased the administration.

Mr. THURMAN. I mean no such thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then what does the Senator mean? Does he mean that General Washington sent the treaty to the Senate with a message recommending its confirmation? If so, he means what everybody means as to what Presidents are to do, because that is what the Constitution says, and that is what the President of the United States has done now. He has sent a message to Congress on the subject of finance, and has vetoed bills from time to time according to his duty, and Senators and Members have acted upon them without destroying anybody's party or without building up anybody's hope of destroying the party, I take it, to any great extent. Then, if we are to recur to what former administrations have done, and what the Senator says they ought to have done, we must look, if my friend means anything by his allusion, to what democratic administrations have done; we must look to those other influences than the constitutional ones, and we must be told that this Senator is threatened that his friends shall be removed from office if he does not stand by a treaty, and that that Senator is told that his friends shall not be appointed to office if he does not stand by the treaty, and that this measure for the improvement of some public river or harbor in his vicinity shall be vetoed or shall be worked down by underhanded opposition if he does not stand by the President. Sir, is that according to the theory of right government? I do not think it is. I know it was the democratic practice in old times, and I believe that that was one of the causes which broke down, as I hope finally and forever, that party with the principles which it then had and which I believe there is some disposition still to stick to.

So, I say, instead of arraigning this President of the United States or any other upon the ground that he has not consolidated the votes of republicans in this Chamber either for this measure or against it, as he in his conscience happened to think, the fact is a matter for the gratitude of the people of this country rather than for reproach that he is endeavoring to preserve their liberties by attending only to those constitutional duties that have been conferred upon him, and leaving us to perform ours that have been conferred upon us.

But the Senator says that that liberty, after all, has not been accorded by this Administration. He has referred to the instance of a Senator who has now gone from us, as to which he has said that because that Senator did not support a certain treaty or a certain measure—I have forgotten the precise language the Senator from Ohio used—he was subjected to every humiliation by the Administration and by his party that a Senator could be subjected to. Let me say to the Senator from Ohio and to the Senate, and to the country if it can hear me, that no man ever uttered a greater mistake, no man ever committed a greater error in statement in his whole life, than the Senator from Ohio has done in that statement. I know he has not intended to misstate; but I happen to know personally that the reverse is the truth. I know that the Administration did not make war upon that gentleman on account of any opposition of his to a treaty or to any other thing. I know that that Administration did not make war upon him at all. I know that he differed with the Administration. I know that he differed with some of those gentlemen with whom he was accustomed to act—he did not with me on that point, for I was as strongly against the San Domingo treaty, if it is lawful to say so here, as the Senator from Massachusetts was, and so were many other Senators. The Senator from Ohio ought not to have forgotten—perhaps he did not know, as he was not in a situation to know very well—that the non-election of Mr. Sumner to a certain committee was not for any such cause as the Senator has stated; that it was solely for a personal cause, and a cause the propriety of the action upon which commended itself as well to the personal and intimate friends of that Senator as it did to those who were not such, if there were any of that kind here. The Senator therefore has no right to say that that Senator or any other has been pursued by the Administration or by his party for any opinion that he felt himself bound to entertain upon any public, or private question I might add, because the Senator referred to has not been insulted.

Mr. HOWE. If it is agreeable to the Senator, I should like to suggest here in confirmation of what the Senator from Vermont is remarking that the very Senate which declined or neglected to put that Senator at the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations did tender him at the same time the chairmanship of one of the most important committees in this body.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had concluded, I believe, substantially what I had desired to say, and that was, I repeat now once more, that the allusion which has been made by the Senator from Ohio to a Senator having been condemned or pursued by the Administration in any way, or by his fellow-Senators in this Chamber, is an entire mistake so far as it had relation to anything that the Senator referred to as the cause of what took place. And, Mr. President, I think I am in a better situation to know about what took place in the consultations of the republican members of the Senate than the Senator from Ohio. I again say that I know he did not intend to misstate or to overstate. I should be very glad to say considerably more upon that subject were it not for the unhappy fact that we are now speaking of the attitude and position of a brother Senator who has gone from us, and who cannot explain for himself his own position at that time.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not rise——

Mr. CAMERON. Will not the Senator from Illinois allow me to make a statement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CAMERON. For a moment?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not care to yield. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania can probably make his speech after I get through mine, which will be very short.

Mr. CAMERON. I shall of course not insist; but I did intend to say a word in continuance of what the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Vermont have just said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield and must not be interrupted.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Pennsylvania is so persuasive that I cannot refuse to do anything that he asks me. I will yield.

Mr. CAMERON. I will not interfere with the Senator from Illinois. I will state to him that I only wanted to say a word in connection with the same subject which was started by the Senator from Ohio and spoken of just now by the Senator from Vermont; but I shall wait until the Senator from Illinois concludes.

Mr. LOGAN. I know, sir, that a majority of the friends of this bill, of those who voted for it on its passage, entered this Chamber this morning without any disposition whatever to say one word upon the subject, and they were perfectly willing to take the vote and let that settle it. They felt, I am sure, that that would be best for all of us, not having reference to party associations at all, but on account of the debate having been prolonged so long as it had been, and really the latter part of the debate had been rather of a character calculated to arouse feelings. I for one certainly thought it was better for all of us that we should vote on this question to-day without discussion. There has been no disposition manifested by the friends of the bill on either side of the Chamber to discuss it. I was in hopes there would be no disposition to precipitate debate by any persons in this Chamber; but we have entered upon a character of debate not exactly pertinent to the bill. The debate has got down to a reference to George Washington, Andrew Jackson, and Martin Van Buren, and the action of a Republican caucus some time ago. How long it will have to continue before we get to the merits of the question before the Senate I cannot tell; but it reminded me a good deal of a Fourth of July oration that was once being delivered, and the gentleman, a very eloquent speaker, commenced at the origin of man; at the third hour he had arrived at Noah's flood; and by that time the crowd concluded they would go to dinner and hear the rest of it at some other time. From this discussion this morning we are now where we shall arrive at the main point of this question probably in four or five days.

I was very sorry to hear our distinguished friend from California, with the sincerity and earnestness with which he always advocates measures, announce that he felt a good deal like talking on this question. I did not suppose that there was any Senator in this Chamber who had so refreshed himself within the last few days that he was able to discuss this question any further, because certainly a man must have renewed his strength if he is able to-day to renew the discussion on the financial question. But I am always pleased to hear our friend from California on any question. Probably at this particular time I should be less pleased, however, to hear him on this question. But occupying the stand-point he does, it is much easier to fight a dead lion than it is a live one. I can always fight a thing that is dead a great deal better than a thing that is living, because it cannot fight back. This bill being dead by the President's veto virtually, the vote to be taken is a mere form. Everybody knows the bill cannot be passed; but I suppose every one desires to put himself on record; I know I do. But what benefit is to be derived from discussing it I have not the power to discern; others may have; unless it be on a principle which I will state presently.

When I said that those who are in favor of the bill had no desire to discuss it this morning, I stated the truth, because nothing could be accomplished by discussion; we could not change Senators' minds by discussing it so as to get them with us, and they could not change us. Hence I see nothing in the world to be accomplished, and I do not, so far as I am concerned, unless I am forced to do it, propose to allude to the question, during this time of voting, more than I am compelled to do.

The bill being dead, it may be that the Senator from California and others may desire to strike it a lick after it is dead on the principle that the boy fought the dog after he was dead. He killed the dog, and after he was dead he pounded him. A man came along and said, "My dear boy, what are you pounding that poor dead dog for?" Said he, "I am going to show him that there is punishment after death." [Laughter.] That may be what my friend from California desires. He desires to learn that there is some suffering in this bill so that when it is dead there is punishment after death. There is no use of fighting the poor thing when it is dead.

Mr. SARGENT. I might desire to prevent a resurrection.

Mr. LOGAN. Prevent a resurrection! Well, one man cannot do that. That is not in the power of one individual. That reminds me of what was said once to a friend of mine who was a candidate for office. He went into a convention but got no votes, and when he came out he said to one of his friends, "Why did you not vote for me?" "Why," said he, "I was for you all the time; did you not know I was your friend?" "Well, I thought so," was the reply, to which the response was, "But what can one man do in a great convention like that?" [Laughter.] The resurrection of things, generally, is not brought about by one man.

I am in good humor about this thing; I am not mad with anybody; this is a question of opinion between Senators, and I am not going to get in a bad humor about it, especially when I am beaten. That is the time when I am always in good humor. But if you commence this debate, you who make yourselves responsible for it will have to take the responsibility. We have no disposition to do it, and you had better let it alone. No good can come out of it, no benefit to the country, no benefit to the Senate, and no benefit to any one individually.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. I would ask the Senator from Illinois if he is aware of the fact that the agreement on the part of the Senate was resisted by the Senator who was the author of the bill which passed; that I had cheerfully consented that this matter should be taken up on Friday and disposed of without a word of debate—was willing to yield as far as that was concerned? Thinking at first there was some force in the request that had been urged by Senators, and the personal promises they had made, I was disposed to debate the matter if it was taken up sooner than was proposed, thinking there was not the least haste for the disposition of the matter, and that it might be debated under those circumstances, not as a punishment to Senators or the Senate because it should be taken up earlier, but simply because I thought under the circumstances I should be wanting in courtesy if I did otherwise.

Mr. LOGAN. Now a word on that point. The Senator from California gave notice, before any other Senator in this Chamber intimated that he desired to debate the measure, that he was going to debate this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me a moment.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. I will refer the Senator to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] who stated that he desired to debate it; wished to take up the veto and give his reasons to show its inconsistency with the President's previous course. Responding to him I said that those who thought differently also desired to be heard.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I will not discuss that point with the Senator; but I can make one statement in which I believe I shall be borne out by every Senator on this floor who voted for the bill, without announcing to any one that there was any understanding of that kind, for I will not say that there was, because there were other Senators that I did not speak to in reference to it and that others did not. If the Senate had agreed this morning to take up this bill and vote on it, I do not believe one man, either on the republican or democratic side, who voted for the bill would have opened his mouth to debate its features. I may be mistaken, but that is my honest opinion. I may be mistaken, and if I am, I am certainly willing to be corrected. I do not believe the Senator from North Carolina would have desired to debate the bill if we had taken it up this morning when it was first called up. But there seemed to be a kind of itching desire on the part of some gentlemen to get their fangs upon something or somebody and precipitate debate. I do not desire to debate the bill. I am not much of a debater as far as force or power is concerned, and hence I do not desire to debate it. But the reason I do not desire mostly is because I know it can benefit no one. That is my great reason for it. I say to Senators now we will be quiet and silent; we know we cannot carry our bill by a two-thirds majority; we are willing to be quiet and silent and vote; but I warn our friends in this Chamber not to commence a war. We are willing, and I say for all, in my judgment, especially for the republicans who voted for this bill, that we desire not to debate it, for the reason that we do not want angry passions aroused here among political friends or even on the part of those who are not friends. Hence I say if debate is precipitated on this bill, take the responsibility you who do it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON. Will not the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMERON. I rose a few moments ago in order to make an explanation in some degree personal to myself, and I am impelled to do it by what was said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] in regard to the chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I desire to say—and I have sought for the last two years an opportunity to say it—that I was placed in that position by no act of my own. I was placed upon the Committee on Foreign Relations at the first session when I came to the Senate after my election preceding the last, and I was then placed there at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Sumner,] and I was placed next to himself, he being the chairman and I the second on the committee, serving in that position for several years. When it was determined not to place him on the committee at the beginning of a new Congress because of a difficulty between himself and the Secretary of State—for the Secretary of State said, as I understood, that he could have no official relations with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations because of the unwillingness of the chairman to act with him—I was absent at my home, and I there heard by telegraph that it had been determined to put me at the head of the committee in place of Mr. Sumner. And it was a place to which I was entitled by all the usages of the Senate if the chairman left his position. I left home before daylight, and came here and entered the Senate Chamber for the purpose of declining to serve as chairman simply and solely out of regard for him. As I passed through the Chamber to take my seat in the Senate a gentleman who was overzealous in behalf of the former chairman made some remarks which were, as I believed, unjust to myself; and I left the Senate, went to my committee-room, and refused to act in the matter, casting no vote during that protracted, and, to me, painful struggle.

I have said that by the usages of the Senate I was entitled to that place. I say also that it was important that the head of the Department of State should be in perfect unison with the chairman of that committee about the performance of its important duties, especially with reference to the treaty of Washington. I do not desire to speak of those duties. I do not think it is so very difficult a matter to be chairman of that committee or of any other; and especially will any difficulty disappear when I give you the names of the gentlemen composing the Committee on Foreign Relations. Next to the chairman is the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON;] next to him the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN;] then the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE;] then the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN;] then the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING;] then the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ;] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. STOCKTON] and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. MCCREERY.] Does anybody believe that that committee, without a head at all, could not perform all the duties required of it? Now why should I be assailed for having taken the place to which I was entitled and to which nobody has an exclusive right?

Mr. THURMAN. I hope my friend will not think that I assailed him. I did not allude to him in the slightest degree.

Mr. CAMERON. I know the Senator from Ohio has too much kindness in him to assail anybody; but within the last fifteen or twenty days I have seen it stated twenty or thirty or more times in the newspapers that I had robbed Mr. Sumner of his place on the Committee on Foreign Relations. My God, sir, I did not rob him of anything! I would rather now, much rather, add to his reputation than detract from it in any way. He had great merits, but he was not the saviour of his country, and especially he was not the only man in the world fitted to be the chairman of any committee of this House. So far from feeling any unkindness to me, he was the last person I spoke to on the day before he died, when I was going home to my sick family. I went to him and asked him to pair with me, and he said, "Yes, CAMERON, I do it gladly," and we shook hands. He said to me, "God bless you," and I said to him, "God bless you." For long years he and I had been on the most pleasant personal relations. I found him here in the Senate when I came back the second time; I had been here before him; and during the years when he and I were here together and during the years of the war, when the gentlemen on the other side never said a kind word of him and many of them were glad to say unkind things of him, I always defended him; and during an occasion in this House, in executive session, when I was assailed he defended me, and I hope that as long as I live I shall do no wrong to any man who ever defended me when I was not present to defend myself. Mr. Sumner's fame may safely rest on the history his laborious life has recorded. Surely his reputation can receive no aid from injudicious friends, nor from his life-long political enemies.

Mr. THURMAN. I have but a word to say——

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator give me one minute?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. In this connection, inasmuch as the matter has been alluded to as to the chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I think it appropriate that I should state that at the time the Senator from Pennsylvania was placed at the head of that committee it was done simply and only because it was understood that Mr. Sumner at that time was not on speaking terms with either the Secretary of State or the President of the United States; and therefore not the proper person to be the organ through which communications should reach this body. That is the fact.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, why Charles Sumner was not on speaking terms with the President of the United States, if such were the fact, or with the Secretary of the State, I leave to his own works and to his own posthumous speech to tell. I do not undertake to decide what is the truth; it is not my province to decide it; but there will be in the history of this country, and a history that will be read long after we have passed away, Charles Sumner's own account of why he was not on speaking terms with the Secretary of the State; and there I am willing to leave it. Of course I know nothing of what took place in the caucus of the republican party further than it was developed in open Senate; for Senators must remember that the decision of the caucus was not acquiesced in by certain members of the republican party, but that the colleague of Mr. Sumner, now the Vice-President of the United States, took the sense of the Senate itself upon the question, and that a debate took place in open Senate which gave to us of the opposition some little insight into the doings of that caucus.

But, Mr. President, I do not wish to do injustice to any one. All I know is, or at least I think I know it, that Mr. Sumner believed to the day of his death that he was a proscribed man because he would not support a particular measure of the Administration. He may have been in error; I do not say whether he was or not; but it was as firmly printed, nay burnt into his mind, as any truth that ever found lodgment there. I do not pretend to say that he was right; but I think the country thought so too. I think the universal sense of the country was that, and I think also it is true that nobody, so far as I know, who knew anything at all about it, ever attributed his displacement to any action or wish of his successor, the Senator from Pennsylvania. Indeed I have an indistinct recollection myself that before the question was decided the Senator from Pennsylvania expressed to me in private conversation his wish to be relieved from the place to which he had been appointed.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am extremely sorry this discussion has sprung up. If there is any one topic that could be out of order at this time it seems to me this topic must be; but the Senator from Ohio has seen fit to refer to this incident in a history not very remote, an incident with which I was somewhat prominently connected, and I think it due to myself, due to truth, that I should once more state here in the Senate what I stated at the time in the Senate, and what to contradict here or elsewhere will raise a question of veracity.

It was made my duty in a party sense, if not in an official sense, to assign the reasons why the late Senator from Massachusetts was not at that time proposed to the Senate again for the same place. I then and there, in the hearing of the Senate, in the hearing of very crowded galleries, took occasion to say what the Senator from Maine at my left has just reaffirmed, that that Senator's action upon the San Domingo treaty had no influence in bringing about that recommendation. We did not stop to try or to accuse the republicanism of the Senator from Massachusetts. We were informed that his personal relations with the President and with the Secretary of State were such as to, in a measure, we thought, disqualify him from beneficial and profitable service at the head of that particular committee; but in order to show, if conduct or words could show anything, that we did not mean to enter upon the merits of that controversy between the Senator and the Secretary, or between the Senator and the President, we did, as I have just stated, recommend that that Senator be placed at the head of one of the most important committees of the Senate, a committee second in importance probably to no committee in the body.

Now, Mr. President, if I need to add another word by way of corroborating this repeated denial, I think I can be indulged in saying that on the question of that San Domingo treaty I differed but very little in opinion either from the late Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Vermont who has just declared what his opinions were in reference to that treaty; and it was impossible, I think, holding the views I did as to that measure, that I could be made the instrument of punishing the Senator from Massachusetts or anybody else for an opposition to the San Domingo treaty. These statements were made at the time. They were given to the public at the time. The Senator from Ohio is pleased to say that in spite of them it was the universal sense of the people that he was punished because of his opposition to San Domingo.

Mr. THURMAN. I say it is my opinion that it was.

Mr. HOWE. It is his opinion that that was the universal sense of the people. Well, he will admit I think, on reflection, that that opinion could not have been quite universal. There were some dissentients. If a very large body of the people preferred or continued to believe that that was an act of punishment meted out to the late Senator from Massachusetts, it is because the American people at that time, like another people we have heard of, preferred to believe what was not true and what there was no plausible ground for believing.

I conclude that the Senator from Ohio is mistaken, that the people did not believe that—at least those who were acquainted with the transaction and what was stated as to the grounds of that charge.

Mr. MERRIMON. I believe the pending motion at this moment is that of the Senator from Iowa, to take up the currency bill and proceed to vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to postpone the Louisiana bill and proceed to the consideration of the finance bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. I was going to submit this motion as a compromise, and I submit it to the decision of the Chair, that the currency bill be made the special order for Monday next at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill is not before the Senate and cannot be disposed of until taken up for consideration.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I fully agree with the Senators who have spoken, and I know, as they know it, that Mr. Sumner was not displaced from the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations on account of his course on the San Domingo treaty; or rather, that was not the reason why he was not reappointed to that position. If so, why was the Senator on my left [Mr. EDMUNDS] made chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and why was the Senator on my right [Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont] made chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, both of whom are well known to have differed from the President and agreed with Mr. Sumner on that question?

But that was not what I rose to say. The Senator from Ohio speaks of Mr. Sumner's posthumous speech. There is no such speech. That was not Mr. Sumner's speech. That was a speech which Mr. Sumner wrote, and which he deliberately decided he would not utter; and the man who, over his new-made grave, violated his confidence by the publication of that speech had an opportunity to perform an act of perfidy that few men have ever been able to do.

Mr. Sumner did me the honor to show me that speech. I dare say there are other Senators here to whom he showed it. I know of a number of persons to whom he did show it, and every one, so far as I know, concurred with me in the counsel which I gave him. I do not believe that any man ever advised him to deliver that speech; and I have every reason to believe—I may say I know—that he determined not to deliver it. There were a very few copies intrusted to some of his friends. I believe that every one of them contained in his own handwriting—I have seen one of them—a memorandum that this was in strict confidence and was under no circumstances to be made public; and if Mr. Sumner had lived no man would have dared to make it public.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Both parties advised him not to deliver it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly; gentlemen of every side of politics so advised him; every man he consulted, whether on political or personal grounds, so far as I am advised, counseled him not to deliver it, and it was not his speech; it was a speech not only that he did not make, but a speech that after mature consideration he decided he would not make.

Mr. SHERMAN. Senators must be conscious that the day is being wasted away without anything being accomplished, and I do appeal to them all that we may take the vote upon the motion of the Senator from Iowa. I feel perfectly indifferent whether it is voted up or voted down. It is not a matter of the slightest consideration; it ought not to detain a debating club twenty minutes to determine whether the vote shall be taken to-day or on Friday. I think, as do other Senators who have spoken, that in deference to the expressed wishes of the Senator from Missouri, and also in view of the fact that a Senator is about to appear among us to exercise for the first time the duties of his office, it is but reasonable and fair and ordinary courtesy, which has a thousand times been extended for slighter causes, that we should postpone this question until a reasonable time, say Friday or Monday; but whether we do or do not, it is a question of such small importance that certainly a day of valuable time ought not to be wasted. I hope, therefore, the Senate will take the vote on the proposition of the Senator from Iowa. If it carry, I shall feel it my duty then to move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Friday next, and make it a special order.

And now as to the debate upon this question. The Senator from North Carolina desires to debate it. I believe he is the only Senator who stands reserving his right to debate it. As a matter of course he can do so; but I think a general feeling is shown of a manifest desire on the part of the Senate to avoid any debate on this question, which can lead to no good, which can lead to no result. The vote upon that bill is fore-ordained as much as anything can be; and in the ordinary course of things we know it just as well as we would know it after the vote is announced. Opportunities will be presented to debate all the question, together with the views of the President, upon bills that must necessarily be reported, bills that are daily acted upon and referred and will be reported upon in due time. Why, therefore, enter into a long debate which may lead to criticisms of each other and of the President as to whether we have always thought alike upon this question, when probably in a short time we shall have before us all the questions involved in the financial and currency problems?

Without detaining the Senate, I feel that I have the right to appeal to the Senate to give us a vote definitely upon the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, which is the only one pending, and then if the Senate refuses to take up the bill, that I will look upon as an indication that on Friday next at least it shall be taken up by common consent; but if it shall be taken up now, I shall feel it my duty to move to postpone it until Friday next, or Monday, so that we may then take it up and vote upon it without further debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire now whether any Senator objects to the proposition I made some time ago, that on Friday at two o'clock, without any debate or division, we proceed to dispose of this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that on Friday next, at two o'clock, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the finance bill and vote upon it without debate. Is there objection to this general understanding?

Mr. MERRIMON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina objects.

Mr. CONKLING. Then we now know on which side he is who proposes to devote time to discussing a dead bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am willing to take the responsibility.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think the case is a desperate one for settling this question without any considerable time. If the Senator from North Carolina deems it his duty, as it is certainly his right, to discuss this question, he does only what every Senator has a right to do, and no one can complain; but if nobody else desires to discuss it, why can we not agree that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina we will take the question without further debate; and if anything shall be said that Senators may wish to reply to, we all know we shall have ample time, not necessarily upon this bill, but cognate questions will be coming up all the time.

Mr. SARGENT. I certainly shall not consent to a partial arrangement of that kind. The Senator from North Carolina, as is his undoubted right, retains the right of speaking at that time, and I think other Senators should retain the privilege of replying then and there to whatever he may say, if they shall so desire. Something has been said in this debate in reference to the responsibility Senators take in debating measures. I think we are accustomed to take responsibilities every hour of our lives. Every vote we cast, every word we say, implies responsibility. For myself, I shrink from no responsibility which is necessary to the discharge of my duties.

Mr. TIPTON. I think the Senate of the United States has never exhibited since I have been in it any such feeling as that exhibited on this occasion: a fear—more than a fear, an absolute terror—lest a discussion should spring up on the important question of a presidential veto. Why, Mr. President, how is it that unless every Senator gets up and avows on his own part that his silence is not to be construed into a determination not to discuss, therefore it is to be inferred that he is not to discuss? Now, while there may be scores of Senators around me who have not said but what they will speak on this question, it is to be simmered down to this, that the Senator from North Carolina will be supposed to speak on the question because he has declared that he will speak on the question. There may be scores of Senators who have said nothing on the subject yet, and who may be anxious to speak on the question when the question arises; and this universal fear, this great care, this timidity on the part of Senators about discussing a question of this kind after it has been spoken on from the White House, is what I do not quite understand. I know one thing, that when the President of the United States in his first message declared he would have no opinion and be tenacious about no view of his own in opposition to the opinion of the people of this country he must have meant something; and therefore I think when he goes back upon that proposition he does it for causes which are so very grave that it would be worth while for the Senate of the United States to pay some respect to those causes. Have not the people spoken in the House of Representatives? Have not the Representatives of the States spoken here? And now, if the President has found it necessary to veto what seems to be the expressed will of the people, is it not important that Senators should pay common respect to his opinions before their constituents and before the country? Yet, strange as it may appear, the effort of the day has been to bring us to that point that we will all be submissive, say nothing about the consistency or the constitutionality or the propriety of the message. Extreme care, wonderful solicitude for a great, unshaken, and intrepid party!

Now, sir, I wish to say one other thing in regard to the question that was just spoken of by the Senator from Rhode Island. I have never seen that undelivered speech; I have never sought to find the papers in which it was published; I have never seen one word of it; and yet if men are to utter denunciations in regard to it, do those denunciations go to the facts asserted by the Senator? Are we to understand that there was something so false in that speech, so at variance with the truths of history, so opposed to all that the country knows and understands on that question, that therefore the document should never have been published? I trust no Senator insinuates anything of that kind, but that gentlemen only make their point as to the propriety of publishing great and unequivocal truths. I have never seen that speech; but such is my confidence in the undoubted integrity of the man who wrote it, such is the confidence of the people in its author, such was your confidence yesterday, whatever it may be to-day, as that every Senator in his place here believes that whatever may be in that document it might be almost sworn to in the dark and without reading it as true, knowing that nothing but truth could emanate from the deceased Senator from Massachusetts. If, therefore, he put down truths which he wrote as facts, swelling up from a heart that was burdened with the whole subject; if he wrote them, and afterward he said within himself "Truths they are; they have entered into my very soul; they have pierced me through; nevertheless they are living truths; but my friends counsel me not to publish them, and I will not publish; I will yield to them; I will lay aside the document in the dark, but it is true. If ever they should see the light they are God's truths." Then what will you do with it? What have you got to say about the truths and the facts that may be contained in that document? I will look into that document hereafter. I will make some little effort now to procure that document and to look at it in regard to the truth that is couched in it. It is true. Colored it may be with personal feeling; nevertheless it is true, and Massachusetts will indorse it to-day from one end of the State to the other as true, and perhaps eulogize the discretion, the courtesy, the clemency that saved the men of that day from the influence of that truth. That is all.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I should think that by this time it was quite obvious from what has fallen in the Senate to-day that there is no disposition at least to debate the Louisiana question, and probably none at all upon either side of the Chamber, upon any political division or otherwise, to at any length debate the veto message; and the reasons why are so obvious to every gentleman that no man has undertaken to say why it should be otherwise. No Senator on either side has expressed any desire in the present contingency of affairs except my honorable friend on the left, [Mr. MERRIMON,] who thinks he may desire to reserve the right to do so on another occasion. I have heard no Senator say to-day that there was anything to be gained by voting upon this proposition to-day; I mean any public exigency requiring it. Nor have I heard any Senator indicate that from the postponement of it to Friday, or to the fore part of next week, any public inconvenience or injury to the public would probably arise.

Now, I want to appeal to my honorable friend from Iowa who made this motion, under these circumstances, as nothing is to be gained by voting to-day, as no injury is to come to the public by postponing it until Friday, or until Tuesday next, if you please, considering there is such slight probability of a discussion on the subject, whether he will not qualify his motion so as to say, let us postpone this matter until Friday or Tuesday next and take our chances about speeches on that occasion. It is obvious that there is no desire on either side to discuss the proposition to-day, and there is but little probability that there will be any greater desire on next Friday, or at a later day, and there is a very strong probability that it will be even less. I submit, then, whether it is worth while for us longer to delay fixing a day and taking the chances of any speeches which any gentleman may feel a sense of duty to inflict. My honorable friend from North Carolina, than whom no man is more generous and considerate, will have no disposition, I am sure, to make a speech on that occasion unless he deems that the exigency of the case requires it.

I do not appeal to my honorable friend from Iowa, but I suggest whether under the circumstances he will not consent that this bill shall go over until Friday next, or such day as he chooses to indicate, taking the chances of such debate as may spring up on the subject.

Mr. WRIGHT. If I could reach the conclusion reached by the Senator from Maine that the postponement of this question until Friday would probably shorten the debate, I would be very ready to concur in his suggestion; but my opinion, from what has been developed here to-day, is, that we shall dispose of this question in a shorter time and much better to all concerned if we take it up at this time and insist upon a vote. I therefore, with every disposition to accommodate the wishes of Senators around me, feel compelled and constrained to insist on the motion as I made it this morning. I believe if that motion had been disposed of promptly and the bill taken up at once, we should have had the question out of the way long ago, should have had no discussion at all, and there would have been no resistance; but we have got to the point where I think the best thing we can do is to vote on the proposition to take up this bill. I therefore ask for a vote on the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to postpone the Louisiana bill and proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the finance bill, being the bill returned by the President with his objections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who is detained from the Senate to-day on account of illness. If he were present he would vote to take up the matter and I should vote against it.

Mr. RANSOM. On this question I consider myself paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, and Thurman—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Cooper, Flanagan, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Ransom, Saulsbury, and Schurz—10.

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 617) to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes, is now before the Senate; and the question is, Shall the bill pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States? upon which question the Constitution requires that the yeas and nays shall be taken. Senators in favor of passing the bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States, will as your names are called answer "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who if here would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 34, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, West, Windom, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, and Wadleigh—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Brownlow, Cooper, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Ransom, Saulsbury, and Schurz—8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this question the yeas are 34 and the nays are 30. Two-thirds of the Senators present not having voted in the affirmative, the Senate refuses to pass this bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BOREMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a minute.

Mr. BOREMAN. For a moment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1, being the civil-rights bill.

Mr. BOREMAN. I shall have to insist on my motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield for the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope the Senator will let a vote be taken so that we may know whether we are to take up the bill to-morrow morning.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 28, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RATIONS FOR SUFFERERS IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations have directed me to ask unanimous consent to report a bill to make an appropriation for the purchase of rations in accordance with the bill which became a law a few days ago.

There being no objection,

Mr. GARFIELD reported from the Committee on Appropriations a bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River."

The bill was read. To enable the Secretary of War to carry out the provisions of the act approved April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the overflow of the Lower Mississippi River" the bill appropriates $90,000, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of purchasing supplies of food, to be issued under the direction of the Secretary of War to any and all classes of destitute or helpless persons living on or near the Lower Mississippi River who have been rendered so by reason of the recent overflow.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would like to hear an explanation of this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember that a bill was passed by both Houses, and has now become a law, directing the War Department to supply rations so far as necessary to twenty-five thousand people in the country where they are suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River. The War Department has not a surplus of rations, or at least if it uses for this purpose what it now has an appropriation of this amount will be required to supply the deficiency. Therefore we propose, according to the letter of the Secretary of War which has been sent to the Committee on Appropriations, to appropriate $90,000, to enable him to purchase rations, which it would be best for him to purchase as near as possible to the place where they are required, rather than send them from a distance. I will put on record that letter as a part of my explanation.

The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, April 23, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a special estimate of the Commissary-General of Subsistence for payment for rations to subsist destitute persons on the Lower Mississippi River, in accordance with the recent act of Congress authorizing the issuing of food for that purpose, and to invite your attention to the accompanying letter of that officer explaining the necessity therefor, arising from the depleted state of the appropriations of his Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

OFFICE COMMISSARY-GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE,
Washington City, April 23, 1874.

SIR: Congress having by joint resolution authorized the issue of food to the sufferers by overflow residing on the Lower Mississippi, and upon an examination it is found that no supplies of food can be spared from the various military stations in that region, and after a verbal conference upon the subject with the President of the United States and yourself, and having been directed to procure five hundred thousand rations of meat, flour, beans or rice, I have the honor to submit herewith an estimate for $90,000 for the purpose of carrying out the intent of the law above referred to and the instructions which I have received.

This estimate is based upon a daily issue to twenty thousand people for twenty-five days.

In this connection I think proper to state that the balance of the appropriation for the subsistence of the Army yet undrawn from the Treasury is at this moment $49,122.55, but the unfilled estimates now in this office will more than exceed this sum; it will therefore be perceived that the Subsistence Department is without means to make payment for the food which the law authorizes to be issued.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. E. SHIRAS,
Acting Commissary-General.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Special estimate for payment for food to subsist destitute persons on the Lower Mississippi River, made in accordance with the act of Congress which passed both Houses April 21, 1874.

Five hundred thousand rations of meats, flour, beans or rice, at eighteen cents per ration, $90,000, being twenty-five days' supply for twenty thousand persons.

A. E. SHIRAS,
Acting Commissary-General.

OFFICE COMMISSARY-GENERAL, April 23, 1874.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Are these rations to be shipped from here? I see a statement this morning that they are.

Mr. GARFIELD. The clothing will be shipped from here, and the Department is now shipping rations from the nearest points where they are on hand; but it is best that the Department should have the money to buy rations in the nearest markets where they can be purchased.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is the gentleman prepared to state how much all the rations and clothing supplied will cost at the commutation price?

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot tell about the clothing; this bill relates only to rations. The necessary rations for twenty thousand people for twenty-five days are estimated in the letter of the Secretary of War to cost $90,000. The clothing is already on hand.

Mr. BECK. Is there any requirement of a report by the Secretary of War of his action in this matter?

Mr. GARFIELD. Nothing, unless it is in the other bill. I do not know whether the original bill contained any such requirement or not.

Mr. BECK. I think we ought to have a report from him of his distribution, so that we may see that it is fair and equal.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest, then, that this clause be added to the bill:

And the Secretary of War is directed to report to Congress the expenditures made in pursuance of this act.

Mr. BECK. We want to know how this distribution is made. We do not want the Secretary of War to give these supplies to only a few of the sufferers.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is customary for the Department to make reports of these matters; and at any rate the report can be called for at any time.

Mr. GARFIELD. We may as well make a special requirement in this bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will be considered as adopted, and the bill will be regarded as read three times and passed.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES OFFICIALS AT NEW YORK.

Mr. WOOD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be authorized and directed to inquire whether any, and if so, whom, of the United States Government officials of the city of New York have absented themselves or are now absenting themselves from their official duties to influence and control by corrupt and improper means State legislation at the capital of that State; and also whether for those objects they have offered to members of the Legislature, as inducements, places of profit connected with their offices in New York to be given after the adjournment of the Legislature.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SYSTEMS.

Mr. ORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the provisions of the bill (H. R. No. 1766) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," approved August 18, 1856, and for other purposes, may be regarded as in order as amendments in Committee of the Whole to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Ways and Means were discharged from the further consideration of bills of the following titles; and they were referred to the Committee on Commerce, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider:

A bill (H. R. No. 1107) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1870; and

A bill (H. R. No. 867) to amend section 35 of the act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes."

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOMESTEADS.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and is hereby, directed to prepare and report a bill to amend the act relating to soldiers and sailors' homesteads, passed June 8, 1872, so as to allow honorably discharged soldiers and sailors, their widows and orphan children, to acquire homesteads on the public lands of the United States without being required to commence settlements and improvements on said land.

Mr. MAYNARD. I must object to that unless it is made discretionary with the committee.

Mr. NEGLEY. This is discretionary with the committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. It instructs the committee absolutely.

Mr. NEGLEY. To report the bill simply.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I must object unless it is amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects unless the committee are instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill.

Mr. NEGLEY. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

INTERNATIONAL LAND AND IMMIGRATION COMPANY.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, there was a bill introduced (H. R. No. 2888) to incorporate the International Land and Immigration Company, which was read twice, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed. Among the incorporators is the name of Mr. John Trimble, of Tennessee, a gentleman formerly a member of this House from the Nashville district, who writes me a letter in which he states that the use of his name as one of the corporators in that bill was unauthorized, and he desires it should be publicly and formally withdrawn.

Mr. POTTER. Is that the same bill of incorporation in respect to which the name of George W. Childs, of Philadelphia, was also used without his consent?

Mr. RANDALL. It is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, although he does not feel authorized to name any individual, that he has received more than one letter complaining of the unauthorized use of names in this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Tennessee state where this bill is at present?

The SPEAKER. The indorsement upon the bill itself will show.

Mr. MAYNARD. The bill is now before the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. COBURN. In connection with the bill offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in reference to soldiers' homesteads I wish to say that that subject has been before the Committee on Military Affairs and is now being considered, and, whether with or without the instructions of the House, will be reported upon at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. It has been objected to.

Mr. COBURN. That measure is already there and will be considered and reported upon.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to the status of the bill to incorporate the International Land and Immigration Company, I wish to say that that bill has been before the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the gentleman proceeds I want him to understand that I do not ask for any explanation. What I ask is unanimous consent on the part of Mr. Trimble that his name shall be withdrawn from the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and that will be done.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire, however, to state the status of the bill, because there seems to be some apprehension in regard to it. I merely desire to say it is before the Committee on the Public Lands; it has been considered in a measure and ordered to be printed and recommitted, but no final action has been taken upon it in committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to know whether that recommittal has been reconsidered and the motion to reconsider laid upon the table?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir. The gentleman need not, however, be alarmed about the bill.

DISTRICT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Investigation of the Affairs of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to hear the grievances of the workingmen engaged on public improvements under the board of public works or any or all of the contractors of the same; and that all witnesses required by them be subpœnaed by the committee, and that their counsel have the same rights and privileges accorded counsel for the memorialists and those of the board of public works.

Mr. HUBBELL. I object.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. PARSONS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be directed to prepare and report to this House, at the earliest period practicable, a bill to provide for free banking within the limits of the United States, containing the following provisions:

First. Provided, That the business of banking shall be free within the limits of the United States. Each national bank heretofore or hereafter to be established to have the right to issue all the currency it requires, provided it shall, to secure the redemption of such circulation, deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, the gold-bearing 5 per cent. bonds of the United States at the rate of dollar for dollar.

Second. That for every $100 in national-bank notes so issued as currency there shall be withdrawn from actual circulation and destroyed the sum of fifty dollars in the legal-tender notes of the United States, until the total amount of legal-tender notes of the United States outstanding shall not exceed the sum of $250,000,000.

Third. That whenever the Comptroller of the Currency shall give notice to the Secretary of the Treasury that the total amount of legal-tender notes of the United States outstanding does not exceed the sum of $250,000,000, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon give public notice that after thirty days from the date of such notice the United States will redeem, on presentation, all legal-tender notes offered for redemption, in gold or silver coin of the United States.

Fourth. That upon the resumption by the United States of specie payments as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the national banks of the United States to redeem all their outstanding notes, as the same shall be presented at the counters of their respective banks, in gold or silver coin of the United States, or in the legal-tender notes of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. PARSONS. I ask that the resolution may be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to that, if the resolution is not an instruction to the committee.

The SPEAKER. It is not an instruction.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

JUDGE WILLIAM F. STORY.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Judiciary the following resolution; and ask its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire whether Judge William F. Story, judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas, shall be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. MAYNARD. Unless some reason be given for the adoption of such a resolution I cannot consent to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I will state to the House the reason for the resolution. There was a memorial presented containing nineteen specifications against Judge Story, and the Committee on the Judiciary proceeded to consider the matter, on the supposition that a resolution of this kind had been passed by the House. I was very confident that such a resolution had been passed, but on examination we were unable to find it, and this is simply to cure any defect of that sort

Mr. MAYNARD. This does not cure it, in my judgment. I ask that the matter lie over, because such a matter in relation to a judge ought to have a basis to rest upon.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. There is this basis, that the memorial has been referred to the committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it on the record?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. It is on the record as referred to the committee by the House, and the committee have already acted upon it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I must object to the resolution to-day.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will give me his attention one minute I think I may be able to induce him to withdraw his objection. The gentleman misapprehends this matter altogether. The subject has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and they have been engaged in its investigation for some time. There are several witnesses here already who have come from the State of Arkansas, and we desire to examine them to-day, that they may go home and that the expense of their further attendance may be saved.

Mr. MAYNARD. If any gentleman of the Judiciary Committee will say that he has facts within his knowledge, or that facts are before the committee, which would justify the House in passing such a resolution, I will not object to it. The only thing I dislike is to have a resolution of this sort brought in with nothing to base it on.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There are nineteen charges against this judge pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, and the committee have been ordered by the House to make the investigation. It was supposed that this authority to send for persons and papers with a view to make that investigation had been given to the committee; but it is ascertained that the resolution if passed is lost. The witnesses are here, and the committee desire to proceed with the investigation of the charges of bribery and corruption, which are the charges that are brought. They are specifically set forth in the memorial which is before the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MAYNARD. On that statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin I withdraw my objection.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to inquire of the Chair if this is not a privileged motion, which the committee may present at any time, and which one objection cannot defeat?

The SPEAKER. On a matter referred to the committee it would be.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SESSION FOR DEBATE ONLY.

Mr. MAYNARD. There are several gentlemen who wish to address to the House speeches on various subjects connected with the interests of the Union, and they desire to have a session for debate only as in Committee of the Whole on as early a day as suits the convenience of the House. I suggest that to meet the gentlemen's views we hold a session——

Mr. LAWRENCE. This evening.

Mr. MAYNARD. Well, this evening.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that by unanimous consent there be a session of the House this evening as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message, and if there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. CONGER. No other business to be transacted?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I object.

DOROTHEA IRONS.

Mr. RUSK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2926) for the relief of Dorothea Irons, mother of Lieutenant Joseph F. Irons, late of the First United States Artillery, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, on which the previous question is operating. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is entitled to one hour to close debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I shall only occupy a few minutes. I wish to call the attention of the House to the leading changes which have been made in the bill in the Committee of the Whole. The debate in the Committee of the Whole was continued through many days, but there have been very few radical changes made in the bill. I have prepared a table showing the additions and reductions that have been made on the appropriations originally contained in the bill.

The Committee on Appropriations believe that three important reforms have been incorporated in this bill; and, if it becomes a law, they will prove of very great value in the direction of good government and economy. The first is the result of what the House itself did before the bill was brought in—by the reduction of salaries. The reduction of salaries in this bill amounts, for the two Houses, as regards the compensation of Senators and Members, to $940,000—$190,000 for the Senate and $750,000 for the House.

The reduction of the expenses of the two Houses, exclusive of members' salaries, consists in part of reductions of the salaries of employés, but mainly in the reduction of contingent expenses. This class of reductions amounts to $170,964.20, making a total reduction of legislative expenses in this bill of $1,110,000 in round numbers.

The second thing to which I call attention is the proposed reduction in civil employés. There has been a reduction in clerical force, including messengers and other employés, of 585 persons. Of these 190 are in the War Department, and 395 are in the other Departments; but chiefly in the Treasury. This we believe has not cut so deep into the organization of any of the Executive Departments but that they can with extra work and a little extra care get on reasonably well with their business. This has produced a corresponding reduction of about $500,000 in the executive expenses due to that cause alone.

Then there has been a reduction made resulting from a reform in regard to the expenses of the national loan. I have spoken of that once before briefly, and I simply remind the House of what it is. All the expenses that have heretofore been borne under the head of expenses of the national loan, and which amounted in past years to $3,806,000, were by permanent appropriations that never appeared in our annual bills at all. That expense is for the maintenance of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and for the payment of about six hundred clerks outside of the Bureau, in the office of the Secretary, the Register, the Treasurer, and the First Auditor. We have swept away in this bill all laws that make permanent appropriations, and have substituted what never appeared before in any regular appropriation bill, $2,151,000 under the head of expenses of national loan. We have thereby been able to make a reduction of $645,000 under that head alone, believing that we shall really save that much which has been expended heretofore in large salaries, and in the employment of a large number of persons, more, we think, than has really been necessary; and, furthermore, the work ought to be decreasing, and we hope that it will decrease hereafter.

Another reform has been put into this bill, the credit of which is due to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] and their respective committees. By their amendment in regard to the War Department they have swept away a large number of provisions of old statutes, reaching back to the days of the war, that allowed the Secretary of War to employ an unlimited number of persons in his Department, according to his discretion, out of the enlisted force of the Army; and, furthermore, authorized him to create a special corps, to be known as general-service men, who were enlisted for the purpose of making them clerks. The result has been that we have had no control over the number of clerks and other employés in the War Department; for the Secretary had under the permanent appropriations, or rather the appropriations for the pay of the Army, full liberty to employ any number he pleased. This, I think, is a great reform, and the gentlemen I have named and their committees are entitled to that credit. I think they have dealt liberally with the Departments, and perhaps have given them more force than is really necessary.

We have been able to make a reduction in most of the other departments of the Government; but in some that were not especially affected by the war there has been a slight increase. There has been added to the bill in Committee of the Whole appropriations to the amount of $134,977.50; but a large part of that was by putting in omitted clauses. For instance, the Committee on Appropriations had failed in one case to the extent of $35,000 in putting in appropriations for the Patent Office, which were estimated for and which we believe are necessary. This was a mere omission of the Committee on Appropriations and should not be considered an increase. A large share of the $134,000 put in in Committee of the Whole was put in on motion of the Committee on Appropriations. There have been taken off in Committee of the Whole appropriations to the amount of $63,458, by a decrease of salaries and decrease of contingent funds.

I should mention that we added $1,000,000 to meet decisions of the Court of Claims, which we had left out purposely that we might have more time to consider it. Last year the appropriation for this purpose was $400,000; this year we have appropriated $1,000,000; so that there is an increase of $600,000 in this item.

The saving in the War Department by this amendment is $167,360; but it nevertheless makes an apparent increase in this bill, because we were compelled to put in a much larger number of clerks in order to dispense with all the general-service men.

We have been able to reduce the appropriations for the mints and assay offices $250,000 below the estimates, although, I believe, the Committee of the Whole put back $70,000 of that, so that the reduction amounts to not quite $200,000.

We have reduced the appropriations for the internal-revenue service $45,760, and if the proviso in regard to gaugers should stand as reported by the committee it will result in a decrease of about $100,000 more.

This is in general a statement of what has been done in this bill, which appropriates $20,000,000. The appropriations in the bill corresponding to this last year for the same objects amounted to $24,000,000; so that this bill as it now stands ready to be voted on shows a net reduction of a little more than $4,000,000 from what was appropriated for the same objects last year.

Two or three mistakes have been made in the Committee of the Whole to which I wish to call attention. It will be remembered that in the discussion in regard to the printing of national bonds and notes in New York certain questions were put to me, and one by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] and I hope he is here to listen to what I shall say. I was asked whether the putting of the two appropriations of $500,000 and $625,000 together would in any way change the law in reference to the printing of bonds and currency; whether the printing would be done in New York and in the Department here in any different proportion than heretofore.

I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to state that upon looking over that matter we are inclined to think that the consolidation of those two clauses might leave the question in doubt. If they remain consolidated, and the Treasury Department should find it had the right to have all the work done in the Department and should do it, then gentlemen will have the right to find fault with the committee for misleading them. The committee therefore instructed me to ask that the amendment made in Committee of the Whole be not concurred in. Personally, I am in favor of leaving it as the Committee of the Whole fixed it; but if it be assented to it may result in doing what gentlemen here may feel themselves deceived about. Whatever arrangement is to be made about that matter, the Committee on Banking and Currency is now investigating this subject, and when they report I hope we shall have a full discussion of the subject. The committee have instructed me to call for a separate vote on that amendment and to recommend non-concurrence in it.

Now in regard to the section in reference to the hours of labor in the Departments; I am instructed by the committee to ask a separate vote on that amendment. We have thought that, after having cut down the clerical force of the Department by this bill to such an extent, we ought to do something toward putting the Departments on a business basis. We never shall do that if we allow the clerks in all these various Departments and Bureaus to come under the administration of a rule which merely amounts to requiring of them five and a half hours of labor a day. There is no business house in the land that does not require far more hours of labor of its employés than is required of the clerks in the Departments. And to say that these clerks shall commence their labor at nine o'clock in the morning and go away at three o'clock in the afternoon, leaving a large share of the solid day unemployed so far as the Government is concerned, is to say that you will have a favored class of employés in this country and thereby do injustice to every laboring man in the United States and to every person in civil employment. And as we are disposed to be economical in our appropriations, it seems to me just and fair to put our force down somewhere toward a regular business basis. The committee therefore instruct me to call for a separate vote on that amendment and to express the hope that the third section will not be stricken out by the House.

In regard to the last section the committee also direct me to call the attention of the House to the amendment known as the Tremain amendment to Mr. CONGER'S amendment. I fear if that amendment be concurred in it will give trouble in the administration of the last section of this bill. If gentlemen desire its adoption they should remember that it excepts from the rule of covering into the Treasury all appropriations for light-houses, rivers, harbors, and public buildings. The committee think it would be perhaps well to except appropriations for light-houses, and rivers and harbors, and for public buildings; but the last clause says that this exception shall be made under the law as it now stands. Well, "the law as it now stands" is very uncertain. There is a constant controversy between Congress and the Executive Departments as to what the present law is. It seems to me it would be better to sweep that all away and let the modification, if there be any made, be made more carefully than it is in that amendment. A friend near me suggests that each appropriation bill for a public building can make that appropriation specially exempt from the operation of this law.

Mr. TREMAIN. Suppose there is no special exemption made?

Mr. GARFIELD. Then they will have the appropriation for two years.

Mr. TREMAIN. According to the construction of the Department, if a part of an appropriation is drawn it does not lapse except after two years from the time the last drawing is made. Now, if the gentleman will amend the section so as to provide that such appropriation shall not lapse sooner than two years after such last sum has been drawn, then we can agree.

Mr. GARFIELD. That can be fixed in the Senate; it cannot be done very well here.

Mr. TREMAIN. I understood you to say that you would not call the yeas and nays on that amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will not do so, but probably somebody else will. I have but one thing more of importance to which I wish to call the attention of the House. In this bill we have refused to raise salaries. The proposition was made in Committee of the Whole to increase the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and strong representations were made of the justice of doing so. But the Committee of the Whole refused to make the increase. They also refused to make any increase of salary in regard to the several heads of Bureaus holding highly responsible positions. In the Treasury Department the salaries of a class of most valuable and important clerks at the heads of Bureaus and divisions, such as the clerks at the head of the division of warrants and appropriations, were reduced from $3,000 to $2,500; perhaps too far.

The Committee of the Whole, however, has increased the salaries of six of our own clerks here in this House. The salary of two of them they have put at $3,600 a year, higher than the salaries of the Bureau officers to whom I have referred. The salaries of four of them have been placed at $3,000 a year, as high as the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and higher than the salaries of the clerks at the heads of divisions in the Treasury Department to which I have referred.

In view of all the facts in regard to this bill I should not be doing my duty if I did not call the attention of the House to this matter and ask them to stand by the Committee on Appropriations in resisting this special and exceptional increase which has been made in Committee of the Whole. There is no man on this floor who would be more glad than I would to see anything done for these worthy gentlemen. But I would be unjust to myself and unjust to the truth if I consented to that increase while at the same time we had refused to increase the salaries of equally worthy persons in high and responsible positions. I shall therefore ask a separate vote on that question as upon the others I have indicated. Now, if there are gentlemen who have any questions to ask, I shall gladly answer them.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the gentleman will allow me five minutes for an explanation of one or two amendments upon which a separate vote is to be taken.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] why he has not stated to the House the more than a million dollars which we have indicated in Committee of the Whole our purpose to save by a reduction in the amount appropriated to the Departments for postage? The gentleman has not stated all the reductions we have made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am glad the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] has called my attention to that point. If to cut down, as the Committee of the Whole has done on the suggestion of the gentleman from Minnesota, an appropriation of $200,000 for the purchase of official postage-stamps for the Treasury Department to $5,000 is a saving to the Government, then I have not taken into account that $195,000 of saving. The bill is now in a very unsatisfactory condition on the subject of postage, upon anybody's view. In reference to one of the Departments—the "Granger" Department—no motion was made to reduce the appropriation for postage; the Agricultural Department went unscathed in that respect.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Ohio is mistaken. A motion was made, but it was voted down.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] should remember that the postage appropriation for the Agricultural Department is no doubt designed for the distribution of Agricultural Reports.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Agricultural Reports have no more right to distribution than any other public documents. The official correspondence of the Treasury Department is certainly as important as the sending of Agricultural Reports. Three of the Departments have their postage appropriation left untouched. In respect to the State Department, there is an appropriation of $1,000 to pay for the printing of stamps, but no provision as to the quantity. In respect to two other Departments, the appropriation has been cut down; the reduction in respect to the Treasury Department being, as I have said, from $200,000 to $5,000. I hope the House will strike out all the amendments of this kind, and will leave the bill as reported in this respect, proceeding upon the plan of holding all the Departments responsible for the entire face value of all the stamps appropriated to them.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the vote in the House on one of these amendments be regarded as a test vote; and if the House should decide in favor of changing the system which has prevailed, the committee of conference can make the bill conform in the other cases to the will of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I shall make no factious opposition on that point.

One word more. I am assured, and I believe, that two or three salaries in the Agricultural Department have been reduced unjustly. There was a special raid made on one or two officers of that department about whom the committee had no particular information. I yield for a moment to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] who wishes to have a letter read on this subject.

Mr. BURCHARD. In Committee of the Whole an amendment was adopted to increase the salary of the chief clerk in the Agricultural Department by the addition of $200, and to strike out entirely the provision for the disbursing clerk. Gentlemen in voting for the latter amendment were doubtless ignorant of the duties required to be performed by this officer. I have been informed by members of the Committee on Agriculture that the office is very important and necessary. While the chief clerk is, I believe, a very competent officer and earns the salary which he receives, yet I do not think it ought to be increased for the purpose of requiring him to discharge the duties now performed by the disbursing clerk, especially as the chief clerk is a member of the household of the Commissioner of Agriculture. I think there should be a distribution of the duties. Practically, I do not believe that the amendment made in Committee of the Whole would lessen the expenditures of the department, because somebody will have to perform the duties now discharged by the disbursing clerk; and under the law creating the department the Commissioner has authority to employ the persons necessary for the work of his department, to be paid out of funds appropriated for this purpose. Hence he would no doubt employ some one else to perform these duties. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from this disbursing clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, April 25, 1874.

MY DEAR SIR: My duties in this office are as follows:

To draw from the Treasury every dollar expended by this department, and disburse the same. I pay the employés and pay all bills against the department (in all parts of the world) of every nation. I purchase all the current supplies. Not an order of any kind, for goods, seed, postage-stamps, or anything else, goes from this department but passes through my office and is entered on my books. I have charge of the whole matter. I have charge of postage-stamps, and deliver them to the stamp clerk. As superintendent of building I have entire charge of the building and its contents; attend to repairs, &c.; receive and receipt for supplies and other articles received by express or otherwise; keep all the accounts of the department of every name and nature; make out and transmit to the Treasury Department quarterly accounts amounting to over $200,000 annually.

Much of the purchasing I am compelled to do before or after office hours, as I have no time to do it during office hours.

Yours, respectfully,

B. F. FULLER,
Disbursing Clerk and Superintendent.

Hon. G. BARBERE.

Mr. FORT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] whether a separate vote can be had on the amendment striking out the disbursing clerk of the Agricultural Department?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman has a right to ask a separate vote.

Mr. FORT. I give notice, then, that I desire a separate vote on that amendment.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether in assenting to the amendment reducing the salary of the superintendent of public documents in the Interior Department he was aware of the fact that the law fixes the salary of this officer? For the purpose of informing the House on this matter, I ask the Clerk to read the provision of the law on this subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt the House made a mistake in cutting down that item.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint a superintendent of public documents, at a salary of $2,500 per year, who shall be charged with the duty of packing, distributing, collecting, arranging, classifying, and preserving such documents, and compiling and supervising the Biennial Register, but the whole amount to be expended for said purpose, including the pay of said superintendent, shall not exceed the said sum of $6,500; and the said Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to procure and assign suitable rooms for such journals and documents in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I call for a separate vote on the amendment reducing the salary of this officer.

Mr. GARFIELD. A single remark further. I think the House, after reflection, will not be willing to do what it has voted to do in Committee of the Whole in regard to the Attorney-General. I hope the House will not concur in the amendment making an exception in regard to the Department of Justice and striking out the provision for horses and a carriage in connection with that Department.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Speaker, I did hope not to have to say another word on this bill, but as the chairman of the Appropriations Committee has indicated his intention to call a separate vote on the two amendments I offered on Saturday, and which were adopted by the Committee of the Whole, I ask the earnest attention of the House to these amendments for five minutes.

First, in regard to the amendment putting the whole sum for printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States in one item, at $1,125,000, on page 67. I do hope the House will look at this and see exactly how my amendment applies. There never has been any provision before in any appropriation bill putting it in the power of any bank-note company of New York or elsewhere to hold the appropriation by law, and to hold the Treasury Department of this Government so fast that whether the bank-note company fulfills its contract with the Government or not the Government could not interfere. It has never been known, I say, in the history of any other appropriation bill before this one. The committee here undertake to separate the printing of bonds, notes, and other securities into two items. The backs of the notes are only printed by the bank-note companies in the city of New York; but the printing of the faces, the numbers, the seal, the trimming, and all the other work upon the notes and bonds to prepare them for use, is all done in the Treasury Department here, under the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. In separating the appropriations in this bill, the committee propose to give only $500,000 for all the work that is done here in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, while for merely printing the backs they appropriate directly to bank-note companies of New York $625,000. That is simply for printing the backs and nothing else in New York; and besides there is an additional item of $150,000 for expressage for bringing the unfinished notes and bonds here from those bank-note companies.

Now I do not believe when this House understands this matter they will ever vote $775,000 for doing a small part of the work, compared with the much larger amount of the work done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, for which only $500,000 is appropriated; and at the same time put it out of our power by law to hold these companies to their contracts.

That is not all. The greater objection to the course suggested by the committee is this. If you pass the bill providing that only $500,000 shall be given to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and there shall be appropriated $775,000 to these bank-note companies for merely printing the backs of the notes and for expressage on the same, you put it in the power of these companies to hold the Government for twelve months; while the law as it now stands makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts with these bank-note companies, and if they do not fulfill their contracts to the satisfaction of the Government, then the Secretary of the Treasury may terminate those contracts upon thirty days' notice, or whatever notice is provided in the contracts. I believe the interest of the Government demands the Secretary of the Treasury under the law should have the same power for the future, or we may be found powerless in this matter of printing the notes and bonds.

I accepted all of the amendments suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations on Saturday last, for the purpose of perfecting the amendment offered by me, so as to provide for these bank-note companies' contracts as heretofore made, and which was adopted by the Committee of the Whole. I say now, sir, there is not a particle of question in my mind, nor do I think there will be in any lawyer's judgment if he will examine it, that my amendment does not change the existing law at all; but that hereafter things will go on under this section as amended as they are now going on for all that my amendment may affect it. It does not change the law in that regard at all, but leaves the Secretary of the Treasury to make contracts; but it also leaves with the Secretary of the Treasury power under the law to terminate the contracts in thirty days if the bank-note companies do not fulfill their contracts to the satisfaction of the Government. This House ought not to put itself in the power of any corporation anywhere, and especially, at immensely increased rates, to these bank-note companies for $775,000 for doing a small portion of the work as compared with the $500,000 appropriated for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which has to do a larger part of the printing, &c., of these bonds, notes, and other securities.

One word further as to the other amendment adopted upon my motion. I hope the House will not non-concur, as suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole striking out the provision fixing the hours of labor in the Departments. I hope the House will concur in that amendment as agreed upon in committee. I said all I wanted to say about that on Saturday last. I think it will be the poorest kind of economy to establish seven hours instead of six hours, with a regular legal intermission of half an hour each day; for during that half-hour's intermission the clerks of all the Departments will be scattered all over the city if they choose to go. I believe it is the uniform opinion of all of the heads of Departments that by establishing seven hours instead of six, with a half-hour's intermission every day, the Government would really get less work than it does now. I say to be engaged as these ladies are, counting the notes and obliged to detect every counterfeit or to pay for the mistake out of their own wages, keeping hand and eye and brain upon their work with continuous and intense effort, it is the poorest economy in the world to make them work longer than six hours. They cannot do it and accomplish as much work. They cannot endure it for any length of time. It ought to be left discretionary, as now, with the heads of Departments to keep the office open when necessity demands it for seven hours a day. At certain seasons some of them work ten or twelve hours a day. I do not believe, however, we ought to pass any provision that they shall work seven hours a day at some kinds of work, because I believe that it would be ruinous to their health, and that in reality the Government would get less labor than it does now.

I hope the House will concur in these amendments made in the Committee of the Whole after the fullest discussion, and stand by the previous action, because I believe it right.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only a word in reference to the first amendment to which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] has called the attention of the House. I do not know any of the men connected with these bank-note companies. I have only had some knowledge from the position I happened to be in on committees in connection with the efforts of the Government to take care their bank-notes and bonds should be printed in that way which would give them the greatest possible security. I do not mean to say they have pursued that method heretofore entirely. I know the Government has from the days of Mr. Secretary Chase down to this hour been most solicitous to so contrive by the adoption of such methods and by such division of the work in different places as to prevent counterfeit or to make it next to impossible. I have heard with alarm there has been an effort, without any knowledge of those who have had special care of this interest, to put this in the hands of a company lately formed in this city with such stockholders, such directors, and such managers as have not inspired me with any great confidence. Such has been that alarm, sir, that I introduced a resolution in this House asking the Committee on Banking and Currency to investigate this matter. I have not been near that committee. I have taken no further interest in it than to see their attention was called to it, because I knew they would from proper investigation come to a wise result upon it. In the midst of this investigation, with all these matters around us in the air, with the suspicion that there is a disposition somewhere to consolidate that which has been done in three or four different places—upon paper manufactured under a penalty of felony for any other persons to have it even in their possession—here, by an amendment to an appropriation bill, without full discussion or examination, with only the examination now before the Committee on Banking and Currency, before they have reported, even before they have fully investigated the case, the gentleman from Connecticut has put in an amendment under which he says that he desires to emancipate the Government, so that it shall have the power in its discretion to put this whole matter in the hands of one company.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question there. I wish to ask him if my amendment changes the law at all from what it is now and always has been?

Mr. DAWES. If the amendment does not change the law I do not quite understand the gentleman's anxiety about its adoption.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me ask the gentleman one question more. Was not this appropriation bill, for the first time making a specific appropriation for the bank-note companies, a change of law?

Mr. DAWES. I do not propose any change of law. I do not advocate any change of law. Nor do I stand here to advocate the system that has been adopted and adhered to for these many years. I leave that entirely with the Committee on Banking and Currency. I think the question is of more consequence whether our people at home and the holders of our bonds abroad should have confidence in the genuineness of the article, than the question whether a man here or a company just formed here in this city shall have a contract or not; whether a bank-note company in New York, or some other bank-note company in another State, shall have a contract or not. I have nothing to do with that question. I care nothing for any of them. I am only a little solicitous, sir, that we shall go along carefully, and that if we adopt any new method of printing these notes and these bonds we shall do it after a committee shall have fully investigated the matter and reported. And the confidence I have in the Committee on Banking and Currency is such that I am well-nigh prepared to say that whatever they shall report upon this matter I will be willing to adopt.

Mr. RANDALL. The amendment of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] complains is intended to prevent just what he complains of, and would, if defeated, hand us over bound hand and foot to the bank-note companies, including the bank-note company in this city, around which he has attempted to throw suspicion and doubt.

Mr. DAWES. I do not want to give any discretion just now for the benefit of a new bank-note engraving company just established in this city. I warn this House, and I tell the country, that under the arrangement of a new bank-note company in this city it is proposed for the first time in the history of the credit of this nation to print here in this city, to engrave in the Treasury Department and print under the organization of a new company in this city all the sides and all the parts of the bank-notes and of the bonds; a thing which Mr. Secretary Chase, Mr. Secretary McCulloch, and Mr. Secretary BOUTWELL have all deprecated, contending that it was impossible to do the work in this way and protect the instrument itself from counterfeit.

The system of checks, which has taken each sheet of paper as it came from the paper-mill and held responsible different offices and different establishments, as it went from one to the other, until finally the last signature was attached in the Treasury, is about to be blotted out and to be done away with forever; and that, sir, without the knowledge of the law-making power of this country. And, sir, without any knowledge of these men, not knowing one of them from Adam, I warn this House and this country against such a rash attack upon the confidence the people have in the paper that purports to have the impress and seal of the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield now to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. KELLOGG. As the gentleman from Massachusetts has referred to me, I desire to ask him one question before he resumes his seat. I will ask the gentleman if he wishes to intimate that there is one word in that amendment, as I offered it, which favors a bank-note company in Washington in preference to the bank-note companies of New York?

Mr. DAWES. I understand the purport of it to be to repose entire discretion and confidence in one single person here, that he may have this done in one place or in two or in three, as he pleases.

Mr. KELLOGG. Precisely as the law now is. I ask for no change in the law.

Mr. HUBBELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if his object was, in discussing this question, to create an impression in this House as to what should be done before the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency is before it?

Mr. DAWES. When that committee makes its report I will be willing to act upon it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a single question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not yield further. I want to say in a few words why it is the committee believe that these clauses should go back as reported in the original bill; and the reason is in the direction indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who has just taken his seat, that it is not well now to change the law so as to give to the Treasury Department any discretion to change the mode of doing the work from the way in which it is now done. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] asks if it is not the first time that there has been any clause in an appropriation bill providing for the printing of bonds, notes, and other securities of the United States by bank-note companies. Undoubtedly; because in this regard the committee has revolutionized the practice.

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Mr. Speaker, has grown up and aggrandized itself from year to year under an indefinite appropriation that nobody ever knew anything about. It grew up until it employed from eight hundred to fifteen hundred persons. It was spending from $2,500,000 to $3,500,000 a year, and there was no scrutiny upon the expenditure of a dollar of that amount. The salaries of its employés were fixed by itself or by the Treasury Department; its expenditures had no let or hinderance. The Committee on Appropriations took hold of it and particularized its expenditures, giving so much force, so much money in the office, so much for labor and so much for clerk hire. On confronting the whole question the committee found that there was but one limitation that this Bureau of Engraving and Printing worked under, and it was this limitation: Years ago, public attention being called to the danger of counterfeiting and to the management of this Bureau, an intelligent committee was appointed from both Houses which investigated the question, and under such guards and guarantees, hedging it up as far as human wit could make hedge-rows, it provided that part of this work should be done by bank-note companies under private contracts, and part should be done here at this Bureau, so that the one should be a check upon the other.

Now, sir, this has not always been a favorite method in certain Treasury circles. The Bureau of Printing and Engraving has been restive under this system, because it prevented what has been going on in that Bureau, the aggrandizement of the Bureau and the concentration of all work of this kind here. But that was the only limitation under which this Bureau existed, and the committee found that under the system established by this intelligent committee of both Houses about $600,000 was being paid annually to private bank-note companies for their share of the work under a system of checks and balances. I do not know, sir, where one of these bank-note companies has its place of business. I do not know a person that is engaged in that business or has anything to do with it. I care nothing for them; but, sir, this is not a good time—I repeat the sentiments of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES]—this is not a good time to do anything that should give to this restive Bureau of Printing and Engraving, which wants to aggrandize its force and bring all the work here, the power it seeks. It is not a good time to do anything that can be taken as meaning that.

When, sir, the other day, after the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] had called out a disclaimer from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that anything of this kind was intended, and I had taken pains to say that I was glad to hear the disclaimer, a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] rose in his place and stated to the House that he wanted it understood that that disclaimer should not go as the sentiment of the House, and that he believed that everything connected with the printing of these bonds and the currency ought to be done here in Washington.

Now, sir, my opinion is, from an examination into matters of this kind, that the most expensive thing for the Government is a Government establishment. Sir, it never rests; it is forever gnawing at the vitals of the Government. You put work out by contract, and you may be cheated in the contract; but when you pay the bill, and when the contract is over, the expense stops; but a Government establishment to manufacture anything under the sun never ceases to gnaw at the Treasury; it goes on day and night; it has a hundred clerks this year, and two hundred next year; it spends $500,000 this year, and needs a million next year. You cannot find an instance of a Government establishment that does not aggrandize itself, one that does not constantly deplete the Treasury. I reasseverate the sentiment of the gentleman from Massachusetts that this is not a good time for us to take any step in legislation in that direction. If the House understands this question thoroughly in all its bearings, as I believe it does, it will have no hesitation in putting this matter back where we found it, and then let the Committee on Banking and Currency investigate the whole subject.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] before he sits down, if he did not vote to take the printing of the Congressional Globe away from private contractors and give it to a Government establishment?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not know how I voted on that question now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, the other day, when, at the close of the proceedings in the Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] offered his amendment, I was only moved to the inquiries I addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations by a general apprehension as to the effect of new provisions of law passed in the last moments of the consideration of an appropriation bill, because my experience has satisfied me that that is the most dangerous of all descriptions of legislation. In a moment of haste, without knowledge of its effect, without debate, without consideration, upon the suggestion of some one member, the existing law is changed in an appropriation bill, and then we have all after-time to regret that which we did under such circumstances. Not being able to understand the effect of the amendment of my friend from Connecticut, I addressed an inquiry to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to its effect in order that I might put upon him the personal responsibility of an answer to my question. The gentleman from Connecticut volunteered his assurance that his amendment would not change the existing law. I declined to take his assurance, not because I had not then and have not now entire confidence in the gentleman's belief in his own construction of his amendment, but because I designed to fix upon the Committee on Appropriations the responsibility for the answer given me. And they gave me by their chairman the answer that it would not in this respect change the existing law. But what followed? Upon a re-examination which the committee made of this subject they became satisfied that its effect would be to change the existing law.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not that; but they were afraid that it would leave it questionable.

Mr. POTTER. But what is an amendment that might make the existing law questionable but an amendment to change the existing law? Its effect will be, it is now said, to leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury to exercise his discretion where the printing of these notes shall be done. Now, if he ought to have that discretion, give it to him by direct law, and not by a clause in the last part of an appropriation bill.

I had not at that time heard anything in regard to a bank-note company in the District of Columbia. That negro behind the fence I never heard about until the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] suggested it. In regard to building up a great printing bureau here in Washington, I have precisely the feeling which was expressed in accordance with sound democratic doctrine by my distinguished friend from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] Under the present system, we have a bank-note which is printed on one side by the Government and on the other side by some private company; and by this system each acts as a double check on the other. First, the private contractors by competition compel the Government to run their machine at the lowest possible expense; and secondly, each party to the work acts as a check on the other in regard to the number of the sheets upon which the notes are printed. To consolidate that work in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury would, in the judgment of every financial man in the country I have heard from on the subject, be in the highest degree dangerous. That is a reason why there should be no ambiguity in this matter and why no change should be made leading to doubt by an unnecessary amendment like that proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut; for it is unnecessary, since the appropriation without the clause he proposes can give no one any new rights under existing contracts.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Some days ago a resolution was submitted to the House and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, directing that committee to inquire into this matter of printing and to report upon it. The committee proceeded to discharge the duty thus devolved upon them. How far they have proceeded or what they have done it would be indecorous in me at this time to say. But I wish to call the attention of this House to the condition of the bill now before us and to the proposed amendment, which met my approval in Committee of the Whole and still meets my approval, and I believe it meets the approval of every member of the Committee on Banking and Currency. Under the present arrangement the backs of our notes are printed by a bank-note company in New York; the faces of the notes are printed in the Treasury Department, as are also printed entirely some other securities, together with certain stamps used by the Government. When this subject was under discussion the other day I propounded this question to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations:

> Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if in preparing this bill he had any estimate of the relative amount of the cost of printing the backs of the notes in New York by the bank-note companies, and the cost of the printing done by the Department here?
>
> Mr. GARFIELD. There were such estimates before us, and the way we undertook to divide the two sums was by the actual amount paid last year to the bank-note companies and the actual cost for whatever work was done in the Printing Bureau here, and we reduced the whole amount nearly half a million dollars.

Now, in the bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations there was appropriated for the work done here upon the faces of these bank-notes and entirely upon some other securities and stamps the sum of $500,000, while for the work done by the bank-note company of New York they propose to appropriate $625,000. Now, in the face of the fact, which is avouched from the Committee on Appropriations, that the work done here by the Government, by its own employés, in its own Department—the most expensive, difficult, and costly part of the work—costs less than five-sixths of what is paid to the bank-note company for doing the work done by them in the city of New York; when we undertake to put the Bureau in a shape that will enable us at the end of our investigation to equalize and regulate as it should be the expense of this work; when it is proposed to make that amendment it is resisted by gentlemen, who complain that it is urged in the interest of some private company. Sir, I do not suppose that anybody here is acting in the interest of a bank-note company or in any other interest except that of the Government. But I do say that the House ought to be very careful not to shape their legislation so that they will throw themselves irretrievably and absolutely into the power of the bank-note companies to dictate their own terms. I speak what I think is the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like one minute in this connection before we leave this subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have agreed to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] for a few minutes.

Mr. TREMAIN. The Committee of the Whole on my motion adopted an amendment providing that appropriations for public buildings should not lapse into the Treasury at the expiration of two years, but should remain under existing law. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations informs me that he does not intend to call the yeas and nays on that amendment, but thinks it probable that some other gentleman will do so. If so I hope the House will adhere to the amendment. I am willing this language shall be employed, and I understand the gentleman from Ohio will agree to it: "shall only lapse after two years from the time that the last item of such appropriation was drawn from the Treasury." Under the bill now before us, if no amendment be made, the whole of the appropriation for public buildings will lapse in two years from the time it goes into effect. Under the construction of the Department as to the existing law it will only lapse in two years from the time the last item was drawn. This bill proposes not only to change the existing law in that respect, but upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] there is a still more stringent amendment adopted, providing that it shall take effect from the passage of this act.

The effect of that would be to deprive the city of Albany of the benefit of the appropriation of $350,000 made about two years ago for a public building in that city. We have ever since been laboring to secure the additional $150,000 required to be appropriated by the city of Albany; but until recently we have been prevented by the exercise of the veto power on the part of the mayor. We recently, however, elected another mayor, and during the last thirty days the requisite appropriation has been made by the city. I am apprehensive that under the provision embodied in this bill the appropriation of the United States for that building would lapse. It seems to me there is no reason why we should not sanction the liberal system heretofore pursued by the Department in this regard. We are satisfied with that, while under the new rule we would be entirely cut off.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina. I hope the House will disagree to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole striking out the paragraph relating to the assay office at Charlotte, North Carolina. The other day when this question came up in Committee of the Whole, and when unluckily I was absent, it was alleged that sufficient work is not done at the Charlotte assay office to justify the appropriation. I desire to state that the gold mines in Western North Carolina are being industriously worked by energetic and wealthy capitalists representing seven different mining companies. The reason that the business of the assay office at Charlotte has not come up to the maximum amount of gold found in North Carolina is very obvious. Before the war a practice obtained there by which this bullion could be converted into coin certificates payable at the Girard Bank in the city of Philadelphia, which certificates were available presently as money to the operators in those mines. A proposition to authorize again that practice has already passed this House and is now pending in the Senate. The work of mining is proceeding; the mineral wealth of North Carolina is being developed; and we only need such a provision to secure a full development of the vast mineral resources of Western North Carolina. In this connection I ask to have read some extracts from the report made by Colonel John H. Wheeler, a distinguished citizen of North Carolina, at one time the superintendent of the mint at Charlotte, and who was recently sent there by Dr. Linderman, the Director of the Mint, to make an examination and report upon this assay office.

The Clerk read as follows:

I trust that it will not be deemed improper to remark here that from the disordered and disturbed condition of the State in monetary matters, the scarcity and uncertainty of labor, the prices of cotton and the productions familiar to our people, the mines of North Carolina are not as extensively worked or vigorously prosecuted as formerly. Formerly the institution coined (from date of commencement, 1838, to its suspension, 1861,) $5,043,641 from the mines of North Carolina. In one year, 1847, it coined $478,820. The Mint at Philadelphia coined from same source $4,929,944. Last year the mines produced in round numbers $117,000.

The mining industry, as the price of cotton lowers, is increasing. I took occasion while here to visit the Gaston gold mine, at Keys Mountain, about thirty miles from Charlotte. It is being extensively worked by skill and capital, with every prospect of success. The Gold Hill mine, in Rowan County, the Wilson gold mine, near Charlotte, the Flint Hill, Cureton, Dorn, and Brewer mines, in this vicinity, are all now in operation. Others might be mentioned.

The reason why the products of these mines do not come to this assay office is that miners, merchants, and others desire a quick return for their labor in coin, or coin certificates of deposit which would be received in the different points of our country, especially in New York, the moneyed center of the nation. As it now works the depositor receives the identical bullion deposited, and is subjected to heavy discounts in converting the bar into coin or currency. When I had the honor of superintending this mint, from 1838 to 1842, there was a deposit of $32,000 placed there; the moment an essay was made of the bullion and its value ascertained the depositor was paid in coin. By an arrangement the Girard Bank of Philadelphia paid all deposits here in Philadelphia. This, by merchants and others, was generally preferred to coin. Some such arrangement as this must be made if it is desirable to make the office a benefit to the country and stimulate so important a branch of vital industry as mining. By it not a pennyweight of gold would pass the institution, and it would assume its deserved utility.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The hour to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was entitled after the ordering of the main question has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask consent to say a few words in reference to the provisions relating to the printing of national-bank currency. Unless the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] prevails the Government will be deprived of any discretion in regard to this matter, and will practically be forced to distribute this printing, amounting to $625,000, among four companies, three in New York and one here, upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who opposes this bill, has thrown discredit. In addition to that we appropriate, if that provision is carried out, $150,000 to the Adams Express Company for the transportation of notes printed in New York. To restrict the Government in this way in regard to this matter is clearly an act of favoritism toward these four companies.

If it can be shown that the Government can print the bank-notes as cheaply here, right under the supervision of the Treasury officials, as in New York, and with equal security, I am in favor of the Government printing all this money instead of giving the printing to these bank-note companies. It strikes me that this is the only legitimate and correct course for the Government to pursue.

I deny that there is in the city of New York that security in connection with the printing of the notes that there can be here. Under a proper system it will be impossible for any paper to be lost or any notes abstracted. In one case there was an abstraction of some notes; but thirty minutes afterward it was detected in the Treasury Department. That Department has in this connection a system of thirty-eight different checks—a system which for security has never been equaled, so far as my observation goes. In my judgment the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] should be adopted; for it is directly in the interest of the Government, while it does not in any respect interfere with the discretion given to the Secretary of the Treasury under existing law. If your Secretary of the Treasury is not a man in whom you have confidence, turn him out.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask unanimous consent to make a few remarks.

Several members objected.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is debate closed?

The SPEAKER. Debate is absolutely closed. The Chair will remark that no worse practice could prevail than to redebate appropriation bills in the House. Such bills are sent to the Committee of the Whole for unlimited debate. The rules give, of course, one hour for closing debate in the House after the previous question; but if this bill is to be thrown open to further debate, it ought to be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MELLISH. If in order, I would like to ask a question. I have not said a word on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had his opportunity in Committee of the Whole. If the debate is to proceed, the Chair thinks the bill ought to be recommitted. There is no rule to prevent any gentleman debating the bill as much as he pleases in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MELLISH. I have a very important question which I would like to ask. I think if allowed to ask it, there would not be a vote in favor of the bank-note company.

Mr. ROBBINS. I object to debate and call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit is not now in order, because the main question has been ordered and the motion to reconsider that order was laid on the table.

The clerk will read the amendments as reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and those upon which no separate vote is asked will be regarded as concurred in.

The first amendment on which a separate vote was asked (by Mr. GARFIELD) was the following:

On page 6 strike out "Chief Clerk and Journal clerk, $3,000 each," and insert:
Chief Clerk and Journal clerk of the House, (while such positions are held by the present incumbents and no longer,) $3,600 a year; two reading clerks, $3,000 each; assistant Journal clerk and tally clerk, $3,000 each.
Strike out "six" in line 113 and insert "four," and "including assistant Journal clerk;" and in line 116 strike out "ten" and insert "eight;" so it will read: "four assistant clerks, at $2,590 each," and "eight assistant clerks," &c.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 117, noes 21.

Mr. HOLMAN. On this increase of salaries I demand the yeas and nays.

The demand for the yeas and nays was refused.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was asked (by Mr. GARFIELD) was the following:

In line 514 strike out the word "purchase" and insert "furnishing;" in the same line strike out "200" and insert "5;" so that the clause will read: "for furnishing official postage-stamps, $5,000."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 68; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. STORM were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 70.

Mr. WOODFORD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 130, nays 90, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Bland, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Burleigh, Burrows, Cain, Caldwell, Cason, Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Corwin, Crittenden, Crossland, Crutchfield, Davis, De Witt, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Fort, Freeman, Glover, Hagans, Hamilton, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, Gerry W. Hazelton, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Houghton, Howe, Hunter, Hunton, Hyde, Hynes, Kellogg, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Leach, Lewis, Luttrell, Lynch, Magee, Martin, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McKee, McLean, McNulta, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Moore, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Orr, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Perry, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Randall, Rapier, Read, Robbins, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Sessions, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Small, Smart, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Strait, Sypher, Taylor, Townsend, Vance, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Whitthorne, William Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—130.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Barber, Barry, Biery, Bradley, Bromberg, Burchard, Roderick R. Butler, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clinton L. Cobb, Cotton, Crooke, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Duell, Eames, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Kasson, Kelley, Kendall, Lawson, Lowe, Lowndes, Marshall, Maynard, MacDougall, McJunkin, Monroe, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Phelps, Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Pratt, Ransier, Ray, Rice, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Starkweather, Christopher Y. Thomas, Todd, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Charles W. Willard, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Woodford—90.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ashe, Berry, Blount, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Eden, Eldredge, Elliott, Farwell, Field, Giddings, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hathorn, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, Hooper, Jewett, Lamar, Lofland, Loughridge, Myers, McCrary, Mellish, Mitchell, Morey, Negley, Phillips, Pierce, Poland, Purman, Rainey, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Shanks, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Stanard, Stephens, St. John, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Waddell, Wallace, Walls, Whitehead, Wilber, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, Willie, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—70.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was asked (by Mr. KELLOGG) was on page 15, line 333, to strike out the words "and of the independent Treasury."

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought under the heading of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury the amendment of the committee was to strike out the internal revenue clerk as well as the clerk of the independent Treasury.

Mr. KELLOGG. No, the amendment striking out the clerk of the independent Treasury at a salary of $3,000 a year was a separate amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 13.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries, notifying the House that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 994) to establish the Bismarck land district in the Territory of Dakota;

An act (H. R. No. 2675) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth J. King;

An act (H. R. No. 1220) for the relief of William Rood, late private Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 2350) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a certificate of registry and enrollment to the schooner Almina, and changing the name to Minnie Davis; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain Benjamin Gleadell, officers, and crew of the steamship Atlantic, of the White Star line, for saving the brigantine Scotland in mid-ocean.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The next amendment of the Committee of the Whole to the legislative appropriation bill on which a separate vote was asked (by Mr. FOSTER) was on page 21, line 491, to strike out "five" and insert "seven;" so it will read:

And hereafter no gauger shall receive a greater compensation than seven dollars per day.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 71.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WARD, of Illinois, and Mr. FOSTER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 80.

Mr. BANNING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 81, nays 128, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Averill, Banning, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Bromberg, Buckner, Bundy, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clinton L. Cobb, Corwin, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Fort, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, John W. Hazelton, Hooper, Houghton, Howe, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kelley, Kellogg, Lansing, Lawrence, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Niles, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orth, Packard, Pelham, James H. Platt, jr., Ransier, Ray, Rice, Richmond, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sherwood, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Stanard, Standiford, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tremain, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Whiteley, John M. S. Williams, and Ephraim K. Wilson—81.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Arthur, Atkins, Barber, Barry, Beck, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buffinton, Burleigh, Burrows, Caldwell, Cannon, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Cook, Cotton, Crittenden, Crossland, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eldredge, Elliott, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Glover, Gooch, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, John B. Hawley, Hereford, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Hunter, Hunton, Hyde, Kasson, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Lawson, Leach, Loughridge, Lowe, Magee, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, McJunkin, Milliken, Mills, Monroe, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Nunn, Packer, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Pratt, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Scofield, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Small, Smart, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Starkweather, Storm, Strait, Taylor, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Vance, Walls, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Wolfe, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—128.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ashe, Barnum, Berry, Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Comingo, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, DeWitt, Eden, Farwell, Field, Freeman, Giddings, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hathorn, Havens, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Herndon, Hersey, Hodges, Hubbell, Jewett, Lewis, Lofland, Luttrell, McLean, Mellish, Merriam, Mitchell, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Orr, Page, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Purman, Rainey, Randall, Rapier, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Sheats, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, A. Herr Smith, John Q. Smith, Stephens, St. John, Stone, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Waddell, Waldron, Wallace, Wheeler, White, Wilber, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, Willie, Wilshire, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, Woodford, and Woodworth—81.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am paired with Mr. MYERS, of Pennsylvania. He would if present vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. ALBRIGHT. My colleague, Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, is absent. If here he would vote "no." I desire also to state that my colleague, Mr. SHOEMAKER, is absent. If he were here he would vote "no."

Mr. HOSKINS. Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan, is absent. I am requested by him to say that if he were present he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was demanded (by Mr. COBB, of North Carolina) was the following:

On page 35 strike out the words:

Assay-office at Charlotte, North Carolina:

For assayer in charge, $1,800; melter, $1,500; clerk, $1,000; wages of workmen, $600; contingent expenses, $1,500; in all, $6,400.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

For care of public buildings at Charlotte, North Carolina, to be expended under the direction of the Director of the Mint, $1,000.

On the question of concurring in the amendment the House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 66; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. COBB, of North Carolina, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 94.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the yeas and nays on this proposition to make an entirely unwarranted expenditure.

Mr. RANDALL. The Director of the Mint says it is absolutely indispensable.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 35, noes 86.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 70, nays 136, not voting 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Barber, Barnum, Bradley, Burchard, Burleigh, Cannon, Cason, Clements, Corwin, Curtis, Danford, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, John B. Hawley, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kasson, Lawson, Loughridge, James W. McDill, Mellish, Merriam, Monroe, Neal, Niles, O'Brien, Orr, Orth, Packer, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Ray, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sherwood, Small, Smart, Southard, Sprague, Storm, Strait, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Wheeler, Charles W. Willard, and James Wilson—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Arthur, Atkins, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cessna, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Darrall, Davis, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eldredge, Elliott, Farwell, Field, Fort, Freeman, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hooper, Houghton, Howe, Hunton, Hynes, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Knapp, Lamar, Lamport, Lawrence, Leach, Lynch, Magee, Maynard, MacDougall, McJunkin, McKee, McNulta, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Niblack, Nunn, O'Neill, Packard, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, James H. Platt, jr., Rainey, Randall, Rapier, Read, Richmond, Robbins, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheldon, Sloan, Sloss, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Speer, Stanard, Standiford, Stone, Strawbridge, Sypher, Vance, Waldron, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Whitthorne, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Wolfe, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—136.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Ashe, Banning, Bass, Bland, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, DeWitt, Eden, Giddings, Hamilton, Hathorn, Havens, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hubbell, Jewett, Killinger, Lamison, Lansing, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Lowndes, Luttrell, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, McLean, Mitchell, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Nesmith, Page, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pratt, Purman, Ransier, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Sheats, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, A. Herr Smith, John Q. Smith, Starkweather, Stephens, St. John, Stowell, Swann, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Tremain, Waddell, Wallace, Marcus L. Ward, Wilber, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, Willie, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, Woodford, and Woodworth—84.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. VANCE. My colleague, Mr. WADDELL, is detained from the House by sickness. If he were here he would vote "no."

Mr. WALLS. My colleague, Mr. PURMAN, is absent. If he were present he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 369) to change the name of the registered steamer Oakes Ames to Champlain; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1573) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank, of Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was demanded (by Mr. GARFIELD) was as follows:

In line 1170, after the word "superintendent," insert "$1,800;" so that it will read: For expenses of packing and distributing official documents, including salary of superintendent, $1,800, $5,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. The law says that the salary shall be $2,500.

On the question of concurring in the amendment there were ayes 5, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was demanded (by Mr. GARFIELD) was as follows:

In line 1192 strike out "$125,000" and insert "$5,000;" so that the paragraph will read:

For official postage-stamps for the Department of the Interior as follows: For the office of the Secretary, $18,000; for the General Land Office, $41,000; for the Bureau of Education, $10,000; for the Bureau of Indian Affairs, $10,000; for the Patent Office, $20,000; for the Pension Office, $25,000; and for the national museum in the Smithsonian Institution, $1,000; in all, $5,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have asked for a separate vote on this amendment. As it stands it is absurd, because $5,000 is given as the footing of a paragraph containing separate appropriations of much greater amount.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not concurred in.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was demanded (by Mr. HAYS) was the following:

In line 1443, after the word "dollars," insert the words "with additional salary of $200 as disbursing clerk;" so that it will read: "chief clerk, $2,000, with additional salary of $200 as disbursing clerk." And in line 1448 strike out these words: "disbursing clerk, $1,800."

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not concurred in.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was demanded (by Mr. HOLMAN) was the following:

In line 1451, after the word "dollars," insert these words: "microscopist, $1,800."

The question being taken, the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MAYNARD. The amendment preceding that just disposed of was passed over while I was asking for a separate vote. It is that in reference to the salary of the librarian in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that that amendment is concurred in, and that we cannot now go back to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. TYNER.) The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MAYNARD. I demanded a vote before it was passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will accept the word of the gentleman from Tennessee. The amendment will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1450 strike out "$1,800" and insert "$1,200;" so that it will read: "librarian, $1,200."

The question being taken on concurring in the amendment, there were—ayes 28, noes 59; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. MAYNARD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 55, noes not counted.

Mr. HOLMAN. The spasm of economy which we had for some days seems to have gone by. I do not demand further count.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

The next amendment upon which a separate vote was asked (by Mr. PLATT, of Virginia) was on page 60, under the head of "Department of Agriculture," to strike out in line 1454 the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two;" so that it would read:

Engineer, $1,200.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to; this is one of the hardest worked officials in the department.

The question was taken, and the amendment was not concurred in.

The next amendment upon which a separate vote was asked (by Mr. LAMPORT) was on page 61, line 1484, to strike out the word "carriage" and insert in lieu thereof the words "baggage-wagon;" so that it would read:

For subsistence and care of horses, and repair of harness and baggage-wagon, $1,500.

The question was taken on concurring in the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 15, noes 64; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. LAMPORT were appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment be again read. It was adopted in Committee of the Whole by a large majority.

The amendment was again read.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 118.

Mr. SPEER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was put on ordering the yeas and nays, and only 15 members voted therefor.

Mr. SPEER. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

The question was put on ordering tellers, and only 11 members voted therefor.

Tellers were not ordered, the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the amendment was not concurred in.

Mr. SPEER. All of the eleven who voted for tellers were democrats.

Mr. McNULTA. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that all who voted for tellers on the amendment to strike out "carriage" and insert "baggage-wagon" were democrats. I would like him to make one exception, for I voted that way.

Mr. SPEER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; there were two republicans.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I insist that justice be done to my colleague, [Mr. THOMAS;] he voted that way.

The next amendment upon which a separate vote was asked (by Mr. GARFIELD) was on page 64 to strike out the following under the head of "Department of Justice:"

For care of and subsistence of horses, $1,400; repairs to carriages and harness, $600.

The question was put on concurring in the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 23, noes 92; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers.

Mr. SPEER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 100, nays 103, not voting 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Burleigh, Burrows, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Coburn, Comingo, Cook, Corwin, Crittenden, Crossland, Crutchfield, Danford, Davis, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Fort, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Hagans, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, John W. Hazelton, Hereford, Holman, Hoskins, Hunton, Hyde, Knapp, Luttrell, Magee, James W. McDill, McNulta, Milliken, Mills, Neal, O'Brien, Packer, Hosea W. Parker, Pratt, Randall, Ray, Read, Richmond, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Henry B. Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Sessions, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Stanard, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Strawbridge, Christopher Y. Thomas, Vance, Jasper D. Ward, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Charles G. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Wood, Woodworth, and John D. Young—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Arthur, Barry, Biery, Burchard, Cessna, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Conger, Crooke, Crounse, Curtis, Darrall, Dawes, De Witt, Eames, Eldredge, Elliott, Field, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hooper, Houghton, Howe, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lamport, Lawson, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morrison, Niblack, O'Neill, Orr, Packard, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Phelps, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Poland, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Rice, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Sloan, Small, Smart, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Strait, Taylor, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, White, Whiteley, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, and Pierce M. B. Young—103.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ashe, Barber, Bass, Berry, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Dobbins, Duell, Eden, Farwell, Hamilton, Harmer, Hathorn, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Herndon, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hubbell, Jewett, Kendall, Killinger, Lamar, Lamison, Lansing, Lawrence, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, McJunkin, McLean, Mellish, Mitchell, Morey, Myers, Negley, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, Orth, Pelham, Perry, Phillips, Pierce, Thomas C. Platt, Potter, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Sawyer, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Sener, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Starkweather, Stephens, St. John, Stowell, Swann, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Waddell, Wallace, Wells, Wilber, George Willard, Wilshire, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, and Woodford—87.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WELLS said: I am paired upon this question with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. E. R. HOAR. If he were present he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

The next amendment upon which a separate vote was asked (by Mr. HOLMAN) was on page 66, in line 15, after the word "Treasury," to insert the words "one clerk of loans and one clerk of currency, at $2,500 each; two clerks, at $2,200 each;" and to strike out in lines 15 and 16 the word "seventeen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fourteen;" so that it would read:

In the office of the Secretary of the Treasury:

One clerk of loans and one clerk of currency, at $2,500 each; two clerks, at $2,200 each; fourteen clerks of class four, &c.

The question was taken on concurring in the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 74, noes 2; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on a further count, as this is an increase of salaries.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that this amendment proposing an increase of salary be again reported to the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is a decrease of salaries.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. On this increase of salaries I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was put on ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes 23; noes 152.

Mr. HOLMAN. On this increase of salaries I ask for tellers on the yeas and nays; and I hope we shall be able to obtain votes enough to order them on the democratic side of the House.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object to debate and call the gentleman to order.

The question was put on ordering tellers; and only 28 members voted therefor.

So tellers were refused, the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment upon which a separate vote was asked (by Mr. HOLMAN) was on page 66, in line 31, to insert after the word "Treasury" the words "five chiefs of division, at $2,500 each; one disbursing clerk, at $2,000," and to strike out "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof "twelve;" so that it would read:

In the office of the Register of the Treasury:
Five chiefs of division, at $2,500 each; one disbursing clerk, at $2,000; fourteen clerks of class four, twelve clerks of class three.

The question was put on concurring in the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 109, noes 34.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on this increase of salaries.

Upon ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 28, noes 117; not one-fifth voting therefor.

Mr. STORM. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, only 22 members voting therefor.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment upon which a separate vote was asked (by Mr. GARFIELD) was to the following paragraph:

For labor, (by the day, piece, or contract,) including labor of workmen skilled in engraving, transferring, plate-printing, and other specialties necessary for carrying on the work of engraving and printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, the pay for such labor to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury at rates not exceeding the rates usually paid for such work, $500,000.

The amendment was to strike out "$500,000," and to insert "and for other expenses of engraving and printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, $1,125,000."

The question was taken upon concurring in the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 71, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Mr. DAWES. Upon this amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was again taken; and there were—yeas 152, nays 52, not voting 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Arthur, Atkins, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eldredge, Elliott, Field, Fort, Frye, Glover, Hagans, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, John W. Hazelton, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hodges, Houghton, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kelley, Kellogg, Knapp, Lamison, Lamport, Lawrence, Leach, Loughridge, Lynch, Magee, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McJunkin, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Milliken, Moore, Morey, Neal, Niblack, Niles, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, James H. Platt, jr., Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Read, Robbins, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Sheats, Sherwood, Sloan, Smart, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Standiford, Storm, Strait, Strawbridge, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Vance, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whiteley, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—152

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barnum, Bland, Bradley, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burleigh, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Crooke, Dawes, Dobbins, Eames, Foster, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, George F. Hoar, Hoskins, Hyde, Kasson, Lawson, Lowe, Lowndes, McCrary, Monroe, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Potter, Ray, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, Ross, Henry J. Scudder, Shanks, Starkweather, Stone, Tremain, Tyner, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, William B. Williams, and Woodford—52.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ashe, Banning, Barry, Bass, Beck, Berry, Blount, Benjamin F. Butler, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clymer, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Curtis, DeWitt, Duell, Eden, Farwell, Freeman, Giddings, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hersey, Holman, Hooper, Howe, Hubbell, Jewett, Kendall, Killinger, Lamar, Lansing, Lewis, Lofland, Luttrell, Marshall, McLean, Mellish, Mills, Mitchell, Morrison, Myers, Negley, Nesmith, Nunn, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Phillips, Pierce, Thomas C. Platt, Richmond, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Scofield, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, Small, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Stanard, Stephens, St. John, Stowell, Swann, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Waddell, Wallace, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, and Wood—86.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The last amendment upon which a separate vote was asked (by Mr. GARFIELD) was to strike out the following:

SEC. 3. That hereafter the rooms of each Department shall be kept open for public business, and the clerical and other force therein shall be employed not less than seven hours in each working day, from which time an intermission, not exceeding one half-hour each day, may be taken, under rules to be established by the head of each Department.

The question was taken upon concurring in the amendment; and upon a division there were ayes 93.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. GARFIELD called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 25, noes 129.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering tellers, and there were 18 in the affirmative.

So tellers were not ordered, the affirmative not being one-fifth of a quorum.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, one-fifth not voting in the affirmative.

The amendment was accordingly concurred in.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the engrossing clerk have authority to correct the footing of any paragraph where any change has been made.

No objection was made.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that——

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the bill be amended by adding the words "and to increase the salaries of sundry employés of the Government."

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not yield the floor for that purpose. I call the previous question on the title.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the title was adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2868) to render available an unexpended balance of appropriation for collection and payment of bounty, &c., for colored soldiers and sailors.

AFFAIRS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. TREMAIN, by unanimous consent, submitted an adverse report from the Committee on the Judiciary in the case of the application of certain memorialists from the State of South Carolina asking relief; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. RICHMOND, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Indian Affairs the bill (H. R. No. 1698) for the relief of L'Anse and Vieux de Sert bands of Chippewa Indians of the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

SETTLERS ON RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 3162) for the relief of settlers on railroad lands; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

CONDEMNED ORDNANCE FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. GOOCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3163) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the municipal authorities of Lexington, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

AFFAIRS IN ARKANSAS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith additional correspondence received since my communication of the 23d instant, in reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th instant, requesting copies of correspondence between persons claiming to be governor of Arkansas and myself relating to troubles in that State.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, April 28, 1874.

J. & T. GREEN.

Mr. LAMAR asked, and obtained unanimous consent, to have recommitted to the Committee on War Claims the papers and adverse report in the case of J. & T. Green, of Jackson, Mississippi, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Consent was asked and obtained to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the following cases, on which no adverse reports had been made:

By Mr. CALDWELL: In the case of Henry Fullenweider;

By Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia: In the case of J. H. Lamb; and

By Mr. HAYS: In the case of C. W. Hatch.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as sated:

By Mr. COBURN: Papers relating to the claim of O. S. Rankin, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DUNNELL: The petition of James Morgan and 36 others, of South Bend, Minnesota, for an appropriation for the improvement of the Minnesota River, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. GLOVER: The petition of Charles J. Carlin, of Macon County, Missouri, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MARSHALL: The petition of George W. Morrison, private in the war of 1812 and a pensioner of the United States, for the benefit of the general laws granting increase of pension in certain cases, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McCRARY: The petition of W. H. Wilson, late corporal Company A, Second Iowa Volunteers, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PLATT, of New York: The petition of citizens of Schuyler County, New York, for increase of currency and free banking, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. STORM: The memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, declaring against the system of moieties, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WOODFORD: The petition of Patrick Murphy, for increased pensions to soldiers who have lost a leg above the knee, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 29, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 3091) to release J. W. Bennett from political disabilities was yesterday indefinitely postponed, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. We have been furnished with a petition on the subject, and probably it is a bill that ought to pass. I move therefore to reconsider the vote postponing it, and to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yesterday the bill (H. R. No. 3027) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Van Ranselear Morgan, Thomas M. Jones, and Charles H. Fauntleroy, of Virginia, and A. S. Taylor, of Maryland, was reported adversely by the Committee on the Judiciary because Taylor had no petition. Last night I received a petition, and I desire now to move to reconsider the vote indefinitely postponing the bill and to have it recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary with the petition.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONOVER presented the petition of James A. Harrold, asking payment for property taken by United States troops during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial of the Society of Friends of Marietta, Marshall County, Iowa, asking that arbitration may be substituted for war as a means of the settlement of international differences; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 675, providing for the abolition of the present system of compulsory pilotage on ships or vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the memorial of Dr. Webster M. Raines, of Macon, Georgia, praying compensation for professional services rendered Union prisoners during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SARGENT presented a letter from Mr. L. Upson, a citizen of California, with papers in the matter of the rancho of the ex-mission of San Buenaventura, a private land claim in California; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of William B. Bary, relative to the adoption of his patent combined letter-sheet and envelope by the Post-Office Department of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That Amelia Ferguson have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

There has been an adverse report, but this order is not asked for the purpose of the papers being referred to a committee, but that the petitioner may have possession of the papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then copies ought to be left.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Copies will be retained by the Clerk, and the originals withdrawn.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3093) to relieve David A. Telfair from political disability, to report the same back with an amendment inserting the word "political" before "disability;" and so amended, there being the proper petition, we recommend that it pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to remove the political disabilities of David A. Telfair, of North Carolina.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am obliged to object, not on account of that bill particularly, but the Calendar is loaded with private bills of various kinds and these gentlemen ought to take their regular turn on the Calendar. If we go to the Calendar, we can reach the bill to-day, perhaps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Dabney H. Maury, of Virginia, praying for the removal of his political disabilities, reported a bill (S. No. 743) to remove the political disabilities of Dabney H. Maury, of Virginia; which was read and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Charles M. Fauntleroy, of Virginia, praying that his political disabilities be removed, reported a bill (S. No. 744) to remove the political disabilities of Charles M. Fauntleroy, of Virginia; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 491) for the relief of Kerry Sullivan, of Company G, Fourteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 574) for the relief of Willis N. Arnold, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1578) for the relief of Martin Kalbfleisch's Sons, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BOREMAN. Some time since the bill (S. No. 398) for the relief of Hiram W. Love was reported by me by direction of the Committee on Claims favorably as to a part of the claim. Subsequently it was recommitted to the committee with the view of satisfying us that a greater amount should be allowed. I am now directed by the committee to again report the bill in precisely the same form as hitherto, favorably, as to the amount set forth in the bill.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2786) for the relief of John B. Chapman, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2208) authorizing the President to reinstate George M. Book on the active list of the Navy, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector United States Navy, praying that his name be placed upon the prize-list with those entitled to share in the prize-money awarded to the fleet of Admiral Farragut for the capture and destruction of rebel vessels resulting in the capture of New Orleans, reported a bill (S. No. 745) for the relief of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector United States Navy; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2346) for the relief of W. A. Saylor, of Bryan, Texas, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John D. Leflore and James C. Harris, executors of the last will and testament of Greenwood Leflore, deceased, praying compensation for services rendered as principal chief of the Choctaw Nation in making various treaties, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 746) to amend the act of March 3, 1871, so far as the same affects the pay of pay directors and medical directors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 747) to facilitate and regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign nations; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 748) to transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury all stocks and evidences of indebtedness due and held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior on account of the Creek orphan fund; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 749) to repeal a part of an act therein named in relation to the compensation of pension agents; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 750) in relation to certain salaries therein named and for the regulation of the civil service; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 751) to constitute a quorum and to regulate the proceedings of the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 752) to compel the performance of certain duties by clerks of courts and other officers in the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARPENTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 753) providing for the settlement and payment of the damages arising from the seizure and detention of the steam ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla by the authorities of the United States in 1861; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the morning business is gone through with, I should like to appeal to the Senate to allow me to call up the bill (S. No. 468) to revive and continue certain grants of land heretofore made to the Territory and State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of the several lines of the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar being in order, the Senator from Minnesota moves to postpone it and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the bill read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know anything about it. I object to its being taken up in an irregular way. It seems to involve the renewal of land grants. I do not know anything about the case; but if the Senate are now prepared to take up the bill and debate it, so that we can have full information on it, I shall not object.

Mr. BOGY. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that I think there will be no debate about this bill. It has been examined by the committee, and if the Senate will abide by their statements there will be no debate to consume time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think we ought to take up a bill which involves the renewal of land grants and about which I at least know nothing, except in the regular order.

Mr. RAMSEY. I would say to the Senator from Ohio that there is some importance attached to the matter of time as to when this bill is taken up. There is a great deal of property involved. It is very important if the grant is renewed, as I have no doubt it will be on a hearing of the case, that the parties should be enabled as soon as the spring opens to go on with the work. For that reason I should like the Senate to consider the bill now. It relates to a grant for an important road connecting the valley of the Mississippi with the British settlements.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that debate on the merits of the bill is not now in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will, under the circumstances, submit an objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair then will submit the question on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senate is to take up this bill with the idea that it is not to be debated and considered, it will be a mistake, because I suppose I can allude to the merits of the bill far enough to say what its general character is and that it respects the question of land grants pretty broadly. So far I can certainly go. Of course, a bill of this kind ought not to pass until it is fairly considered and the history of the subject is perfectly understood, so that the Senate will know whether it is standing by its pledges to the country or not in acting upon it. So far, of course, it must be debated. I do not object to its being taken up now, if the Senate chooses, so far as I am concerned; but of course it will dispose of the rest of the Calendar for this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

The motion was not agreed to; the ayes being 14, noes not counted.

DAVID A. TELFAIR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first bill on the Calendar is now in order.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask the Senate to postpone the Calendar and take up the bill indicated by me a few moments since, to remove the disabilities of David A. Telfair, of North Carolina, reported by the Senator from Vermont this morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my friend from North Carolina will not persist in that motion. If we take up one of these bills out of its order, we ought to take up the others, and so of other private bills. Now, if we can by consent stand by the Calendar and go straight on, this bill will be reached in the course of a day or two at farthest.

Mr. RANSOM. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, I will say to him that the bill has had rather an unfortunate fate in the Senate. The fact that a petition had not been presented led the committee to report it adversely before. It is important for the individual asking relief that his disabilities should be removed. I received a message from a gentleman of the House this morning urging its passage. I hope the Senate will take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to postpone the Calendar and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from North Carolina will state to the Senate what special ground there is for acting on the bill to-day, why it needs more haste than any other, it would be more satisfactory.

Mr. RANSOM. I am not informed of the particular reason why; but I expect that Mr. Telfair wishes to take some office to which he is about to be elected. The member from the district of North Carolina where he resides has just sent me a message asking to have the bill passed at once if it can be done. I would not insist on it but for that; or if it would give rise to debate I would not insist.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course there will be no debate when it is reached, although the Senator ought not to complain about the misfortunes of this bill, for we never had the petition until yesterday. It is not the fault of the committee or the Senate certainly.

Mr. RANSOM. I did not complain; I simply mentioned the fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is not made a precedent I do not care.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3093) to relieve David A. Telfair from political disability.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported an amendment to the bill to insert before the word "disabilities" the word "political."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed by a two-thirds vote.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE TO ARMY OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1933) to amend the thirty-first section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national militia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863. It provides that all officers on duty at any point west of a line drawn north and south through Omaha City and north of a line drawn east and west upon the southern boundary of Arizona shall be allowed sixty days' leave of absence without deduction of pay or allowances, if the same is taken but once in two years; and that the leave of absence may be extended to three months if taken once only in three years; or four months if taken once only in four years.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has that bill been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. BOREMAN. Yes, sir; by the chairman, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there any report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No written report.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like to object to the bill in the absence of the Senator from Illinois; but it is making a peremptory rule for leaves of absence which may be sometimes a great sacrifice, and they carry with them transportation, I suppose, involving very large expense. I do not want the bill to lose its place on the Calendar, but I think the Senate ought to let it go over until the Senator from Illinois is here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside informally for the present, and the next bill on the Calendar will be read. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the bill when he shall make his appearance.

JAMES LONG.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 368) for the relief of James Long; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of War is by the bill to cause to be paid to James Long the full pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of infantry of Company A, Forty-sixth Regiment of Missouri Volunteers, from the 13th of September, 1864, to the 3d of December, 1864, deducting therefrom any amount he may have received as an enlisted man during the time specified.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OTTAWA AND CHIPPEWA LANDS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. CONOVER. I ask that the Calendar be temporarily laid aside while I move that Senate bill No. 710, for the relief of E. Laws, chief engineer United States Navy, be considered. ["No!" No!"]

Mr. ANTHONY. Why does the Senator want to do that?

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill (S. No. 420) to amend the act entitled "An act for the restoration to homestead entry and to market of certain lands in Michigan," approved June 10, 1872, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section amends the act approved June 10, 1872, entitled "An act for the restoration to market of certain lands in Michigan," so as to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to cause patents to be issued to three hundred and twenty members of the Ottawa and Chippewa Indians of Michigan for the selections found to have been made by them, but which were not prior to the passage of that act regularly reported and recognized by the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and the remainder of those lands not disposed of, and not valuable mainly for pine timber, shall be subject to entry under the homestead laws for one year from the passage of the present act, and the lands remaining thereafter undisposed of shall be restored to market.

The second section permits all Indians who have settled upon and made improvements on section 10, in township 47 north, of range 2 east, and section 4, in township 47 north, of range 3 west, Michigan, to enter not exceeding eighty acres each, at the minimum price of land, upon making proof of such settlement and improvement before the register of the land office at Marquette, Michigan; and when these entries shall have been completed in accordance herewith the remaining lands embraced within the limits of these sections shall be restored to market.

The third section provides that all actual, permanent, bona fide settlers on any of the lands reserved for Indian purposes under the treaty with the Ottawa and Chippewa Indians of Michigan of July 31, 1855, shall be entitled to enter not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres of land, either under the homestead laws or to pay the minimum price of land, on making proof of his or her settlement and continued residence before the expiration of ninety days from the passage of the present act, in case such settlers do not claim any of the lands heretofore patented to Indians, or in conflict with the selections found to have been made by Indians referred to in the first section of this bill, and shall have settled upon those lands prior to the 1st day of January, 1874.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have that bill explained. It seems to be of importance, disposing of pine lands and those not pine lands.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator who reported this bill not being present, [Mr. OGLESBY,] as I know something of it I will state to the Senator that it is merely carrying out the provisions of the act of June 10, 1872. It was found under that act by examination that though certain Indians had received certificates of selection, those certificates by some irregularity never reached the Department, and so the patents have not been issued. They were entitled to them under the provisions of the statute, but have not received their rights. The Government on its part was unable to issue the patents because the selections had not been entered upon the books of the Department here.

The Secretary of the Interior discovering this error, draughted a bill which has been submitted here and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and they have reported it substantially as prepared by the Secretary. So far as regards pine lands, the proposition of the bill is to open those lands to homesteads except such lands as are mainly valuable for pine purposes, and those are to be offered at public sale upon thirty days' notice, so that there can be no loss to the Government. I can see no objection to the bill, and I believe it conforms to the wishes of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I hope the bill will pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

SPENCER & MEAD.

The bill (H. R. No. 1331) for the relief of Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, for supplies furnished the Kansas tribe of Indians, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It requires the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be paid to Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, late the firm of Spencer & Mead, $7,509.83, and interest on that sum at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 6th of August, 1867, until paid, out of any money now due or owing, or that may at any time hereafter become due and owing the Kansas tribe of Indians, in the State of Kansas, from the proceeds arising from the sale of lands owned by that tribe in Kansas, in full compensation for the goods and provisions furnished those Indians by Spencer & Mead during the years 1866 and 1867.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] I believe reported that bill. I should like to inquire of him upon what ground it is that it provides for the payment of interest on this claim?

Mr. INGALLS. Messrs. Spencer & Mead were licensed Indian traders among the Kaw tribe of Indians at the time referred to in this bill. During a period of great destitution they advanced a certain amount of supplies to the Indians, consisting of flour, bacon, coffee, sugar, and other provisions, which the Indians were unable to pay for out of their annuities and other funds. This bill provides that Spencer & Mead shall be reimbursed for the supplies furnished by them during that period, out of any funds that the Indians themselves may be entitled to receive from the sale of their lands, which are now in process of being disposed of to actual settlers. The Indians themselves have been consulted about this matter, and have filed with the papers in the case a full consent to the terms of this bill. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has also examined it, and gives it his full approval. Interest is to be paid simply because the payment of the principal has been unduly and improperly delayed.

Mr. WRIGHT. So far as the claim to interest is concerned, I understand it is based wholly on the consent of the Indians, the money coming out of their property and not out of the Government.

Mr. INGALLS. Entirely so. That appears by their agreement filed in writing.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM N. WILLIAMS.

The bill (H. R. No. 1772) for the relief of William N. Williams, late a second lieutenant of volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that William N. Williams, late a second lieutenant of the Sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry, be mustered as such second lieutenant, to date from the 30th of March, 1862; and that the Paymaster-General of the Army pay him, out of any money in the Treasury appropriated for the pay of the Army, the sum of $138.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CENTRAL BRANCH UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 587) declaring the true intent and meaning of the Union Pacific Railroad acts, approved July 3, 1862, July 2, 1864, and July 3, 1866, and for other purposes.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that that bill may be laid aside, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to the present consideration of the bill, it will be laid aside.

Mr. WRIGHT. I propose to make a motion in connection with the bill. I understand the Senator from Kansas to object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He does.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not propose to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time; but I move that the bill be placed at the head of the Calendar.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been laid aside by objection, no motion can be made upon it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rose in my place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa did not rise in his place until after the bill had been laid aside on the objection of the Senator from Kansas. Not being before the Senate, it is not the subject of a motion.

Mr. WRIGHT. I can move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move then to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to postpone the Calendar and proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 587) declaring the true intent and meaning of the Union Pacific Railroad acts, approved July 1, 1862, July 2, 1864, and July 3, 1866, and for other purposes.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say to the Senate that there are about eight millions of money involved in that bill; that is to say, if this bill shall not pass, the subject-matter is before the several Departments as to the construction they shall give to the existing statutes touching the Pacific railroads, and there is a claim on the part of the Central Branch that it is entitled to lands for building the road from its terminus, one hundred miles from the Missouri River, to the one hundredth meridian of west longitude. I do not propose to insist on a disposition of this bill this morning; but all I ask is that the bill shall not lose its place on the Calendar. It is a matter on which I feel no personal interest in the world; but it is a matter of essential importance to the country that this bill should be disposed of before Congress adjourns. If there can be an agreement on the part of the Senate that it shall not lose its place on the Calendar, I shall not insist on the motion at this time; but it ought to be disposed of at some time before the adjournment, and my wish was that it should not lose its place on the Calendar. If there be no objection that it shall not lose its place on the Calendar, I shall not insist on my motion, but let it pass over with that understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent to place this bill at the head of the Calendar, to be called first each morning.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope it will not be placed at the head of the Calendar. We shall never consider the bill in the morning hour; it is too important for that. I agree perfectly with the Senator from Iowa in the conclusion of his report, but this is a matter that will involve a great deal of discussion. It involves the title to millions of dollars by a very large and influential company, and it is very natural that they should insist upon being heard, and we shall waste morning after morning without reaching any result. I think it is an important bill, and it ought to be considered and ought to be made the special order for some particular time.

Mr. WRIGHT. That being the wish of the Senator from Kentucky, who is a member of the committee and concurred in the report, I shall not at this time press the motion; but having called the attention of the Senate to the importance of the question, I now give notice that I shall at the very earliest day I can get the floor move to proceed to the consideration of the bill. I withdraw my motion for the present.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to the fact that the bill (H. R. No. 1933) to amend the thirty-first section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national militia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, was passed over this morning informally before he entered the Chamber. It will be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desired an explanation of that bill, and the Senator being absent it was laid aside. It seems to me that if it be mandatory it might interfere with the military service, and it might involve a considerable expense for leaves of absence if they carry transportation, as to which I am not informed. I should like to have the Senator explain the ground of this proposed legislation.

Mr. LOGAN. The officers of the Army are entitled to leave of absence. The only object of this bill is, where the distance is so great, as in Arizona, that the thirty days' annual leave of absence that they are entitled to now by law is not sufficient for them to go and return and transact any business whatever or make any visits to their friends, to allow double the time, but only once in two years.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator whether leave of absence carries transportation?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; not at all. A leave of absence is allowed by law, but it only grants officers leave to go away. They furnish their own transportation?

Mr. SHERMAN. The right might be conferred by law; but the time and circumstances ought to be entirely under the control of the Secretary of War or the proper officer who gives the leave. If this is a right conferred by law, it may be demanded when the service will not allow it.

Mr. LOGAN. It may be demanded by law now.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the time and circumstance ought to be under the control of the Secretary of War or the proper officer.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not see that the bill changes the law in that particular. There is no time specified. It is any time during the two years. When leave is applied for, under the discretion of the Secretary of War it may not be granted at that time on that application; but the officer is certainly entitled to it during that term at some time; but that is at the discretion of the Secretary of War. It is the same as the law now, except that it extends the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Having called the attention of the Senator to it, if he is satisfied it is right I shall make no further objection to the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. This only extends the time by doubling the period, limiting it to once in two years, so as to give those at far distances an opportunity to return home and visit friends and come back again. That is all the change there is made in the law by this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLOWANCES TO ARMY OFFICERS.

The bill (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War, under the act approved July 15, 1870, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill approves the action heretofore taken by the Secretary of War, to cause the year's pay and allowances granted by the act approved July 15, 1870, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," to such commissioned officers of the Regular Army as were under that act mustered out of the service of the United States to be refunded when any of the officers have been, or shall be, again commissioned in the Regular Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. L. PARVIN AND H. A. GREENE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 589) for the relief of Washington L. Parvin and Henry A. Greene, late captains of California Volunteers; which was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is by the bill made the duty of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to examine and determine the amounts justly due Washington L. Parvin for expenses incurred by him in recruiting, transporting, and subsisting Company F, First Regiment Infantry California Volunteers, in the year 1861, in the State of California, and also what is justly due Henry A. Greene for expenses incurred by him in recruiting, transporting, and subsisting Company G, First Regiment Infantry California Volunteers, in the year 1861, in the State of California; but in no case shall the amount allowed to Parvin exceed $991.10, nor shall the amount allowed to Greene exceed $3,303.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIAS C. BOUDINOT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 826) for the relief of Elias C. Boudinot; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the civil proceedings now pending in the name of the United States against the property claimed by Elias C. Boudinot, for alleged violations of the internal-revenue laws, be discontinued and dismissed, and that the property seized and taken from him, and the gross proceeds of the sale of any such property, on account of alleged violations of those laws, be returned and restored to him by the proper officers of the Government; but the taxes legally due from and unpaid by Boudinot, in respect to the business, must have first been paid or deducted from the proceeds.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported an amendment to strike out all after the word "dismissed," in the sixth line of the bill, as follows:

And that the property seized and taken from him, and the gross proceeds of the sale of any such property, on account of alleged violations of said laws, be returned and restored to him by the proper officers of the Government: Provided, That taxes legally due from and unpaid by said Boudinot, in respect to the business, shall have first been paid or deducted from the proceeds aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM J. PATTON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 459) for the relief of William J. Patton.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over. It raises a very important principle.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would suggest to the Senator from Vermont that he allow the report to be read in this case, so that we may see the question that is involved.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am perfectly willing to hear the report, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report submitted by Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, on the 10th of March.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill go over. It will certainly lead to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War upon the petition of the Legislature of Montana Territory, transmitted to him, by order of the Senate, asking protection for citizens of Deer Lodge and Missoula Counties against the depredations of roving bands of Indians; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1935) for the relief of William J. Scott, late aid-de-camp on the staff of General Spear.

SUPPLEMENTARY CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1, being the civil-rights bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves to postpone the Calendar and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. What bill is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The supplemental civil-rights bill

Mr. DAVIS. Is it called up for action or for a speech?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. For the purpose of action.

Mr. EDMUNDS. For the purpose of passage.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with an amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement; and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported, in whole or in part, by general taxation; and of cemeteries so supported, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in an action on the case, with full costs; and shall also, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year: Provided, That the party aggrieved shall not recover more than one penalty; and when the offense is a refusal of burial, the penalty may be recovered by the heirs at law of the person whose body has been refused burial: And provided further, That all persons may elect to sue for the penalty aforesaid or to proceed under their rights at common law and by State statutes; and having so elected to proceed in the one mode or the other, their right to proceed in the other jurisdiction shall be barred. But this proviso shall not apply to criminal proceedings, either under this act or the criminal law of any State.

SEC. 3. That the district and circuit courts of the United States shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several States, cognizance of all crimes and offenses against, and violations of, the provisions of this act; and actions for the penalty given by the preceding section may be prosecuted in the territorial, district, or circuit courts of the United States wherever the defendant may be found, without regard to the other party. And the district attorneys, marshals, and deputy marshals of the United States, and commissioners appointed by the circuit and territorial courts of the United States, with powers of arresting and imprisoning or bailing offenders against the laws of the United States, are hereby specially authorized and required to institute proceedings against every person who shall violate the provisions of this act, and cause him to be arrested and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States or territorial court as by law has cognizance of the offense, except in respect of the right of action accruing to the person aggrieved; and such district attorneys shall cause such proceedings to be prosecuted to their termination as in other cases: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to deny or defeat any right of civil action accruing to any person, whether by reason of this act or otherwise. And any district attorney who shall willfully fail to institute and prosecute the proceedings herein required shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered by an action on the case, with full costs, and shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be find not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000.

SEC. 4. That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

SEC. 5. That all cases arising under the provisions of this act in the courts of the United States shall be reviewable by the Supreme Court of the United States without regard to the sum in controversy, under the same provisions and regulations as are now provided by law for the review of other causes in said court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. NORWOOD. I desire to submit some remarks on this bill, but I am not able to do so to-day in consequence of a cold. I would be glad if we could go on to-day with other matters, so that I may have the floor to-morrow.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would gladly forego making any remarks to have a vote on the bill. As it appears the vote cannot be taken at once, I will occupy the time of the Senate for a short period.

Mr. President, the Committee on the Judiciary have devolved on me, on whom it should not have been imposed, the duty of presenting and explaining this bill, which I shall do in the most concise manner, even pruning from my remarks such comment as a measure having for its object the civil rights of all might naturally inspire in the councils of a free people.

I invoke for the bill a calm, impartial, and unpartisan consideration, and ask its adoption only as it commends itself as consistent with the permanent interests of the nation, with the Constitution, and with justice to all classes of citizens. Would that the author of the measure was here to present and defend it! To our views it would have been becoming that he who was in the forum the foremost leader of the grandest victory of the nineteenth century in the western hemisphere, the victory of freedom over slavery, should have completed the work he so efficiently aided. But it was otherwise decreed.

I call the attention of the Senate to but two sections of this measure—the first section and the fourth section of the amendment; the other parts of the bill being mere machinery to carry those into effect. The first section provides:

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of pulic amusement; and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence, supported in whole or in part by general taxation, and of cemeteries so supported; subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

The fourth section provides—

That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States or of any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

Thirteen years ago in this Republic, the foundation principles of which are freedom and political equality, there were four million slaves. There came a bloody war between those who theretofore had striven together for the glory of the Republic—a war rendered the more terrific and destructive by the universal bravery and heroism of the American character. This war was followed by amendments to the Constitution which were discussed and contested in the national councils and on the public platforms with an energy and ability not inferior to those which had characterized the then recent contest of arms. That whole struggle in field and forum was one between freedom and slavery, between national sovereignty and State sovereignty, a struggle between United States citizenship and State citizenship, and the superiority of the allegiance due to each. We all know how the contest was decided.

It is the one purpose of this bill to assert, or rather to reassert, "freedom from all discrimination before the law on account of race, as one of the fundamental rights of United States citizenship." If, sir, we have not the constitutional right thus to legislate, then the people of this country have perpetrated a blunder amounting to a grim burlesque over which the world might laugh were it not that it is a blunder over which humanity would have occasion to mourn. Sir, we have the right, in the language of the Constitution, to give "to all persons within the jurisidction of the United States the equal protection of the laws."

This bill when enacted, it is believed, will be a finality, removing from legislation, from politics, and from society, an injurious agitation, and securing to every citizen that proud equality which our nation declares to be his right, and which is a boon in defense of which most men would die.

It is the friction created by discrimination among citizens in the administration of law that disturbs the harmony of government. Let us take away the foreign substance. We know we have proven that equality is the true principle on which to run society; give it full play with no obstruction, and the machine will run noiselessly and without a jar. On the contrary, keep four millions impressed with the conviction that they are denied the full and perfect enjoyment of that equality which all others have guaranteed to them, and that by a nation they are taxed to support, and to defend which they fought, and they will be dissatisfied, asserting, and obtrusive; and their obtrusions will engender prejudice and augment the evil.

The colored citizens ask this legislation, not because they seek to force themselves into associations with the whites, but because they have their prides and emulations among themselves, and wish there in those associations to feel that there is no ban upon them, but that they are as fully enfranchised as any who breathe the air of heaven.

I ask you, should the colored citizens be content to demand less than full and equal enfranchisement; should they say "We are content that we and our children shall wear forever the badge of political inferiority," would they not thereby prove themselves to you to be unfit for the high dignity to which the nation has called them? Let us not doubt the foundation principle of our Government; it has always proved true. Give equality to all. Our confidence will not be abused.

This bill applies alike to the white citizen and to the colored citizen.

I am aware that the majority of the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-house case, (16 Wallace,) giving construction to the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments in the light of the history which called them into being, make them apply especially, though not exclusively I think, to the enfranchisement of the colored race. There can be no doubt they apply equally to all races.

The court, in the case of The Live-stock Association vs. The Crescent City Live-stock Company, (1 Abbott, page 38,) undoubtedly give the true construction to the amendments as to their application. The court say:

It is possible that those who framed the articles were not themselves aware of the far-reaching character of its terms. They may have had in mind but one particular phase of social and political wrongs which they desired to redress. Yet if the amendment as framed and expressed does in fact bear a broader meaning, and does extend its protecting shield over those who were never thought of when it was conceived and put in form, and does reach social evils which were never before prohibited by constitutional enactment, it is to be presumed that the American people in giving it their imprimatur understood what they were doing, and meant to decree what has in fact been decreed.

This bill therefore properly secures equal rights to the white as well as to the colored race.

Again let me say that this measure does not touch the subject of social equality. That is not an element of citizenship. The law which regulates that is found only in the tastes and affinities of the mind; its law is the arbitrary, uncontrolled human will. You cannot enact it.

This bill does not disturb any laws, whether statute or common, relating to the administration of inns, places of public amusement, schools, institutions of learning or benevolence, or cemeteries, supported in whole or in part by general taxation, (and it is only to these that it applies,) excepting to abrogate such laws as make discrimination on account of race, color, or previous servitude.

Inns, places of amusement, and public conveyances are established and maintained by private enterprise and capital, but bear that intimate relation to the public, appealing to and depending upon its patronage for support, that the law has for many centuries measurably regulated them, leaving at the same time a wide discretion as to their administration in their proprietors. This body of law and this discretion are not disturbed by this bill, except when the one or the other discriminates on account of race, color, or previous servitude.

As the capital invested in inns, places of amusements, and public conveyances is that of the proprietors, and as they alone can know what minute arrangements their business requires, the discretion as to the particular accommodation to be given to the guest, the traveler, and the visitor is quite wide. But as the employment these proprietors have selected touches the public, the law demands that the accommodation shall be good and suitable, and this bill adds to that requirement the condition that no person shall, in the regulation of these employments, be discriminated against merely because he is an American or an Irishman, a German or a colored man.

I have called attention to inns, places of amusements, and public conveyances, separately from schools, institutions of learning and benevolence, and cemeteries, supported in whole or in part by general taxation, because the condition of the existence of the former, differs from that of the latter, I assume that no one can question that schools, institutions of learning and benevolence, and cemeteries, which are supported by the taxation of all, should be subject to the equal use of all. Subjecting to taxation is a guarantee of the right to use. Even as to these institutions, which are the fruit of taxation, the bill does not disturb the established law, statute or common, or the discretion of their managers, except so far as the one or the other, in violation of the fundamental principles of our Government, discriminates against some one under our jurisdiction because of his blood, because of his complexion, or because of the cruel wrong of slavery which he may have suffered.

Uniform discrimination may be made in schools and institutions of learning and benevolence on account of age, sex, morals, preparatory qualifications, health, and the like. But the son of the poorest Irishman in the land, who has sought our shores to better the condition of his offspring, shall have as good a place in our schools as the scion of the chief man of the parish. The old blind Italian, who comes otherwise within the regulations of an asylum for the blind supported by taxation, shall have as good a right to its relief as if he were an American born.

There is but one idea in the bill and that is: The equality of races before the law.

The inquiry may arise whether this bill admits of the classification of races in the common-school system; that is, having one school for white and another for colored children. That subject has been discussed somewhat in the courts. In a case in 24 Iowa Reports, page 267, it was directly considered. There the court held that—

> The constitution and statutes in force effectuating it provide for the education of all the youths of the State, without distinction of color; and the board of directors have no discretionary power to require colored children to attend a separate school. They may exercise a uniform discretion, operative upon all, as to the residence or qualification of children to entitle them to admission to each particular school, but they cannot deny a youth admission to any particular school, because of his color, nationality, religion, or the like.

The law of Iowa goes further than the law proposed by this bill. Here there is no prohibition of discrimination on account of religion or of morals. It does not say that all youth shall have this right. The only prohibition in this bill is one which prevents discrimination on account of race. The same subject was considered in the case of The State on the relation of Garnes vs. McCann and others, in 21 Ohio Reports, page 198. There the court held—

> That the act authorizing such classification on the basis of color does not contravene the constitution of the State, nor the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and that colored children residing in either of the districts for white children, are not, as of right, entitled to admission into the schools for white children.

The constitution and laws of Iowa provide for the "education of all the youths of the State without distinction of color." In Ohio the statute expressly provided for separate schools for white and colored children. Therefore the decisions of those courts afford no precedent for the construction of this bill when enacted. The language of this bill secures full and equal privileges in the schools, subject to laws which do not discriminate as to color.

The bill provides that full and equal privileges shall be enjoyed by all persons in public schools supported by taxation, subject only to the limitation established by law, applicable alike to citizens of every race and color and regardless of previous servitude.

The bill does not permit the exclusion of one from a public school on account of his nationality alone.

The object of the bill is to destroy, not to recognize, the distinctions of race.

When in a school district there are two schools, and the white children choose to go to one and the colored to the other, there is nothing in this bill that prevents their doing so.

And this bill being a law, such a voluntary division would not in any way invalidate an assessment for taxes to support such schools.

And let me say that from statements made to me by colored Representatives in the other House, I believe that this voluntary division into separate schools would often be the solution of difficulty in communities where there still lingers a prejudice against a colored boy, not because he is ignorant, or untidy, or immoral, but because of his blood.

The colored race have in the last ten years manifested such noble and amiable qualities, judiciously adapting themselves to the demands of their peculiar position, that we should not hesitate to believe that they will in the future conciliate and remove rather than provoke unworthy prejudices; and there is nothing in this law which would affect the legality of schools which were voluntarily thus arranged, one for the white and the other for the colored children.

We were told that to give the colored people freedom was to subject the whites of the South to murder, rapine, and violence. But instead of this—while not forgetting those from whom they had received the boon of freedom—they as a general rule had a tender regard for the comfort and well-being of those to whom they were formerly enslaved, which fact, in passing, let me say, is strong evidence that those who held them in bondage were not, as a general rule, hard task-masters.

We were told that if you placed them in the Army they would not fight; but in the front ranks they gave proof of their claims to high manhood.

We were told that they would abuse the elective franchise; but unless a large majority of the Senate are in error, they have most wisely employed their privilege.

So now, invest them by this bill with full and unqualified privileges, and they will so enjoy them as not to provoke, but so as to remove prejudice.

If it be asked what is the objection to classification by race, separate schools for colored children, I reply, that question can best be answered by the person who proposes it asking himself what would be the objection in his mind to his children being excluded from the public schools that he was taxed to support on account of their supposed inferiority of race.

The objection to such a law in its effect on the subjects of it is that it is an enactment of personal degradation.

The objection to such a law on our part is that it would be legislation in violation of the fundamental principles of the nation.

The objection to the law in its effect on society is that "a community is seldom more just than its laws;" and it would be perpetuating that lingering prejudice growing out of a race having been slaves which it is as much our duty to remove as it was to abolish slavery.

Then, too, we know that if we establish separate schools for colored people, those schools will be inferior to those for the whites. The whites are and will be the dominant race and rule society. The value of the principle of equality in government is that thereby the strength of the strong inures to the benefit of the weak, the wealth of the rich to the relief of the poor, and the influence of the great to the protection of the lowly. It makes the fabric of society a unit, so that the humbler portions cannot suffer without the more splendid parts being injured and defaced. This is protection to those who need it. And it is just that it should be so; for of what value is the wealth and talent and influence of the individual if you isolate him from society? Great as he may be, he is the debtor to society. Let him pay.

Sir, if we did not intend to make the colored race full citizens, if we purpose to place them under the ban of any legalized disability or inferiority, and there to hold them, we should have left them slaves.

I saw this forcible and truthful sentiment a few days since:

> When men are completely sunk in degradation, they are apt to be content with their lot; but raise them a few degrees, and they immediately grow dissatisfied with their state, and are wretched indeed if they are not daily rising higher.

In the name of Justice let us now take our depressing hand from long wronged people. Look at their history. It was the rapacity of our fathers that brought them here. They have been docile and submissive to our laws. They have never been pensioners on our charity; they have cleared the forest, reclaimed the morass, developed our wealth, brought in yearly one hundred millions of dollars in cotton—one year one hundred and forty-four millions—and cotton is the equivalent of the much-coveted gold; and without return have supported in affluence many of our people and educated their children, and they have helped fight our battles.

Now let them rise. Let them realize the assurance that Providence seems to be giving them—that higher, still higher, they shall go.

I believe that there is before that race a great future, a future which will render plain the mysterious past. They will not only here develop the vast hidden resources of our illimitable territory and here become and remain respectable citizens; but under the tropics, where the darts of the Pale Rider visit with death the temerity of the white man who braves that vertical sun, there are more than a hundred million of their race. Elevated here, it may be that it is designed that some of them shall of their own volition there sow the seed of a free government and a pure religion.

It may be that in the morbid imagination of the proud some one may fear that the result of this measure will be to place alongside of him in inn or theater some one in every respect his peer except that he differs in complexion. And he may feel that such an event would be an indignity and humiliation. Be it so, sir. The dissatisfaction of a vain pride does not have the weight of the dust in the balance in the eye of reason or in the sight of Him who made of one blood all nations of men when contrasted with the political and consequently the intellectual and moral elevation of a race. Think for yourselves what is the import of that word "race," with its one hundred and twenty millions, its ever-succeeding generation moving on a stage that is probationary to immortality. I trust that in legislating on this subject the horizon of our reflections may not be limited by a few short years, or this brief generation, but that it may compass the long life of the nation, and the welfare of mankind.

Now let me call attention to the law. It is claimed that the enactment of the bill would be in violation of the Constitution, because the regulation of inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement, common schools, institutions of learning and benevolence, and cemeteries, supported by taxation, are under the regulation of the States and not of the General Government. The bill proposes to leave them under State control, and expressly says that all persons are to have the full and equal enjoyment of inns, &c., subject to the conditions and limitations established by law—State statutes and common law—with the exception that such laws must be applicable alike to citizens of every race and color and regardless of previous servitude.

Is it constitutional for the General Government to legislate to prevent discrimination on account of race, &c.? We maintain that the General Government has this right under three different grants of power.

1. Under the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, considered together and in connection with the contemporaneous history;

2. Under the provision of the fourteenth amendment which prohibits a State from enforcing any law which abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States; and also,

3. Under the provision of article fourteen which requires a State to give to every person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; and under the general power given Congress to enforce these provisions by appropriate legislation.

I cannot more forcibly nor with greater brevity show that these amendments were intended to do away with slavery—to wipe out every consequence of it; to prevent State legislation of every kind that discriminated on account of race, color, &c., and make the race formerly in servitude equal in all respects to other citizens—than by reading a portion of the opinion of the majority of the court in the Slaughter-house cases, (16 Wallace, 67, 68, and 69:)

But within the last eight years three other articles of amendment of vast importance have been added by the voice of the people to that now venerable instrument. The most cursory glance at these articles discloses a unity of purpose, when taken in connection with the history of the times, which cannot fail to have an important bearing on any question of doubt concerning their true meaning.

Nor can such doubts, when any reasonably exist, be safely and rationally solved without a reference to that history; for in it is found the occasion of the necessity for recurring again to the great source of power in this country, the people of the States, for additional guarantees of human rights; additional powers of the Federal Government; additional restraints upon those States. Fortunately that history is fresh within the memory of us all, and its leading features, as they bear upon the matter before us, free from doubt.

The institution of African slavery as it existed in about half the States of the Union, and the contests pervading the public mind for many years between those who desired its curtailment and ultimate extinction and those who desired additional safeguards for its security and perpetuation, culminated in the effort, on the part of most of the States in which slavery existed, to separate from the Federal Government, and to resist its authority. This constituted the war of the rebellion, and whatever auxiliary causes may have contributed to bring about this war, undoubtedly the overshadowing and efficient cause was African slavery. In that struggle, slavery as a legalized social relation, perished. * * *

The proclamation of President Lincoln expressed an accomplished fact as to a large portion of the insurrectionary districts, when he declared slavery abolished in them all. But the war being over, those who had succeeded in re-establishing the authority of the Federal Government were not content to permit this great act of emancipation to rest on the actual results of the contest or the proclamation of the Executive, both of which might have been questioned in after times, and they determined to place this main and most valuable result in the Constitution of the restored Union as one of its fundamental articles. Hence the thirteenth article of the amendment of that instrument. Its short sections seem hardly to admit of construction, so vigorous is their expression and so appropriate to the purpose we have indicated.

"1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

"2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

To withdraw the mind from the contemplation of this grand yet simple declaration of the personal freedom of all the human race within the jurisdiction of this Government—a declaration designed to establish the freedom of four millions of slaves—and with a microscopic search endeavor to find in it a reference to servitudes, which may have been attached to property in certain localities, requires an effort, to say the least of it.

You see that the court holds that slavery caused the war; that the war in fact destroyed slavery; that in order that its permanent destruction might not be questioned in after times, the thirteenth amendment was adopted; and that this is a fact so apparent that you need not to see it look with a microscope.

If the discrimination against that race for whose benefit chiefly the amendments were adopted is because of their having recently been slaves—and as the discrimination is confined to that race, is not that the cause of it—then we are authorized to pass all laws appropriate to efface the existence of any consequences or residuum of slavery.

The fourteenth and fifteenth amendments are stated by the court to have had the same origin. After Johnson's governments were created, the court says they imposed onerous disabilities and burdens, and curtailed the rights of the colored race so that freedom was of little benefit; that they could not own land, could not give testimony, and were excluded from occupations of gain. The court in the Slaughter-house cases further say, on page 70, 71, 72, thus—

The process of restoring to their proper relations with the Federal Government and with the States those which had sided with the rebellion, undertaken under the proclamation of President Johnson in 1865, and before the assembling of Congress, developed the fact that, notwithstanding the formal recognition by these States of the abolition of slavery, the condition of the slave race would, without further protection of the Federal Government, be almost as bad as it was before. Among the first acts of legislation adopted by several of the States in the legislative bodies which claimed to be in their normal relations with the Federal Government were laws which imposed upon the colored race onerous disabilities and burdens, and curtailed their rights in the pursuit of life, liberty, and property to such an extent that their freedom was of little value, while they had lost the protection which they had received from their former owners from motives both of interest and humanity.

They were in some States forbidden to appear in the towns in any other character than menial servants.

They were required to reside on and cultivate the soil without the right to purchase or own it. They were excluded from many occupations of gain, and were not permitted to give testimony in the courts in any case where a white man was a party. It was said that their lives were at the mercy of bad men, either because the laws for their protection were insufficient or were not enforced. * * *

They accordingly passed through Congress the proposition of the fourteenth amendment, and they declined to treat as restored to their full participation in the Government of the Union the States which had been in insurrection until they ratified that article by a formal vote of their legislative bodies. * * * *

A few years' experience satisfied the thoughtful men who had been the authors of the other two amendments that, notwithstanding the restraints of those articles on the States, and the laws passed under the additional powers granted to Congress, these were inadequate for the protection of life, liberty, and property, without which freedom to the slave was no boon.

They were in all those States denied the right of suffrage. The laws were administered by the white man alone. It was urged that a race of men distinctively marked as was the negro, living in the midst of another and dominant race, could never be fully secured in their person and their property without the right of suffrage.

Hence the fifteenth amendment, which declares that "the right of a citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by any State on account or race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The negro having, by the fourteenth amendment, been declared to be a citizen of the United States, is thus made a voter in every State of the Union.

We repeat, then, in the light of this recapitulation of events, almost too recent to be called history, but which are familiar to us all, and on the most casual examination of the language of these amendments, no one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in them all, lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have been even suggested; we mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him. It is true that only the fifteenth amendment, in terms, mentions the negro by speaking of his color and his slavery. But it is just as true that each of the other articles was addressed to the grievances of that race, and designed to remedy them, as the fifteenth.

The very object of the fourteenth amendment was then, according to the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court, to prevent the curtailing of the rights of this race and to prohibit the imposition of disabilities.

I insist that the principles upon which the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments are stated by the court to have been based and founded make this bill constitutional. They were passed, the court says, to give "additional guarantees of human rights; additional powers to the Federal Government; additional restraints upon those of the States." They say that after slavery was abolished it was developed that "the condition of the slave race would, without further protection of the Federal Government, be almost as bad as it was before;" that State laws were passed imposing on the colored race "onerous disabilities and burdens, curtailing their rights in the pursuits of life, liberty, and property to such an extent that their freedom was of little value;" that they were prohibited from living in towns, denied the right to purchase lands, to give testimony in courts, or to follow occupations of gain; that it was to relieve from these evils the fourteenth amendment was passed. The three amendments were passed as we insist, and as the reasoning of the court admits, to destroy all discrimination in the law among citizens of the United States.

This bill is authorized, too, by the provision of the fourteenth amendment which prohibits a State from enforcing any law which abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States.

The exact point which the Slaughter-house cases decide is that a law of Louisiana granting to a corporation the exclusive right for twenty-five years of having slaughter-houses, &c., within the parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and Saint Bernard, being eleven hundred and fifty-four square miles, is constitutional, and does not violate the fourteenth amendment; and as citizens of the United States we are all bound to respect that decision and not erect slaughter-houses in that district.

But in coming to this conclusion a majority of the court pronounce some opinions which may be thought to conflict with the constitutionality of the bill in question.

They held that "citizenship of the United States" and "citizenship of a State" were very distinct and different; that it is only the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States that are protected by the amendment; that the privileges and immunities of a "citizen of a State" "are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment." It is not necessary to controvert the opinion of the court, for they do hold that freedom from discrimination is one of the rights of United States citizenship.

It will be claimed that it is not one of the privileges of a citizen of the United States to have any education in a State; that a State may abolish all its schools. This is the point of the Ohio case. To that I agree. It will be claimed that it is not one of the privileges of a citizen of the United States to visit inns or theaters, or to have the benefit of benevolent institutions supported by law; that a State may prohibit them all. To that I agree. This bill does not say that a State shall afford any of these benefits to a citizen of the United States.

But it is one of the privileges of a citizen of the United States, as such, not to be discriminated against on account of race or color by the law of a State relating to inns, schools, &c., or in the administration of any institution depending upon the law of a State.

The trustees of a public school who should exclude therefrom a German who by naturalization has become a citizen of the United States, not because he was illiterate, or had a contagious disorder, or was untidy, or of bad morals, but only because he was of German descent, would violate his privileges as a citizen of the United States. And it is competent for Congress to make so doing a penal offense.

And the same is true if one of African descent was excluded because of his descent alone.

The Supreme Court tell us the fourteenth amendment was passed because States "imposed upon the colored race onerous disabilities," and "curtailed their right to the pursuit of life, liberty, and property;" that it was passed for the "protection of the newly-made citizen from the oppression of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him."

If the amendment was intended for these purposes it must, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, extend to all prohibitions against discrimination on account of race.

There can be no doubt that legal equality is now a privilege of United States citizenship, and can be no doubt that Congress has the right to enforce it by appropriate legislation.

The Supreme Court give a list of privileges incident to United States citizenship:

Coming to the seat of Government on business; access to the seaports; protection in life, liberty, and property on the high seas and within the jurisdiction of a foreign government; the right of petition and of peaceably assembling; privilege of the writ of habeas corpus; use of the navigable waters of the country; the right given by the fourteenth amendment to a citizen of the United States to become a citizen of a State by a bona fide residence. The court quotes approvingly what Justice Washington, under the old Constitution, considered the privileges and immunities of citizenship in Corfield vs. Coryell, (4 Washington Circuit Court Reports, page 371;) 16 Wallace, 76.

> The inquiry is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are fundamental. * * * *
>
> They may all, however, be comprehended under the following general heads: protection by the Government, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the Government may prescribe for the general good of the whole.

Then the court, in 16 Wallace, page 80, after citing this opinion of Mr. Justice Washington, after giving this catalogue of the privileges of citizens of the United States, say:

> To these may be added the rights secured by the thirteenth article—freedom; and by the fifteenth article of amendments—suffrage; and by the other clause of the fourteenth amendment next to be considered.

That clause of the fourteenth amendment is this:

> Nor shall any State deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The court interprets this clause, and says:

> In the light of the history of these amendments and the prevailing purpose of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause. The existence of laws in the States where the newly emancipated negroes resided which discriminated (with gross injustice and hardship) against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden.

So, Mr. President, the Supreme Court hold that it is one of the privileges of a United States citizen not to be abridged; that the State shall not deny (or shall give) him "the equal protection of the laws;" and that discrimination against a class is denying that equal protection; in fact, that it was the very evil the amendment intended to remedy.

It is true the language of the court is that it was "the existence of laws which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against the class," that was the evil to be remedied. There is no significance in the words "gross injustice and hardship." Any discrimination is injustice and hardship. If a State can discriminate in any degree against a class, it has political jurisdiction or cognizance of the subject of discrimination, and what is gross injustice and hardship is to be determined by the State, and this would nullify the prohibition. If the provision which requires a State to give "equal protection of the laws" is a provision against discrimination and in favor of equality, it is a provision against all discrimination and in favor of perfect quality before the law.

To show still more clearly the opinion of the majority of the court, that the fourteenth amendment vests a chartered right in the citizen not to be discriminated against in the law, and that Congress may properly legislate to that end, I call attention to the following position of the court found on 16 Wallace, page 81:

> If, however, the States did not conform their laws to its requirements, then by the fifth section of the article of amendment Congress was authorized to enforce it by suitable legislation.

The court thus clearly hold that equality, or freedom from discrimination in the law, is a privilege of a citizen of the United States, and that Congress may by legislation protect that right.

Mr. President, persons under the old Constitution became citizens of the United States, if there was such a thing, by being naturalized, by permanently residing in the territories of the United States, or in the District of Columbia, and derivatively, by being citizens of a State. It was a poor title, as the States could create such qualifications as they pleased and thus thwart and prevent United States citizenship. They did exclude four millions from this citizenship by discriminating on account of race. But a citizen of a State had some fixed privileges and immunities in the other States, and one of these privileges fixed by the Constitution of the United States was, and is, that a citizen going from one State should have the same privileges and immunities that a person of the same class had in the State to which he went. It is provided thus, in article 4, section 2:

> The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

This, as far as it goes, is a provision against discrimination.

The privileges and immunities which a citizen of one State was entitled to in another were only fundamental rights, and not such as were incident to residence.

The fourteenth amendment goes much further than the old Constitution. It makes United States citizenship primary, and State citizenship derivative, dependent on United States citizenship and residence. A citizen of the United States comes under the protection of the Federal Government as to his fundamental rights. It also makes all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to its jurisdiction citizens of the United States, and it prevents the privileges and immunities of a citizen of the United States from being abridged. The provision that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States" is to prevent in the qualified manner stated discrimination as to the particular class to which he belongs. Though a colored man was a citizen of Massachusetts, he would not formerly be such in South Carolina, because it was against their law for a colored man to be one of their citizens. A State formerly could reduce the rights of its own citizens, and all others fell with them. Now, the fundamental privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States are beyond the caprice of State legislation. This idea is well expressed by Justice Bradley in The Live Stock Association vs. The Crescent City Live Stock Company, in 1 Abbott, page 38:

> The "privileges and immunities" secured by the original Constitution were only such as each State gave to its own citizens. Each was prohibited from discriminating in favor of its own citizens and against the citizens of other States. But the fourteenth amendment prohibits any State from abridging the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States, whether its own citizens or any others. It not merely requires equality of privileges, but it demands that the privileges and immunities of all citizens shall be absolutely unabridged, unimpaired.

And now, Mr. President, what is the remedy? How is the United States, how are we, to protect the privileges of citizens of the United States in the States? We cannot deal with the States or with their officials to compel proper legislation and its enforcement; we can only deal with the offenders who violate the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States.

By so doing, so far as this bill goes, we do not interfere with the States passing and enforcing just such laws as they see proper as to inns, public conveyances, schools, institutions of learning and benevolence, places of amusement, and cemeteries—they may modify or abolish them at pleasure; but as no State under the old Constitution could discriminate in law against a citizen of another State as to fundamental rights to any greater degree than it did against a citizen of its own State, of the same class, so now no State must discriminate against a citizen of the United States merely on account of his race.

As to the civil remedies for a violation of these privileges, we know that when the courts of a State violate the provisions of the Constitution or the law of the United States there is now relief afforded by a review in the Federal courts. And since the fourteenth amendment forbids any State from making or enforcing any law abridging these privileges and immunities, as you cannot reach the Legislatures, the injured party should have an original action in our Federal courts, so that by injunction or by the recovery of damages he could have relief against the party who under color of such law is guilty of infringing his rights. As to the civil remedy no one, I think, can object. And there is the same propriety in punishing by indictment those who violate the established equality of citizens of the United States by depriving them of the privileges of inns, schools, and burial, merely because of their race, as there is for punishing criminally those who violate postal or currency laws of the United States.

A word now as to the fourth section, which relates to jurors. The provision that a citizen shall not be discriminated against as a juror on account of his race should commend itself to the good judgment of the Senate.

The large majority of issues of fact in this country are tried by the jury. It is an institution that has come to us from England as the companion of civil liberty. The advantages of this mode of trial over that by officers appointed for the purpose are, that the jury are acquainted with the mode of life, habits, and customs of the locality; that they know the witnesses, have sympathy with the parties; and going immediately from the jury-box to the community, they feel their responsibility and the importance of doing justice.

The jury is an institution for the trial of issues of fact by the people, in contradistinction of trial by officers. The juror is in no sense an officer. The performance of this duty, or the enjoyment of this privilege, appertained in England to citizens generally. The jurors were not required to take the test oaths as all officers were. They must be of the people, of the vicinage or body of the county to which the cause of action belonged; so the sixth article of amendment to the Constitution requires that the jury shall be of the district wherein the crime was committed. So that it is very clear that a juror is not an officer, but is of the people.

I do not know that a citizen has a right to be a juror; but has he not a right not to be discriminated against, a right not to be disqualified on account of his blood?

A law which should exclude all naturalized citizens of the United States from the jury-box would deny to naturalized citizens the equal protection of the law. Is it equal protection, that from the tribunal that is to pass on one's life, liberty, and property those who would naturally have an interest in him shall be excluded?

A State may make such qualifications of jurors as it pleases. It may require that they be freeholders; that they read and write; that they submit to an examination in the rudiments of law. But when a State says one class of citizens of the United States shall be tried by a jury which is or may be composed in part or in whole by those of their own blood, and that another class of citizens of the United States shall never be tried by a jury that has one of their race upon it, I submit the discrimination violates a fundamental right of a citizen of the United States, and denies them the equal "protection of the laws."

I have thus discharged, most imperfectly, the duty assigned me, and commend the bill to the favorable consideration of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to speak this morning on this bill. Indeed I am too unwell to do so. Some time before the bill is finally acted upon I shall wish to call the attention of the Senate to several considerations that I think ought not to be overlooked. But I now move to strike out the second section of the amendment of the Judiciary Committee. I understand that the amendment of the Judiciary Committee as a whole has been adopted, and takes the place of the original bill. We are now in the Senate, and it is in order; I believe, to strike out this second section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the state of the bill, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio moves to strike out part of the matter which has been inserted. That is in order.

Mr. THURMAN. The matter proposed to be inserted was inserted in committee and the bill reported to the Senate. Now it is in order to move to strike out a part of it, and I make that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as I understand, has not been adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is now pending. The question is on concurring in it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then of course it is in order to move to strike out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio can move to perfect the part proposed to be inserted.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I move to strike out the second section of the amendment of the committee. That is a penal section. I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and especially of the lawyers of the body, to one consideration in connection with this, apart from the objections that I think exist to the details of the section. The point upon which I invite the opinion of the lawyers of the Senate is this: if we pass this bill with this section in it, do we not thereby, if the bill is constitutional, oust the State courts of any jurisdiction over the offenses that are declared by this bill?

The first section declares—

> That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement; and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported, in whole or in part, by general taxation; and of cemeteries so supported, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

It will be seen that that section covers a very large field. It covers the right to the enjoyment of accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges in inns, public conveyances, theaters and other places of amusement, common schools, public institutions of learning and benevolence supported in whole or in part by general taxation, and cemeteries. It is very easy to see how large a field that is. And now the second section provides—

> That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in an action on the case, with full costs; and shall also, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year.

Then there is a proviso. The third section gives to the circuit and district courts of the United States, irrespective of the residence of the parties, exclusive jurisdiction in all civil actions provided for in the bill, and of the criminal actions that are therein provided for.

Now Congress has or has not the right to enact a law punishing the offenses or supposed offenses declared by this bill. If it has that right and exercises it, then I put it to every lawyer in the Senate whether that does not oust the jurisdiction of the State courts, occupying the whole ground? We know that there are certain powers that belong to the Federal Government exclusively; there are others that belong to Federal and State governments concurrently; and there is a class of powers that when not exercised by the Federal Government may be exercised by the State governments, as, for instance, in the case of bankruptcy; when there is no congressional bankrupt law in existence there may be a State bankrupt law or a State insolvent law which has the features of a bankrupt law, as, for instance, the law that has almost always prevailed in the State of New York. But when Congress exercises the power by the passage of a bankrupt law all State insolvent and bankrupt laws become ipso facto null and void; or at least are instantly suspended, and can have no operation or effect so long as the national bankrupt law exists. And so of other powers that might be named.

Now, the question for the earnest consideration of the Senate is, will not this be the effect of this law? If the law is constitutional, is it not easy to see that no more prejudicial law to the administration of justice, to the provisions for punishing offenses, could possibly be enacted than would this law be? If there is anything that tends to repress crime more than another it is that it is punished in the courts of the States, and in the immediate neighborhood where the crime is committed. There are in my State more than eighty-eight courts, nearer one hundred courts, courts in every county in the State, possessing criminal jurisdiction, with prosecuting officers in every county of the State, so that it can scarcely happen that a crime can be committed in that State worthy of being punished that the offender is not prosecuted and punishment meted out to him; but if this large class of cases in which the rights of individuals have been violated is to be punishable only in the Federal courts of Ohio, sitting at Cleveland and Cincinnati, the one in the northern district having jurisdiction over one half of the State, and the other in the southern district having jurisdiction over the other half of the State, it is as plain as that two and two make four that crime will go unpunished, simply because it cannot be prosecuted. Those courts are already so burdened with business that we have the petitions of the lawyers coming up to us beseeching us to afford them some remedy, because the courts cannot dispose of their business. If in addition to what they have now they are to be loaded down with all the actions that might be prosecuted, both civil and criminal, if this bill should become a law, it is simply providing that there shall be a denial of justice in those courts; in effect, it is to close their doors.

That, Mr. President, would be the case even if the State courts were not ousted of their jurisdiction. But if you come to the conclusion that this bill will oust the State courts of their jurisdiction in the class of offenses provided for in it, then I see no end to the business that will be dragged into the Federal courts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he means to claim that the State courts can have any jurisdiction over offenses that this act creates or any act of Congress creates?

Mr. THURMAN. There was no necessity for the Senator to ask such a question as that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought there was.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator does not imagine that I am so stupid as to suppose that a State court can have jurisdiction of an offense that is created by a Federal statute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then what does the Senator mean by saying that by this act which provides only against violating the provisions of it, punishing infractions of this law of the United States, that that is going to oust a State court of jurisdiction over the same offense?

Mr. THURMAN. I mean the case which is described here, the denial by some person to another of the rights which are supposed to belong to that other and which are enumerated in this act. Now, for instance, here are States in the South that have passed bills, enacted them into laws, more comprehensive than this bill and covering precisely the same ground. There a man is punished under the State law if he violates the rights of a citizen. If he does one of the acts described in this bill he is punished under the State law because it is an offense against the State law. What I ask those who support this bill to explain to the Senate is this: if this bill is passed, will not that State law become a nullity? That is the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will pardon me, I say no; it will not become a nullity.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator will be able to give good reasons why it will not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can give decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. THURMAN. If you go to decisions of the Supreme Court this whole bill is unconstitutional. I do not think there is anything plainer than that. If you go to two decisions of the Supreme Court the bill is unconstitutional. I think that is perfectly clear; but I suppose the bill is to be passed, constitutional or not constitutional.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator a question for information?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand him to doubt that if a mail-carrier is robbed in a State, the robbery being an offense against the crimes act of 1825, although the robber is punishable under the laws and in the courts of the United States, he is also punishable for the breach of the peace, the homicide, or the mayhem he may have committed? Shall I understand the Senator, transferring the illustration to this case, to doubt that such is the law, or to affirm that there is any reason in good sense why it should not be the law?

Mr. THURMAN. I have no doubt a man who kills a mail-carrier and robs the mail may be punished for the homicide; and if there is no statute of the United States that punishes him for that homicide——

Mr. CONKLING. No; if my friend will pardon me, he either does not perceive or he chooses to avoid the point of my question. I say that if a mail-carrier be robbed, the robbery of the mail is an offense against the laws of the United States triable in the courts of the United States. I say that the assault or the homicide involved is also an offense against the peace of the State in which it is committed and triable under the laws of that State and in the courts of that State, and there is no ouster of either jurisdiction in the case and no conflict of jurisdiction; and I ask the Senator to point out the distinction between that case and this.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not suppose that if a man robs the mail he can be tried and punished under the statutes of the United States for robbing the mail and also under a State statute for larceny. I do not suppose that can be done. I do not know that there is any statute of the United States that punishes assault and battery or that punishes homicide in a case such as has been supposed. We have statutes that punish homicide in places where the United States have exclusive jurisdiction and we punish homicides committed on the high seas; but I am not aware that we have any statute that punishes homicide committed in the robbery of a mail-carrier in one of the States. But here——

Mr. CONKLING. Would it be agreeable to the Senator to allow me to read a few words from the opinion of Mr. Justice Grier in a case reported in 14 Howard, page 13?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. It is an extract furnished me by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] and I read it to see whether I am right or whether the Senator is right in doubting the illustration in the case I put. The court says:

> Every citizen of the United States is also a citizen of a State or Territory. He may be said to owe allegiance to two sovereigns, and may be liable to punishment for an infraction of the laws of either. The same act may be an offense or transgression of the laws of both. Thus, an assault upon the marshal of the United States and hindering him in the execution of legal process is a high offense against the United States, for which the perpetrator is liable to punishment; and the same act may be also a gross breach of the peace of the State, a riot, assault, or a murder, and subject the same person to a punishment, under the State laws, for a misdemeanor or felony. That either or both may (if they see fit) punish such an offender cannot be doubted. Yet it cannot be truly averred that the offender has been twice punished for the same offense; but only that by one act he has committed two offenses, for each of which he is justly punishable.

The same pamphlet from which I read contains a reference to other authorities to the same point; and as the Senator has resumed his seat, if he will pardon me a moment, I beg to state my understanding of the provision he criticises.

Mr. THURMAN. Is what the Senator read from the opinion in the Matilda Fox case?

Mr. CONKLING. I read from a case in 14 Howard, page 13. The title of the case is not given.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Matilda Fox case was in 5 Howard.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio in stating his point did not read, although he may have referred to, these words in the proviso:

> That all persons may elect to sue for the penalty aforesaid or to proceed under their rights at common law and by State statutes—

They may do one or the other—> and having so elected to proceed in the one mode or the other, their right to proceed in the other jurisdiction shall be barred. But this proviso shall not apply to criminal proceedings, either under this act or the criminal law of any State.

So that as to the civil remedies given by the bill, in place of leaving, as I rather think there would be no question of our power to leave, every person subjecting himself to liability, liable in succession to an action at common law for the wrong he committed, and liable also for the penalty incurred by civil suit under this act, we have provided that whoever shall be injured, as here prohibited, shall have but one of these two remedies. His right shall become an alternative one. If a man by reason of his nativity or race be denied entrance to a hotel, if he be forcibly expelled or cast out, he may proceed under the statutes of the State, or on his common-law rights, and bring a suit for trespass to his person, or, in common language, for assault and battery. If, on the other hand, for any reason he prefers the jurisdiction which this act holds out to him, he may turn to the Federal courts and sue, not for the assault, not for the physical wrong done against him, but for the particular offense of denial of equality of right denounced in this bill. So then I submit to the honorable Senator from Ohio that, first, it is clearly within the province of Congress as affirmed by every analogy to which he can refer, and, second, the exertion of power proposed is rather sparing, rather a benevolent withholding of that measure of justice or retribution which it was competent for Congress to mete out.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I was very well aware that the Supreme Court of the United States had decided—first I believe in the case of Matilda Fox—that the same act might be punished by the Federal Government and also by a State government. But what was that case? Matilda Fox was indicted in a court of the State of Ohio for uttering and passing counterfeit money; was convicted and sentenced by the State court to the penitentiary of the State. She prosecuted a writ of error to the supreme court of that State, which affirmed the judgment; and from there the cause was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the point made on her behalf was that there being a statute of the United States punishing precisely the same offense, she could not be punished for that offense in a State court; that any State statute punishing that offense was null and void. A majority of the court overruled that doctrine, and were of opinion that she might be punished both in the Federal court under the act of Congress, and also in the State court under the State statute. But this is to be observed in regard to that case: the power granted to Congress in regard to coining money is express, "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States." It was argued that that power was to protect the purity of the coin, that it was for that purpose that that power was granted to the United States; but that the fraud upon an individual by passing such coin was an offense of which the State might well take cognizance and punish that criminally also. There is the difference. The power is given to Congress to punish the counterfeiting of the securities and coin of the United States in order to preserve the purity of the coin or to prevent spurious securities being put afloat; but the particular injury to an individual by passing a counterfeit piece of money upon him was said to be a thing of which the States might well take cognizance, and might provide their own laws for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did they not also hold that Congress might take cognizance of it and punish the same fact if they chose?

Mr. THURMAN. That is what I have just said.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought the Senator was undertaking to make a distinction between the power of Congress to punish an actual debasing of the coin and to punish the publishing it and uttering it as true, which is to the injury of the individual.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not propose to go into this discussion now; as I said when I got up, I am too unwell to-day. At the same time I may engage in it before the bill is through, when I come prepared with the authorities on the subject, and we shall see what the real state of the law is.

But now, suppose the law is as suggested by the Senator, that those acts can be punished by the State and also by the Federal Government, is it not simply monstrous to visit that double punishment upon an individual, and especially when the punishment provided in this bill is so disproportioned to the offense, so utterly disproportioned to it, as to shock the feelings when you come to read it?

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator refer to the criminal proceedings now?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, I do. Let us see. In the first place, after providing for the civil remedy, it reads, "and shall also for every such offense be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year." I can conceive of a multitude of cases in which that punishment for the offense supposed here is simply monstrous; and if in addition to that the individual is to be punished under a State statute—and we know that State statutes do exist in some of the Southern States—to the same extent, or anything like it, a double punishment is to be inflicted upon him in that way, I say that criminal laws, instead of being a blessing, are simply a curse.

But I do not wish to argue the question now. I wanted to call the attention of the lawyers—for this is a most grave consideration—to the point whether or not the passage of this bill will oust the States of their jurisdiction to punish for the very same acts which are here prescribed.

Mr. CONKLING. Without intending to enter this discussion now, I add a word to my remark made a moment ago to the Senator from Ohio, my motive being to call his attention to the fact that the counterfeiting cases, to one of which he has referred, are not the cases to which I referred and not the cases to which I should refer as most abounding in light on this point. The case I referred to is that of Moore vs. The People of the State of Illinois, which is in the 14th of Howard as already stated, and begins on page 13. This was not an instance of counterfeiting the coin of the United States; it arose in reference to the rights of slaveholders and their right to pursue their slaves. Illinois having passed a statute touching the concealment of fugitives, and there being an act of Congress then deemed perhaps somewhat more than constitutional, in the ordinary sense, an act supposed by some to impersonate not only the authority but the most sanctified mission of the Constitution, which act provided penalty and remedy for the same kind of interference with fugitives, it came to be the duty of the court to consider whether either of those acts displaced the other, or whether they could stand together providing two punishments for one act, that act being two crimes in theory of law—being duplex in the violation of duty implied in its commission; and considering the question the court through Mr.

Justice Grier said what I read and will not repeat, and added, speaking of these jurisdictions:

That either or both—

That is the State authority and the national authority—may (if they see fit) punish such an offender, cannot be doubted—

That declaration, I submit, is a complete answer, as far as the court can answer, to the point of the Senator from Ohio that when one jurisdiction occupies the ground it ousts the other. The court say that either or both of these jurisdictions—may (if they see fit) punish such an offender, cannot be doubted. Yet it cannot be truly averred that the offender has been twice punished for the same offense; but only that by one act he has committed two offenses, for each of which he is justly punishable.

I ask the attention of the Senator to these words:

He could not plead the punishment by one in bar to a conviction by the other—

There is the crucial test. Could a former acquittal or conviction be pleaded in bar? If it could, the Senator is right; if it could not, his argument has not a leg to stand on.

The opinion proceeds:

He could not plead the punishment by one in bar to a conviction by the other; consequently, this court has decided in the case of Fox vs. The State of Ohio, (5 How., 432)—

The case to which the Senator referred—that a State may punish the offense of uttering or passing false coin, as a cheat or fraud practiced on its citizens; and in the case of The United States vs. Marigold, (9 How., 560,) that Congress in the proper exercise of its authority may punish the same act as an offense against the United States.

Turning now from the question of power, which I think sufficiently settled by these cases, I make one remark upon the suggestion of the Senator that there is something barbarous or inordinate in the provisions of the bill. First, I deny that double punishment to any extent whatever is provided. I deny it in behalf of this bill and of the whole body of our statutory jurisprudence, because if the charge of the Senator from Ohio be well founded, it is true of every penal statute of the United States which I can remember or of which I can think, relating to any act constituting also an offense against the State.

This bill proposes to denounce specific punishment, for what? For an act done in violation of its provisions, and for nothing else. Does not every penal statute do the same thing? When we make it an offense triable in the courts of the United States and punishable with death to strike a mail-rider from his mule and rob him, is it not a case of the same double punishment which shocks the Senator? My friend from Vermont suggests that I should correct my expression by saying "a case of the liability to double punishment," which of course is what I mean. Suppose a mail-carrier in Oregon is struck from his horse and injured or killed, does any man doubt that the assailant or slayer is indictable for assault or homicide in the State of Oregon and punishable by all the penalties of the laws of Oregon? Does any one doubt either that the case I put is the very case which the crimes act of 1825 was meant to cover? Yet it is a case of double punishment, not extending merely to thirty days' imprisonment and to a fine of $500, but extending to a deprivation of liberty forever and to the taking of life. Certainly there is nothing peculiar in that regard in the pending bill.

The Senator says the punishment provided is monstrous because of its degree. I would suggest to the honorable Senator that a good remedy for that would be an amendment reducing the minimum of punishment, if he thinks the occasion calls for such an amendment, so that instead of compelling the court to impose a fine of not less than $500, the lowest limit of fine to be imposed might be less. But certainly little argument can be derived from the fact that the minimum stated is more or less, bearing on the power to legislate or the propriety of its exertion. Let me, however, read this portion of the bill in view of the charge that it is inordinate:

That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall for every such offense forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in an action on the case, with full costs; and shall also for every such offense be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year.

Such a measure of punishment, I confess, would sound extravagant to me if it were leveled at any of the acts which occur in the ordinary collisions and turns of life. If such a provision were liable to be violated by a man in a passion, by a man yielding to sudden provocation or excitement, by a man engaged in a rencontre, or having the excuse even of haste and petulance to mitigate his offense, I should say it takes too little note of human weakness and frailty, and makes too little allowance for those excesses and folly more or less common to us all.

Providing, however, for no such offense, for no such inadvertence, for no such temporary absence of the coolness and judgment which unfortunately does not incessantly govern human conduct, it lays hold of a studious, deliberate, intentional act, for which no such commiseration and charity can be invoked. It punishes the keeper of an inn who commits indignity and violence upon a man, not because he is drunk, not because he is boisterous, not because he is offensive, not because he is unclean, not because he is a pauper and unable to pay, not because he awakens hostility for any reason which concerns the interest or the right of him who visits him with indignity and wrong. It punishes only the man who indulges in assault, in opprobrium, in injury of his fellow-man, merely because he cherishes a lawless prejudice, merely because he carries in his heart a base and paltry hate insulting to the spirit and civilization of the age, a hate which has been trampled out on this continent in blood, it is to be hoped forever. A man who sins thus deliberately, who in cold blood selects as the object of his vengeance and injustice the most inoffensive, the most friendless, the most unarmed member of society, puts himself beyond the pale of that extenuation due to all offenses committed where some lion-like temptation springs upon the judgment and overpowers it before resistance can begin. The offenses punished by the bill mark the old common-law distinction between that done with malice aforethought and that done in the furor brevis, which the law always pities.

But, Mr. President, as I said, I had no thought of being drawn into this discussion. If there be objections to the bill, I submit they are better objections than can be found in the point that, like all other penal statutes, it contents itself with punishing the offense committed against it, leaving offenders against it, like the doers of other crimes against national statutes, to accept the responsibilities they incur by infractions, whether at the same time or at another, against other sovereignties or other jurisdictions. In this respect I see no objection to it; it seems to me rather a temperate and moderate measure in so far as it makes by its own restraints the prosecution of a civil remedy at common law a bar to a prosecution under its provisions for private damages, and so vice versa the selection of a remedy under the act a bar against permission to proceed as other citizens may proceed for like offenses under the laws of the State where there are State statutes, and under the common law where the common law alone is left to speak.

Mr. BOREMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 29, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SUMNER MEMORIAL ADDRESSES.

Mr. HOOPER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed three thousand copies for the use of the Senate, and five thousand for the use of the House of Representatives, of the addresses made in the Senate and in the House of Representatives upon the death of the Hon. Charles Sumner; and that the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Sumner to accompany the same.

Mr. SPEER. Would it be in order to offer an amendment increasing the number proposed to be printed for the use of the House?

The SPEAKER. Such an amendment will be in order when the resolution is reported from the Committee on Printing.

CURRENCY.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3164) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EAMES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3165) to amend the several acts providing for a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM J. SCOTT.

Mr. COBURN. There is on the Speaker's table a House bill with a small Senate amendment. It is a personal matter to Lieutenant Scott, a blind officer, the measure being designed for his benefit. At the request of the gentleman from Tennessee, who has had charge of the bill, I ask that the amendment be taken up and concurred in. There can be no objection to the amendment, as it diminishes the amount that is to come out of the Treasury.

There being no objection, Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1935) for the relief of William J. Scott, late aid-de-camp on the staff of General Spear, were read, as follows:

In line 3 of the bill strike out "first" and insert "second;" so that it will read: "with the rank of second lieutenant."

Strike out at the end of the bill the words "as an aid-de-camp on the staff of Brigadier-General James G. Spear," and insert "during said period."

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. COBURN moved that the vote by which the amendments were concurred in be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the following, and they were referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals:

Resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, asking for a survey of the water-routes between the navigable waters of the Minnesota River and the Red River of the North;

Memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, for the survey of the route between Lake Superior and the Falls of Saint Croix; and Joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of a preliminary survey of the country between Saint Croix Falls and Upper Mississippi River and Lake Superior, with the view to establishing water communication by canal, locks, and dams between the navigable waters of said rivers and lake.

AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2199) to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution concerning citizenship and to define certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries and certain duties of diplomatic and consular officers, and for other purposes.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I desire——

Mr. HALE, of New York, I rise to a question of order. As I understand, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] rises to propose an amendment to this bill. I beg to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that I have the floor upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] is undoubtedly entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE, of New York. And I prefer not to yield for the offering of any amendment, for a reason which will be very palpable to the gentleman when I make my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The rights of the gentlemen do not conflict at all. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts after the gentleman from New York has concluded his remarks.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my remarks I beg to inquire the precise position of the bill before the House, and I do this for the purpose of giving notice that I desire in some form, before the bill shall be open to amendment, to test the question whether the House will consider it for that purpose.

I understand the question now before the House, and on which the merits of the bill are open to discussion, is on the motion to reconsider the vote referring this bill to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Of course, if that is the case, no amendment can be introduced pending that motion.

The SPEAKER. No amendment could be acted on, but an amendment might be introduced with the intimation that it would be offered when in order.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Then I would say, that being the form of the question now before the House, I give notice that at some time—not at the conclusion of my own remarks, for I have no desire to cut off any other gentleman—I shall move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, in order that the bill may remain with the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I understand that will be the effect of such a vote by the House.

I certainly, Mr. Speaker, approach the discussion of the bill before the House with very much diffidence and hesitation—not arising from the bill itself, for my own judgment on that bill is substantially one of unqualified condemnation, but in consideration of the very high respect which I bear toward the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] who reported the bill to the House, and of his professional and personal standing before this House and before the country, and in view of the fact that that gentleman has informed the House that this bill has had his careful and scrutinizing revision.

Impelled as I am to differ from him most widely in regard to the line of legislation proposed by this bill, it is a difference with the greatest respect, and, as I have said, with the greatest hesitation and distrust of the correctness of my own views growing out of that respect.

The bill was first called to my attention on a morning of last week, when it was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and a hasty examination of it at that time impressed me with the idea that it contained many faults which ought to be amended. A more careful examination, such as I have given it since, satisfies me that in its almost entire scope it is a bill which it is not desirable for this House to pass, a bill which is not consistent with the obligation which this Government owes to its own citizens, is not consistent with those principles of international law which are recognized with substantial unanimity throughout the range of civilized nations; that it unwisely departs from the provisions of our own statutes in some respects; that it unwisely changes in other respects principles of international law; and that in the latter regard its effect will be prejudicial, and only prejudicial, to the dignity and character of the United States, as well as to the rights and safety of its citizens in other lands.

The great object of all governments is the protection of the rights of the individual citizen. When, long ago, it was said in England that the whole machinery of king, lords, and commons had for its end and object simply the bringing of twelve men together in a box, this was but a picturesque and figurative expression of the great doctrine that all the machinery of all government has for its great end and object simply the protection of the rights of the individual citizen.

We all recognize this in regard to the great mass of our own citizens who still dwell in their own country under the sole control and protection of their own laws; and it is for the protection of their rights in this respect that the bills of rights in our Federal Constitution and in the constitutions of the different States exist. It is for this that civil-rights bills are presented and pressed here.

This of course includes the larger and more widely embracing class of cases, but the rights of citizens at home are no more sacred, no more entitled to complete protection by the Government, than the rights of that more limited class of citizens who travel in or visit or dwell under the jurisdiction of foreign nations.

These rights, Mr. Speaker, are the subject of national protection, and of national protection only. The rights of the citizen at home are already guarantied by the constitution and laws of the State in which he lives, subject only to such supervising or controlling power as the Constitution of the United States has vested in the Federal Government. But the power of the individual States cannot reach abroad. When we deal with foreign nations, we deal only as a Federal Government. When, therefore, we are to act upon the subject of the rights of American citizens in foreign lands and as against foreign nations, State organizations are powerless, and the Federal organization is the only power upon which the citizen can rely for his protection.

The rights of the citizen as against foreign governments, again, are not to be determined by our municipal laws. These laws can operate and have power only upon ourselves. They may tie the hands of our Government as to interfering against foreign nations. They may limit the right which the citizen has to invoke the aid of his government. But they cannot determine or settle the rights which in the great tribunal of nations the citizen is to have and enjoy against a foreign nation. Those rights are to be determined only by that great collective body of principles and doctrines which is named international law—a body of principles certainly to some extent undefined, often perhaps vague and uncertain to an extent that is undesirable, but the only code, the only body of principles, to which any nation can appeal on questions of dispute between itself and another nation.

These doctrines cannot be changed by municipal enactment of any government. They can only be changed as between specific nations by treaty or by reciprocal legislation, or by their recommendation and adoption through the learned men, the statesmen and the governors of the world, who mold that law from time to time.

For myself, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it desirable that this body of principles called international law should be codified, strictly so to speak, and reduced to the rigidity and inflexibility of a statute. I prefer that it should remain, as the common law in England and in most of the States of this Union prevails, rather a flexible and yielding body of principles, applicable according to its circumstances to each particular case than to be brought down to the iron rule of a statutory prescription.

If we attempt to modify the principles of this international law by our own statutes, as I have already said, we may bind our own hands, we may limit our own power, we may bar the door of our own Government against the claims of its citizens; but we cannot change the rule which prevails among the nations of the earth. And if we succeed in disclaiming for our nation rights which are recognized as rights belonging to other nations, entitling them to reclamation against their fellow-nations, instead of affecting a change that is desirable, we merely, to a certain extent, degrade ourselves—I use the word, of course, in no offensive sense; we merely reduce ourselves in rank below that just position among the nations of the earth which we are entitled to take. If, for instance, we throw aside and repudiate the right of full and ample protection of our citizens, native-born or naturalized, while dwelling or visiting or traveling in another land, we just so far deprive ourselves of the assertion of just rights against foreign nations which we would otherwise enjoy.

I do not believe, sir, that such limitation of our own power is desirable. Every nation is to be weighed in regard to the character and elevation and dignity of its organization simply by the full and perfect liberty and protection of rights which it guarantees to its citizens. Among nations the measure of this protection to the citizen is to be found ordinarily by observation of the protection which she affords to her citizens abroad and not to her citizens at home.

In this regard we may well look to the course of conduct pursued by Great Britain for generations, nay, for centuries. Sir, it is not the military, the naval, or the commercial greatness of Great Britain which most gives her rank and respect among the nations of the earth. It is not the extent of her colonies, or the great sweep of her settlements and military posts. It is not that her "drum-beat," as Mr. Webster so felicitously said, "following the sun daily, and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with a continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England." No, sir; all these elements of greatness and power would pale into insignificance, but for the fact that Great Britain everywhere over the whole face of the "round world," and among all those "that dwell therein," against the highest and strongest of the earth, against the most remote and inaccessible, on behalf of the poorest, the humblest, the most unworthy even of her citizens, never fails to throw over that citizen the protecting mantle of her own strength; that she asserts, whether against France, or Germany, or Russia, or the United States, against Theodore of Abyssinia or the King of the Ashantees, the rights of her subjects wherever they are found, regardless of hazard, regardless of cost, vindicating them if necessary by that, ultimatum of war, terrible as it may be, that "last argument to which kings resort." There lies the secret of the strength of Great Britain among the nations, and there we may well look for the precedent which should guide us as to our treatment of foreign nations with respect to the rights of our citizens.

Sir, when our government has it understood all over the face of this earth by Jew and Gentile, Greek and barbarian, bond and free, civilized and savage, that her every citizen in other lands is the object of her jealous and careful guardianship; that he is and will be protected to the full measure of her power; that that protection will be preserved and continued at all hazards, against every risk, every obstacle, and every power, then, and only then, will the United States have that position among the nations of the earth to which they are legitimately entitled.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the bill now before this House—of course not intentionally—not with such a view on the part of any gentleman who has been concerned in its preparation or advocacy, but nevertheless, in fact, does derogate from these principles. I believe that by the adoption of this bill the United States will be put in the attitude of disclaiming, rejecting, throwing aside that pearl beyond all price, the right to assert everywhere and against everybody the rights of its citizen, be he ever so humble, ever even so unworthy.

Let us see, sir, what are the provisions of this bill. It changes the existing law, existing both by the statutes of the United States in certain cases, and by well-established and recognized rules of international law in other cases, as I have made out from my enumeration, in some nine or ten distinct matters. Almost every one of those changes I believe to be in the wrong direction. Almost every one of them I believe to be based upon erroneous ideas of the duty which the Government owes to its citizens abroad.

I shall spend but little time upon any of them; some of them I shall pass over with mention merely; but I desire to call attention to the matters in respect of which the bill does change existing law.

First, as to married women. I may say here, Mr. Speaker, that no rule is better established as the rule of international law among civilized nations than the rule that the national character of the wife follows the national character of the husband, irrespective entirely of all question of domicile or of any other question affecting citizenship; in other words, that when a woman marries a man of another nationality, she by that marriage adopts his nationality wherever he or she may dwell; that by the naturalization of the husband the naturalization of the wife follows, irrespective of residence or domicile or other consideration. This is an invariable rule of international law, recognized by all the publicists, by the practice of all the continental nations of Europe, by the practice and statutes of the United States, and by the practice of Great Britain.

The only authority to the contrary that has come to my knowledge, or which I have ever been able to find, is a doctrine laid down by that eminent judicial tribunal, the judicial committee of the privy council of Great Britain in the Countess of Conway's case, reported, I think, in the second volume of Knapp's Privy Council Cases. There the tribunal, in determining the status of a female claimant, a married woman, under the convention between France and Great Britain, for the payment of damages to subjects of Great Britain whose property had been unduly confiscated by the empire and the republic, held that, by the marriage of this lady to Count Conway, who was a British subject, she herself being a subject of France and always domiciled in France, under that convention she had no standing as a British subject by reason of her marriage, for domicile must coincide with marriage in order to give her that standing.

But a closer examination of the case will develop the fact that this is really not inconsistent with the proposition that marriage of itself determines the national character of the wife upon that of the husband, because within the rules of international law, as applicable in time of war, domicile is the controlling element of national character, and there the rights of a party claiming as a belligerent or as a citizen of one country or of another are always to be determined by domicile. The case of the Countess of Conway was therefore not necessarily a departure from the rule. In this connection I may state that in diplomatic practice the rule of Great Britain has been uniformly and consistently the other way. Great Britain has always claimed and maintained before international tribunals, through diplomatic negotiations, and in every form of communication or controversy with other nations, that the national character of the wife must follow that of the husband. In the international tribunal recently in session in this city, the mixed commission, created by the treaty of March 8, 1871, between the United States and Great Britain, in repeated instances women, natives of the United States, always residing in the United States, never out of the United States, but married to British subjects, were allowed standing as British subjects before that commission, and awards were made in their favor as British subjects. I believe that the doctrine was correctly so decided by that tribunal under the rules of international law.

This principle too, Mr. Speaker, was recognized by the United States in 1855, when they passed this statutory provision: "That any woman who may lawfully be naturalized under existing law"—it was carefully guarded, under the practice then prevailing, so as to close the door against those whose color or descent might disqualify them for American citizenship, as the doctrine was then held—but "any woman capable of naturalization married, or who shall be married, to a citizen of the United States, shall be deemed and taken to be a citizen." This statute was but an expression of the rule of international law and an adoption of it as part of our municipal law.

The committee on the bill before the House change that most materially. I beg to call the attention of the House to their provision enumerating the persons who are to be regarded as citizens of the United States. In the first clause of the second section of the bill they say that there are to be so included "all married women whose husbands may be such citizens"—now mark—"as against all powers except the power within whose jurisdiction an alien woman married to a citizen of the United States may have been born." That is the bill as it stands. The committee have given notice that they propose an amendment, which will doubtless be adopted by the House, to add the words "and shall continue to reside." Including that amendment the effect of the proposed bill is this: in conformity with the rule of international law a woman of foreign birth married to a citizen of the United States is to be taken as a citizen of the United States; but the rule is changed in this, that as against the power of which she was a subject, if she shall continue to reside within the jurisdiction of that power, she is not to be deemed an American citizen.

Now, one of the most difficult questions ever arising in diplomatic intercourse as to the rights of aliens results from what is known as double nationality. A person may by the laws of one country owe allegiance to the government of that country, and by the laws of another country owe allegiance to that other; his allegiance being thus double, not divided. By our naturalization laws, for instance, a man residing in the United States and naturalized here might be deemed, under our laws, in all respects a citizen of the United States; while at the same time by the laws of Great Britain, before the late naturalization convention, he would be deemed in all respects a citizen and a subject of Great Britain. One of the great ends of all diplomatic negotiations and of all reciprocal legislation among nations ought to be, I submit, to get rid of this question of double nationality, so that under no circumstances where it can be avoided should there be anything like duplex relations of one person to two governments, as owing allegiance to the two.

This provision of this bill leaves the married woman in the cases I have named owing allegiance for instance to the United States in general and as against all nations but one; but as to that one it remits her to her allegiance to the sovereignty of her nativity; remits her there wholly irrespective of the fact that her husband is absolutely and completely a citizen of the United States as against the whole world. Now mark the consequence. As I have already said, by the laws of other nations, by the rules of international law, she is a citizen of the United States against all governments, against the government of her nativity and residence as well as the rest. But by this bill she is a citizen of the United States for certain purposes only; not a citizen of the United States as against Great Britain, for instance, to which her native allegiance was due and where she may reside. Great Britain, however, she being the wife of an American citizen, does not recognize her as a British subject. But this bill cuts her off from her right of protection by the American Government and her right of citizenship here, and she stands indeed a woman "without a country," outlawed and outside of the protection of any nation.

Again, if we are to adopt such legislation as this, it certainly ought to be reciprocal legislation. We should cut off no rights of those who have heretofore been American citizens unless we see most clearly that equivalent corresponding provisions are to be made for the converse of the proposition; that the American woman who marries an English citizen is not to be deprived of any right, or any convenience even, which we fail to require in the case of a woman of English birth, owing paramount allegiance to Great Britain, married to an American citizen.

But the bill of the committee does make a very great difference between the two cases. It makes the foreign woman married to an American citizen no longer wholly and completely an American citizen for all purposes; but in certain contingencies, that of residence, she is still a foreigner.

In the third clause of this same second section it is provided that a woman, a citizen of the United States, becoming the wife of an alien and not residing within the United States, shall not continue a citizen of the United States; and in the event of her widowhood she cannot even reclaim her citizenship in the United States after the death of her husband simply by coming here to reside. In addition to that, she is required to go through the form of filing in the Department of State a declaration in a prescribed form, and taking specific and careful legal steps to reassert that right of American citizenship, from which the American woman married to an alien and residing in a foreign state, that being the state of the allegiance of her husband, is absolutely debarred.

The next class of provisions in this bill which I shall note are those relating to the birth of persons in countries other than those of the allegiance of their parents.

Here again we find two provisions, the one correlative of the other; the one in relation to the children of foreign parents born within the United States, and the other relative to the children of American citizens born under foreign jurisdiction. In regard to both of these provisions the committee by this bill propose to change the existing law. It may be that the changes they have made are in themselves unobjectionable. I am not disposed to cavil at them, although I am really inclined to think it would be better to leave the law precisely as it now stands.

But in these two provisions they have not followed the rule of reciprocity; they have not provided the same rule as to the rights of the children of Americans born abroad as they have provided for the children of foreigners born in this country. The general rule is that every person born within a sovereignty is by birth a subject of that sovereignty. That is the recognized rule within the United States; it is specifically provided for in the constitutions of many of the States, and by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. This rule has no respect to the circumstances under which the person may have been born, or the status of the parents at the time of his birth; whether the father of the child born here is permanently domiciled within our borders, or is here for temporary and commercial purposes, or is a mere visitor or a casual traveler within our boundaries. If the child is born within the United States, by that birth he is a citizen of the United States.

This principle was also distinctly recognized by the same commission I have mentioned. In a case where it was distinctly alleged that the claimant, who claimed to be a British subject, was born in the United States of British parents while they were on a temporary visit to this country, the parents returning immediately afterward to England, they held that the man was not entitled to the standing of a British subject before the commission, for the reason that by the fact of birth within the United States he was an American citizen, although there was at the same time no question that by British law he was a British subject.

This bill provides that the child so born in this country, of parents not domiciled here, shall not be regarded as a citizen unless, first, he shall reside in the United States, or unless his father shall be naturalized during his minority, or unless he shall within six months after becoming of age file a certain declaration in the office of the Secretary of State, or unless he shall become naturalized under existing laws. I think these different provisions are unnecessarily repeated, because several of them of necessity include others. If residence within the United States is sufficient to give the right, certainly naturalization can never be necessary, for naturalization can never be had except where the party does reside here.

But recurring again to the correlative provisions as to the children of citizens of the United States born abroad, (being the second clause of the second section,) we find that the committee have carefully put up the bars against the children of citizens of the United States who may be born abroad while their parents are residing abroad. The language of the bill is:

> A child born abroad, whose father may be a citizen of the United States, residing in and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be regarded as a citizen of the United States at the time of birth, and shall follow and have the domicile and citizenship of the father during minority.

Therefore if a citizen of the United States goes abroad to reside (and residence, we all know, may have a very temporary and brief duration) for purposes of commerce, of health, of pleasure, of convenience, of education, of accumulation of knowledge, his child born there while he resides abroad is not a citizen of the United States. This again is a departure from the statutory provisions already existing which will be found in the act of February 10, 1855, already cited, (10 Statutes at Large, page 604,) which provided in terms that "persons born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States whose fathers were or should be at the time of their birth citizens of the United States should be deemed and considered, and are hereby declared to be, citizens of the United States;" and this irrespective entirely of residence.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will my friend illustrate what he is saying by stating how the law would apply to a case which I can cite? A gentleman holding a position at the head of one of our Executive Departments, a very distinguished American, was born in Montreal. His father and mother were citizens of New York. His father, being an architect, went abroad for the sole purpose of superintending the construction of the cathedral at Montreal, and was absent about two years, during which this child was born. The parents never obtained a residence in Canada; and the boy was to all intents and purposes in law an American-born citizen. I wish to inquire how the bill now pending would treat such a case as that—whether it would regard the child as a foreigner or a citizen of the United States? Of course I should say that if it would regard him as a foreigner, it would be a misfortune.

Mr. HALE, of New York. In the case propounded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] the child so born abroad is, under the statute of 1855, absolutely, certainly, and in all respects a citizen of the United States. Under the bill proposed by the committee and now under consideration, the question whether he is a citizen of the United States would depend upon an outside fact on which proof is to be taken; that is, whether his parents were to be deemed as residing in Montreal at the time of his birth, or as having a residence within the United States. And right here comes in an element which is to me one of the most objectionable features of this bill: it sends these cases outside the region of fixed, certain, absolute law into the region of inquiry, to be based upon facts to be ascertained, as to which courts and juries may differ, and which never can be settled except by a judicial determination between parties directly interested in the event.

It will be recognized as a fixed rule, under international law, that wherever a man is found to be with his family that is presumptively his residence. International law presumes every man to be domiciled and to reside on the spot where he is found. That is the presumption, which it rests on the party claiming a different status always to rebut. Sometimes, of course, the evidence is very simple and easy of attainment, as in the case of a mere traveler stopping at a hotel over night. Often, as in the case suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, it may be a case of very grave doubt, open to all sorts of difficulties, to determine whether the domicile of the party was actually in a foreign country or in the United States. I think that in this view the legislation proposed in the bill before us is open to serious objection.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Does the gentleman mean to say that a person born in a foreign country of parents who are citizens of the United States and who return to this country may not exercise the elective franchise without naturalization? No such person, as I have understood, was ever deprived of the exercise of the elective franchise.

Mr. HALE, of New York. My colleague is clearly right in his proposition under the statute of 1855, and indeed irrespective of that statute, according to the doctrines of international law and by the common law of the United States, if I may use such an expression. But the provision which the committee now proposes changes that law and makes the question of citizenship depend on the residence as well as the citizenship of the parents.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. My question was whether a child born abroad and coming here was not qualified by the naturalization of the parents, and whether on coming of age he was not entitled to exercise the elective franchise. There is no law of accidental birth to prevent the exercise of this right.

Mr. HALE, of New York. My colleague will see that I stated the proposition precisely as he states it, under the statute of 1855.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I so understood him, but could not understand his answer to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I am sorry, but I think my remarks need no further explanation.

I have dwelt too long on this question. Then comes a more important question, to me perhaps the gravest of all the objections to this bill, and that is the provision contained in the third clause of the second section expressly excluding from the benefits of citizenship within the United States various classes of persons who have heretofore been such citizens. This legislation is of the character to which I referred in my opening remarks as most objectionable and most undesirable and least in accord with the dignity of the United States, with the obligations which it owes to its citizens, whether native-born or naturalized, and with the rights of such citizens.

This provision under five different clauses excludes from citizenship five different classes who have heretofore fully enjoyed those rights.

The first provision of exclusion is that of citizens of the United States, native-born or naturalized, who may be naturalized as citizens of another state or who may enter into the civil, naval, or military service of any foreign nation. Now, the first sentence of this clause is certainly to be deemed unobjectionable. Under the doctrine of the right of expatriation, which the United States have always held, the fact that a citizen of the United States has become naturalized and the subject of a foreign power certainly ought to terminate his citizenship in this country, subject of course to the right of renewing that citizenship under the laws of the United States whenever he shall return to this country, which can be done under the present naturalization laws.

But the second section of the clause I certainly consider dangerous and unwise, and especially impolitic to adopt without an important amendment. That division of the clause cuts off from citizenship of the United States absolutely, without any power of reclamation, all those of its citizens who may enter into the civil, naval, or military service of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people foreign to the United States. Note the breadth and comprehensiveness of this provision. Under it, every class of governmental service, whether civil, military, or naval, accepted by a citizen of the United States in a foreign land under a foreign government or foreign people, absolutely cuts off from American citizenship the man who accepts it. It makes no difference whether this is one of the European powers, one of the recognized civilized and enlightened powers of the earth, or one of the more ancient forms of civilization which still exist in Asia where we send so many who enter service in different departments, or even among the barbarous and savage tribes to be found over the face of the earth. The language is sweeping. An American citizen who goes to-day to Japan to enter the employment of the Japanese government, in its civil service, in educational, financial, or administrative branches, ceases by that act to be an American citizen, and not only that, but he is placed beyond the possibility of ever returning to that character, for if he has ceased once to be an American citizen he certainly can never become such citizen again except by process of law. He has not of necessity become a subject of the government to which he goes, and when he returns to the United States he cannot be naturalized under the naturalization laws, for they are only made for the subjects of foreign governments. This man therefore stands as a "man without a country," brother to the woman without a country whom I before named.

Mr. POTTER. Take the case of General Mott, who entered the service of the Khedive of Egypt, does my colleague understand the bill to include that case?

Mr. HALE, of New York. It would not only disfranchise General Mott while in Egypt, but, as I understand the bill, when he returns to this country he can never again become an American citizen, not being a subject of naturalization under existing laws.

Mr. GARFIELD. How would it have been in the case of Mr. Burlingame?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Undoubtedly the same in Mr. Burlingame's case. He was in the civil service of the Emperor of China. Undoubtedly the same in the case of the half-dozen or more persons who are in the service of the Japanese Empire in various civil offices, and that larger number of persons who are in the military and civil service of the Khedive of Egypt. Under the same rule, as suggested to me by the gentleman from Arkansas on my left, [Mr. HYNES,] if adopted in France, those Orleans princes who came over here and volunteered in our service during the war of the rebellion would have ceased, if this had been the law of France, to have been citizens of that country, and never could have reclaimed their citizenship there.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER. I trust my colleague will be allowed a few moments more.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I would be very glad to spend a few minutes more, not exceeding fifteen minutes, on other branches of the subject.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the time of the gentleman from New York will be extended fifteen minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The second clause of this exclusion is one, as it strikes me, of a still more gravely objectionable character. It is a provision depriving of citizenship absolutely and forever every citizen of the United States who may reside abroad, unless he shall comply with certain fixed statutory regulations. This is bringing into the statutory law of the United States an element which never existed there before. It is barring the United States forever from the right of protection against foreign powers of any one of its citizens who may reside abroad for any purpose, unless that citizen shall have taken certain formal, carefully prescribed steps to enable him to preserve his allegiance.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, I am astonished at this proposition coming from any committee of this House. I am astonished that any man can upon this floor vindicate the propriety of disfranchising a citizen of the United States for the reason that he may happen to reside abroad for any purpose that to him may seem good and for such time as to him may seem good. Such is not the doctrine of the states of Europe. Such is not the doctrine by the observance of which Great Britain has established her citizenship as a name of dignity and respect among the nations of the earth. Why, Mr. Speaker, let us bear in mind that the first section of this bill defines the words "domicile" and "reside," and defines them justly and properly as implying "a fixed residence at a particular place, with direct or presumptive proof of an intent to remain indefinitely."

Add to that the well-settled legal principle that presence in any place affords presumption of an intent to remain indefinitely, and that if a member of this House were to-day found in a city of Europe, in the absence of all other proof, the presumption is that he intends to remain there indefinitely; and then, applying this definition, it will be found that the American citizen found abroad is disfranchised, debarred from citizenship, unless he has complied with certain regulations, or unless he makes proof to overcome the legal presumption to be found from his residence.

To be sure the bill undertakes to exempt commercial domicile from this regulation. But let us see how it undertakes to do that:

> Commercial establishments shall not be regarded as creating a domicile unless made with an intent not to return.

But even as regards commercial domicile, let us see how the case stands. A New York house doing business in London or Paris sends one of its partners to reside and transact its business there. That partner by that very commercial residence becomes debarred of citizenship unless he can show he is there with intent to return. The burden is on him to show it. His presence there is the presumption against him.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that he misapprehends this provision of this bill?

Mr. HALE, of New York. My friend should remember that my time is limited.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. But the gentleman is making, as I understand, a direct misstatement. The bills says:

> Commercial establishments shall not be regarded as creating a domicile unless made with an intent not to return.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I said so distinctly, and my friend has misunderstood me. But I said that the fact of his being there raises the presumption that he is there with an intent not to return, and he must overcome that presumption by proof.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. No, no.

Mr. HALE, of New York. My friend says "No, no," but he is certainly in error, and if he will turn to the authorities he will find that this principle is distinctly recognized by the publicists. It is laid down over and over again by Sir William Scott in the Prize cases, that the presumption is that where a man is found residing, there he intends to remain indefinitely.

The third exception provides, first, for—

> Naturalized citizens of the United States who may, by the terms of any treaty, be regarded as having resumed their original nationality.

This is of course unobjectionable.

The second clause, "or who, on returning to their native country, may be convicted of offenses against the laws of that country committed prior to their arrival in the United States," I understand the committee consent shall be stricken out. It is a most gravely objectionable feature, so much so that I can scarcely conceive how it ever came to be inserted in the bill. But I understand it is to go out, and therefore I pass it.

The fourth section relating to the status of women, citizens of the United States, married to aliens, I have already discussed. I come, therefore, to the fifth clause, which I beg, with all respect, to characterize as a proposition little short of monstrous.

It is this:

> A naturalized citizen of the United States becoming domiciled in the country of his or her nativity, unless when otherwise regulated by treaty, shall cease to be a citizen of the United States.

Sir, I do not believe in a doctrine which would make such a distinction between native and naturalized citizens. I know of no nation to-day which asserts such a doctrine. We have within the limits of the Book of Treaties which I hold in my hand, naturalization conventions with eleven different European nations, and every one of those conventions is utterly inconsistent with the proposition here made. At least two of them in specific terms negative the proposition, and the other nine contain provisions wholly inconsistent with it.

Now, what is the proposition? An Englishman, or an Irishman, or a German has come to the United States and been naturalized; he is our citizen. From the moment he attains that citizenship he is entitled to the protection of his government, here or elsewhere, as fully and completely as the loftiest born native citizen of this land. The very country to which he originally belonged would not assert, unless it wholly denied the right of expatriation, a denial of his citizenship. And yet this bill provides that that man, if he shall go back to be domiciled in the country of his nativity for any purpose, no matter what, business or pleasure, commerce or health, ceases to be a citizen of the United States. Remembering the proposition I laid down, that presence raises presumption of intent to continue, Louis Agassiz, naturalized in America, had he before his death returned to Switzerland, his native country, and spent a week there, would have been presumptively disqualified as a citizen of the United States and remitted to his original allegiance.

Sir, I have never pretended to assert myself especially as the champion of naturalized citizens upon this floor or elsewhere. I shall never be found to assert such special championship. But I do assert that between citizens of the United States no discrimination as to right to the protection of the Government can be made without disgrace to the United States. If a German or an Irishman comes here and is lawfully naturalized, becomes our citizen, we are bound to protect him as our citizen so long as the relation continues. There is no greater reason why we should refuse that protection in his case than in the case of a native-born citizen.

I stated that our treaties with certain of the European nations had expressly and in terms repudiated this doctrine. I refer to the treaty with Baden, which will be found on page 50 of the volume of treaties.

The fourth article of that is as follows:

> The emigrant from the one state who, according to the first article, is to be held as a citizen of the other state shall not, on his return to his original country, be constrained to resume his former citizenship.

The same provision is to be found in the treaty with Austria, in the same terms, on page 46 of the volume of treaties. Our treaties with every other German nation, with Great Britain, with Denmark, with Sweden and Norway, in regard to citizenship and naturalized citizens of the one country resuming after naturalization their residence in the other, are utterly inconsistent with the idea that such residence alone is to terminate citizenship and change national character.

Mr. MYERS. I call the attention of the gentleman to the act of 1868, which is to the same effect.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The act of 1868, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania calls my attention, is to the same effect. I have occupied already more time than I intended. There are still other objections to the bill which should be noted. Even the marriage provision in the last section ought certainly to be subject to amendment, otherwise it might be taken to preclude the validity of marriages contracted in foreign countries by American citizens unless contracted pursuant to the provisions of that section. I think such would be the construction of foreign tribunals and governments. In that regard, therefore, it should certainly be amended so as to provide that marriages performed in other forms not according to the provisions of this act, which are valid either by the laws of the country where performed, by the laws of the United States, or by the laws of the State or Territory where the United States citizen may reside, shall continue to be legal notwithstanding the provisions of this act.

But, as I said, Mr. Speaker, I believe this to be a bill which it is not desirable for this House to seek to perfect in the House. I believe it to be a bill fraught with danger to the American nation through its citizens, for what endangers the rights of the meanest citizen endangers the character of the nation. I therefore give notice that at the proper time, without seeking to cut off debate, but whenever the debate shall have been terminated, I shall move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was committed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, leaving the bill with that committee for further elaboration by them.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to have printed an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time to the bill.

There was no objection; and the amendment was ordered to be printed.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I ask that the proposed amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 4 by inserting after the words "United States," in line 8, the following:

Provided, That this provision shall not be construed so as to affect or alter in any manner the navigation laws or other similar laws relating to the ownership of ships or vessels of any description, or to their enrollment, registration, or license.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I rise for the purpose of moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order, being the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. Before that motion is put, I ask the gentleman to allow the House to go to business on the Speaker's table, with a view of referring some Senate bills.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I will yield for a moment for that purpose.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to call up the special order in the House, the bill (H. R. No. 1588) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871, which has been passed over for a long time to accommodate other business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] asks unanimous consent that bills from the Senate upon the Speaker's table be taken up for the purpose of reference only. Those bills to which objection is made will remain upon the Speaker's table. The Chair hears no objection.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The first business on the Speaker's table were the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask that those amendments be considered now.

The SPEAKER. This call is for reference only. The amendments of the Senate will be returned to the Speaker's table.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Bills were then taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. No. 32) obviating the necessity of issuing patents for certain private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes—Committee on Private Land Claims.

A bill (S. No. 170) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy who were dropped, furloughed, or retired under the act of February 28, 1855—Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 229) authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize-lists—Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 237) to change the name of the port of San Pedro, California, to Wilmington—Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. No. 326) for the delivery to James B. Betts, receiver, of certain bonds now in the Treasury of the United States of America—Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. No. 369) to change the name of the registered steamer Oakes Ames to Champlain—Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. No. 375) for the benefit of the Kentucky Agricultural and Mechanical Association—Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. No. 406) to allow the schooner Ocean Wave to take the name of Edith E. Wright, and to be registered under that name—Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. No. 464) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and the several acts amendatory thereof—Committee on Ways and Means.

A bill (S. No. 482) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Willamette River at Salem, in the State of Oregon—Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. No. 508) for the relief of Andrew Johnson, of Logansport, Indiana—Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. No. 509) to withhold from sale a portion of the Fort Smith military reservation in the State of Arkansas, to prescribe the manner in which the remainder of said reservation shall be sold, and for other purposes—Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 560) for the relief of William N. Denny, major of the Fifty-first Indiana Volunteer Infantry—Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 561) for the relief of Charles H. Moseley—Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. No. 563) for the relief of John M. McPike—Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. No. 708) to change the name of the schooner China—Committee on Commerce.

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

The following bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read by its title:

A bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States, and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands.

Mr. McCRARY. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the bill should be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. There being a division of opinion about the reference of the bill, it will be returned to the Speaker's table.

CAPTAIN A. B. DYER.

The amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 498, to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer, were taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RAILROAD IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. McFADDEN. There is a bill on the Speaker's table which I ask may be considered at this time. It has been before both Houses and received consideration. It is Senate bill No. 253.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there is objection to its consideration at this time.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I will not object, if it gives rise to no debate.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill (S. No. 253) to authorize the county commissioners of Thurston County, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Budd's Inlet, Puget Sound, to intersect the Northern Pacific Railroad at or near Tenino.

Mr. SPEER. I do not desire to oppose this bill, but I would ask if it has received the consideration and approval of a committee of this House?

Mr. FORT. It has been considered, or one just like it, by the Committee on Territories and reported upon favorably.

Mr. HYNES. It received the unanimous approval of that committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the principle involved in this bill should be further considered.

Mr. HYNES. I might state to the House that this is the only Territory that has to come in here and ask for this permission.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think we should pass this bill without further consideration.

Mr. CLYMER. I appeal to my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] not to object to immediate action on this bill. It has been fully considered on a former occasion.

Mr. McFADDEN. It has not only been fully considered in the House, but was reported unanimously by the Committee on the Territories. There cannot possibly be any objection to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. While I regard this as a vicious mode of legislation, yet as the bill has already been considered by the House I will not press my objection.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope that by general consent ten minutes, or at least five, may be given for a brief explanation of the bill. It so happened that I was not present when the bill was discussed the other day.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object to the bill. After having suffered as we have in Iowa from legislation of this kind I cannot conscientiously refrain from objecting.

STEAM FERRY-BOAT A. BURTON.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 3139) for the relief of the owners of the steam ferry-boat A. Burton. The consideration of this measure will occupy but a moment.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the proper inspectors of steam-vessels in and for the Galena district to inspect the steam ferry-boat A. Burton, at Nauvoo, Illinois, and to grant certificate and license which shall enable the owners of said steamer to use the same as a ferry-boat, notwithstanding the fact that the iron in the boiler on board said boat has no tensile strength stamped upon it, and notwithstanding no stamp at all is found upon the same; provided that upon due inspection and test the said boiler is found to be good and sufficient and safe, and the vessel otherwise constructed and equipped according to law.

The amendment reported by the committee was to strike out in the proviso the words "and sufficient," and insert "material, properly constructed;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That upon due inspection and test the said boiler is found to be good material, properly constructed, and safe, and the vessel otherwise constructed and equipped according to law.

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I give notice that after the morning hour to-morrow I shall ask the House to go to business on the Speaker's table to take up the Portland Canal bill.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. In view of the suggestion just made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] I wish to say that while I did not object this morning to the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill, I do desire that the bill in regard to American citizenship shall not lose its place.

The SPEAKER. It cannot do so.

Mr. NEGLEY. Before the House agrees to go into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill I hope it will consider the bill (H. R. No. 1588) for the better security of life and property on steam-vessels. This bill has been a special order since the 24th of February, but I have refrained heretofore from pressing it on the attention of the House. I think it a very important bill, and one which certainly should take precedence of any appropriation merely to expend money. Nothing will be lost by the delay in the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the situation of this matter, and gentlemen will please give attention, because the House has now reached a period of the session when there is a very great tendency to complicate business. The bill from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] has charge, can only be interrupted in its consideration by a motion to go into Committee of the Whole, which suspends the rules. That bill must hold its place against the morning hour, and against any special order, until disposed of, because it comes before the House upon the highly privileged motion to reconsider, for which unanimous consent was given.

Mr. DAWES. I wish my colleague [Mr. E. R. HOAR] would press his bill to a conclusion as early as possible. The Committee on Ways and Means have been waiting for the morning hour for several days.

The SPEAKER. There can be no morning hour until that bill is disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I will press the bill to as speedy a conclusion as will be agreeable to the House. A general desire being expressed this morning to go into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill, I was not willing to antagonize that measure.

Mr. DAWES. Of course I do not ask my colleague to press his bill against the appropriation bills.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I suppose my colleague would admit that we are entitled to a reply to the speech of an hour which has been made this morning against the bill?

Mr. DAWES. I did not ask my colleague to call for an immediate vote upon the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to remind the House that there are eight appropriation bills still to be acted upon by the House primarily—in the first instance.

Mr. NEGLEY. In connection with the remark of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] I desire to remind the House that the bill for the better security of life and property on steam vessels is a very important measure, and its consideration should not be deferred until the last hours of the session, to be defeated then for want of a vote in the Senate, as was the case in the last Congress; and I can see no reason why appropriation bills should take precedence of all other national legislation. This is national legislation; and I trust the House will kindly allow the early consideration of the bill. It was the agreement, I think——

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. COBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Did I understand the Chair to say that the regular order was to go into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that when such a motion is made it must be submitted to a vote for the majority to decide.

Mr. COBURN. Would not the regular order be the consideration of the bill for the reduction of the Army? That was fixed as a special order some time since, and was driven before the legislative appropriation bill for some days. It should now, I think, come up in regular order.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but if a majority of the House decided to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill, the rules give them that privilege. The regular order of business is a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union whenever the committee having charge of that bill may submit that motion.

Mr. COBURN. That is the regular order so far as that motion is concerned, but the regular order fixed by the House long ago, as I understand it, is the bill for the reduction of the Army, which was to come up immediately after the disposition of the other bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. The appropriation bills were specially excepted in making these special orders.

Mr. COBURN. Of course.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana evidently means this, that if the House refuses to go into the Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bill, then his bill may become the special order.

Mr. NEGLEY. I will move to amend the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill so that we may go into the Committee of the Whole on the business to which I have referred.

The SPEAKER. The question will be determined on a direct vote on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. COBURN. Before the House takes a vote on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bill I wish to say one word.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. COBURN. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I must object, in order that we may go on with the public business.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 143, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF MAILS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster-General, in relation to the question of compensation to railroads for the transportation of mails; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SMITH, of New York, for two weeks, to Mr. G. F. HOAR for two weeks, and to Mr. RUSK for ten days.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate of the United States, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed bills of the following titles, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 3093) to relieve David A. Telfair from political disabilities; and

A bill (H. R. No. 826) for the relief of Elias C. Boudinot.

It further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles without amendment:

An act (H. R. No. 368) for the relief of James Long;

An act (H. R. No. 1331) for the relief of Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, for supplies furnished the Kansas tribe of Indians;

An act (H. R. No. 1722) for the relief of William N. Williams, late second lieutenant of volunteers; and

An act (H. R. No. 1933) to amend the thirty-first section of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national militia, and for other purposes," approved March 30, 1863.

It further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 420) to amend the act entitled "An act for the restoration to homestead entry and to market of certain lands in Michigan," approved June 10, 1872, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 588) approving the action taken by the Secretary of War under the act approved July 15, 1870; and

An act (S. No. 589) for the relief of Washington L. Parvin and Henry A. Green, late captains of California Volunteers.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. POLAND in the chair) on the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that order will be observed in the committee in order that the explanations of the various appropriations in this bill may be perfectly understood by both sides of the House. In my judgment, if members will listen to the statements of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE,] who has devoted much time and attention to this subject, the time of the committee will be saved very materially in disposing of this Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, for reasons very obvious, the expenses of the Indian Department have been for a few years past increasing in amount; though I am satisfied, upon a careful survey of the field, that they have arrived at the maximum, and that in a few years they will rapidly decrease.

The appropriations in this bill have been fixed at as low a figure as would, in the opinion of the committee, be expedient or safe. The only fear I have is that we have cut down too severely; for there is no department of the public service where insufficient appropriations are liable to work so great loss to the Government as the Indian Department. The failure to make a small appropriation of a few thousands which ought to be made might involve us in an Indian war, at a cost of millions.

And yet, sir, the principles of economy and retrenchment must be applied to this department as well as to others, and the wisdom and discretion of Congress must fix the amounts to be expended.

We have not come up to the recommendations of the executive department in the amounts appropriated in this bill, but we think that with that retrenchment, care, and economy which ought to be enforced in all departments of the Government the amounts of money appropriated by this bill will meet all proper requirements of the service, with some amendments which the Committee on Appropriations will offer to the bill during its consideration. I hope we are not mistaken, for I should regret sincerely were we to make a mistake in this respect.

The original estimates of the department for the year amounted to $6,765,000, and the revised estimates to $6,165,000, while the amount appropriated by the bill is $4,965,488; the reduction from the original estimates being $1,800,000, and from the revised estimates $1,200,000.

In cutting down expenditures the committee have endeavored to confine their reductions as far as possible to those expenditures the direct benefit of which do not inure to the Indians, and which could be reduced without seriously crippling the service. By the provisions of this bill the expenditure for the incidental expenses of the agencies will be reduced about $250,000, and we hope without serious detriment to the service.

We have abolished some of the agencies among some of the civilized tribes, and have abolished all of the superintendencies except two. The amount appropriated in the general appropriation bill for the Indian Department for the present fiscal year was $5,379,000. There will be deficiencies to the amount of $557,000, making the total expenses of the department for the present year $5,936,000.

The question is often asked, and it is a very natural one, why is it that the expense of the Indian service is increasing, while the Indians are decreasing in numbers? And the fact is pointed to that fifty years ago, when there were more Indians than now, the expenses of the service amounted to less than $1,000,000 per annum.

The reason for this, sir, is very apparent. At that time a large extent of fertile country was in the possession of the Indians, comprising a great proportion of the now Northwestern States. They had all the country to roam over; the forests were full of all kinds of game, and the streams abounded with fish. The Indian roaming at will needed no aid; game and fish were entirely sufficient for his support. What a contrast between his then and his present condition! Now they are crowded back and driven upon some defined and limited reservations, the greater number of them composed of barren mountains and alkali plains, on which it is impossible to obtain a subsistence by agriculture, for Indians or for white men. On these reservations the game is entirely exhausted; there are no streams, and consequently no fish; and on these reservations they are confined, and forced by the Government to remain. They are, as it were, imprisoned thereon. As far as the wild Indians are concerned, they are subject to be shot down by the soldiers if they are found off the reservations.

Now, sir, what is the result of this? Necessarily, the Indians must either be fed by the Government or they must leave the reservations in quest of subsistence, and not having the means of obtaining it, will either starve or steal. The hostility of the white settlers in the vicinity of the Indians is also a detriment in the way of their being self-supporting. The following extract from the report of Major-General McDowell, in 1866, at that time commanding the Department of the Pacific, illustrates this point:

> The difficulty here, as it is everywhere else in this country, is with the white more than the Indian. Could the former be placed under some restraint and not suffered to shoot and maltreat the natives with utter impunity we would have no trouble whatever. In the northern part of the valley the Indians work in the mines and on the farms, and they would do so in the southern portion, but a few of the settlers who believe in shooting every Indian on sight prevent it, and force them to remain in the mountains, whence they from time to time come forth to steal that they may not starve.

In my statement of the present condition of the Indian reservations and their character, I desire to except the Indian Territory, which is a fertile country, capable of sustaining all the Indians of the country, and to which they should all be removed gradually, and a course taken looking to their elevation to citizenship and to future representation in the Government.

This statement of the contrast in the condition of the Indians now with their condition fifty years ago is a sufficient explanation and justification of the increased expense to the Government. The Indians are imprisoned by the Government, and they must be subsisted; to refuse to do so would be as barbarous as to confine men in prison and permit them to starve. When men talk of increase in expenditures they should think of, and take into consideration, the changed state of affairs. In the present condition of affairs the Government can pursue no other course than it is now pursuing, and any other course would be vastly more expensive.

The Indian question, Mr. Chairman, is one of the most important now challenging the attention of the country. In the past twenty-five years other questions have to a great extent monopolized the attention of the people; but those questions—slavery, rebellion, and reconstruction of the Union—have been settled, and the attention of the people seems to be now directed to this Indian question. It involves principles of philanthropy and of justice, principles which always challenge the attention and enlist the sympathy of the American people; and as a consequence this question is receiving more general attention from the people than it has ever before received. The desire of the philanthropist is to lift up and save a downtrodden and degraded race, and of the statesman to get rid at the earliest possible day, and in an honorable way, of the annual expenditure from the national Treasury.

The study of the Indian race of this country is an exceedingly interesting one to the ethnologist, to the philanthropist, and to the statesman.

The origin of the race is shrouded in the most impenetrable mystery. Its known history is sad and tragical, beyond that of any other race in the annals of the world.

Our forefathers found them in possession of this country, as was said by the governor of Massachusetts in an address in the hall of the State-house at Boston, in 1836, to a delegation of Indian chiefs.

> In former times the red man's wigwam stood on our very fields and his council-fire was kindled on this spot. When our forefathers came to this country they were but a small band. The red man stood on the rock on the sea-side and looked at them. He might have pushed them off and drowned them; but he took them by the hand and said "welcome." Our forefathers were hungry, and the red man gave them corn and venison; they were cold, and the red man spread his blanket over them and made them warm.

At that time, Mr. Chairman, the Indians possessed the entire continent; their title to it as perfect as the title of any people in the world to their national domain. The smoke from their wigwams rose from all its hills and valleys, and the red man roamed, proud and fearless, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Lakes to the Gulf, free as the wild deer that fled at the sound of his approaching footsteps. Their light canoes sped swiftly over the waters of the Connecticut and the Mohawk, the Juniata and the Miami, the Cumberland and the Ohio. Two centuries have passed. Those rivers all roll as they rolled that day, but the Indians—where are they?

Slowly and gradually, generation after generation, they gave way and retired before the advancing wave of Anglo-Saxon civilization, giving up with sad hearts their homes, their hunting-grounds, and the graves of their fathers; striking back at times with cruel and relentless desperation against those whom they regarded as their invaders, and yet compelled, as by the fiat of fate, ever to recede and to give up forever forests and prairies and rivers, and pass on toward the setting sun, until to-day they who two centuries and a half ago owned the continent and numbered millions now have but the right of possession by the sufferance of the Government of a few reservations west of the Mississippi River; paupers, the most of them, upon the Government, and trembling as it were in the scales between civilization upon the one hand, and extinction upon the other.

For the Indian there is no middle ground; he must either be civilized and adopt the customs of civilized life, or he must become more and more degraded, more and more an outcast and vagabond, and finally perish from off the face of the earth. What shall be his fate is for the Government to say. The true, just, and righteous policy of the Government is to civilize and save the race from extinction. In the incidental discussion of the Indian question upon this floor a few weeks since some strictures were made upon the policy of the Government in the management of the Indian question, and some gentlemen were pleased to denounce the policy as ineffectual and extravagant, and to advocate a change of the policy by turning the Indians over to the control of the War Department. It is claimed by the advocates of such a change that it would be more economical, and I believe that this is the only ground on which the policy is advocated. Now, sir, if economy is the only item to be considered in this question, if there is no higher or broader view to be taken than that, still to adopt such a policy would be a fatal mistake.

The adoption of such a policy would assuredly result in wars with the Indians; and the experience of the past in connection with the Indians has demonstrated beyond the shadow of doubt that the war policy is by far more expensive than the peace policy; that it is cheaper to feed Indians than to fight them. Fighting Indians is a very expensive luxury. The Indian is in war an enemy not to be despised; when he goes to war he enters upon its dreadful work with earnestness and determination, himself the very embodiment of courage. When on the war-path he is on an errand of vengeance, and no amount of blood satisfies him. With him the theory is that all wrongs are to be redressed by war, and in our intercourse with him we have failed to provide peaceful means of redress for the wrongs suffered by him, and he knows no law except that of retaliation. In battle he never surrenders, and he is the more excusable, therefore, in that he never accepts capitulation at the hands of others. He neither grants quarter nor asks it, but fights under the black flag. Proud and haughty himself, and yet conscious of the contempt of the white man, when suddenly aroused by some new wrong the remembrance of old ones still rankling in his breast, he seems transformed into a very demon. History gives no instance of a race more determined in war, and our wars with them demonstrate this fact; for the expense and loss of life in Indian wars has been on our side most frightful in comparison with the loss inflicted upon them, or the results attained. In proof of this fact I ask the attention of the committee while I recall the facts connected with some of our wars with Indians in the past.

FLORIDA WAR.

I will go no further back than to the war with the Seminole Indians of Florida, which was waged from 1835 to 1842. This war was caused by attempts to recapture and return some negroes who had escaped from slavery and fled to Florida, and had there intermarried with the Indians and been adopted by the tribe. The Indians refused to surrender them, and the result was a war. The Indian warriors numbered about fifteen hundred all told. Against them were engaged the entire regular Army of the United States and several thousand volunteers, aided by the Navy, and the contest lasted about seven years. Fifteen hundred whites were killed, and the expense to the national Treasury was not less than $50,000,000. The life of one white man was lost for each Indian warrior engaged, and the money paid for expenses would average $33,000 for each. This was the cost of a war with a few starving Indians in the everglades of Florida—Indians who were regarded as a mere outcast remnant, too feeble to be in the least dreaded in a war.

SIOUX WAR OF 1852-'54.

The war with the Sioux Indians in 1852-'54 was a very expensive war, and, like the Florida war, was entirely unnecessary and brought about by soldiers of the regular Army. Some bands of Sioux Indians were encamped within six miles of Fort Laramie. They were at peace with the United States and on terms of friendship with the soldiers at the fort. A Mormon train was passing and lost a cow. It was ascertained that an Indian had found the cow and slaughtered it. Complaint was made at the fort, and a soldier was sent to the Indian camp. The chief promised to make compensation for the cow to the owners. But this was not by the officer in command of the fort considered satisfactory, and a lieutenant was detailed with a company of soldiers to arrest the Indian. They went to camp and demanded the surrender of the Indian. This was refused on the ground that he could not be found, and the soldiers fired and killed one Indian chief. The war-whoop was sounded, and the lieutenant and every soldier of the company was killed. The war that followed lasted two years, and cost the Government $40,000,000 and several hundred lives, and a large amount of private property was destroyed.

The Oregon Indian war of 1854 and 1855 was also a very expensive war.

In 1851 the troops were removed from Oregon and the Indians were placed under the charge of a superintendent, and from that time until 1853 there was no trouble with the Indians, and the Government was not called upon to pay one dollar to quell Indian disturbances. In 1853 the superintendent was removed and the troops taken back. The result was that war soon broke out and continued for two years, costing the Government during these two years, $10,000,000, while during the three years immediately previous to this war the total civil expense of the Indian service in Oregon, California, and Idaho was but $25,000.

CHEYENNE WAR, 1864-'65.

The Cheyenne war of 1864-'65 was brought on in 1864 by the aggressions of the whites, and furnishes a fair illustration of the injustice with which the Indian has generally been treated.

The Cheyennes had been friends and allies of the Government, and had done more to make travel across the plains safe to the whites than any other class of people. In April, 1864, a ranchman, named Ripley, went to Camp Sanborn, on the South Platte and charged the Indians with stealing his stock. A Lieutenant Dunn proceeded with a detachment of soldiers to hunt for the stock among the Indians, but failed to find it. Falling in with a company of Cheyennes, an attempt was made to disarm the Indians; they of course resisted, and in the mêlée one soldier was killed and several wounded; and this commenced the war. Afterward the head chiefs gathered all their people together they could, and proceeded in December, 1864, to Fort Lyon and surrendered themselves, and offered to do all in their power to restore friendly feelings and peace.

The commanding officer of the fort guaranteed them protection, designated a place for them to camp on Sand Creek while the young men and chiefs were absent to bring in the hostile Indians and procure food for their people, and the officer gave them a United States flag to indicate their friendship and secure their protection. While thus encamped, with the flag over them and feeling the greatest security, a few chiefs who had always been firm friends of the whites, some old men and many women and children being present, a body of United States troops approached. The Indians presuming of course that they were on a friendly mission, a chief, White Antelope, who had been a friend of the whites on the plains, stepped out to meet the troops and greet them. As he did so he saw the line of soldiers halt and prepare to fire. He raised his hands to his face and was shot down, and an indiscriminate slaughter of women and children commenced. Twelve old men and one hundred and fifty women and children were put to death by the troops; helpless infancy and decrepit old age shared the same fate. Women were scalped, disfigured, and disemboweled. Some of the few captured children, after they had been carried many miles by the troops, were taken from the wagons and their brains dashed out. I gather this from the records and official reports, and blush to say that its truth cannot be questioned.

Exasperated and maddened by this cold-blooded butchery of their women and children and old men, the remnant of the tribe sought the aid of the Kiowas and Comanches, and obtained both. The result was the general Indian war of 1865, which cost the Government $35,000,000 and much loss of life. Conflagration and death were carried to all the border settlements, and the Government was compelled to draw from the force in the field, warring against the rebellion, about eight thousand soldiers. In this war fifteen or twenty Indians were killed, at an expense of more than $1,540,000 each, hundreds of our soldiers lost their lives, and many border settlers were massacred. After carrying on the war about a year, the prospects of conquering a peace not being encouraging and the country becoming enlightened as to the origin and nature of the war, public opinion demanded that steps be taken to end it; and a peace commission, composed of Generals Harney, Sanborn, and others, was authorized to make a treaty of peace, and what could not be done by fighting was done by a talk with the Indians, and a treaty of peace was entered into in October, 1865, at the mouth of Little Arkansas. As soon as that treaty was signed the war ceased, and the terms of it were faithfully observed by the Indians, and the Cheyennes and Arapahoes settled down in peace.

In this war the number of Indian warriors engaged was but two thousand. For every Indian warrior killed fifteen white men were slain. This was the result of this war forced upon the Indians by outrages and crimes that ought to put to blush the veriest savages. In our denunciation of the barbarities of the Indians we are too apt to forget the sins of our own race.

It is due to the Army to say that the soldiers who committed this massacre were not of the regular Army, but were a Colorado regiment of nine hundred men. I find on page 96 of Reports of Committees of Senate, No. 156, second session Thirty-ninth Congress, the sworn statement of a witness who was present at that massacre, and who states that he saw the United States flag floating over the Indians before the firing commenced, and when the troops were within fifty yards of the Indians the Indians raised a white flag, and that he heard one of the chiefs tell the Indians to stand around the flag, and that they were huddled around the flag when they were killed.

CHEYENNE WAR OF 1867.

From the termination of war by the treaty of 1865 until 1867 the Cheyenne Indians were at peace, and all that section of country was free from trouble.

I read the following extract from a letter written by Lieutenant-General Sherman, dated at Fort Lyon, Colorado, September 30, 1866:

> The Utes are harmless and peaceable, and the Cheyennes and Arapahoes are off after the buffalo, God only knows where, and I do not see how we can make a decent excuse for an Indian war. I have traveled all the way from Laramie without a single soldier or escort. I meet single men, unarmed, traveling along the road as in Missouri. Cattle and horses graze loose far from their owners, most tempting to a starving Indian; and though the Indians might easily make a descent on these scattered ranches, yet they have not done so, and I see no external signs of a fear of such an event. I went down the Arkansas and traveled in three days one hundred miles to this post, Fort Lyons. I did not see or hear of an Indian the whole distance, although we passed through the whole length of the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation.

And yet the next season a war broke out with these same Cheyennes. Why this change from a state of peace and security, as described by General Sherman in September, 1866, to the bloody scenes of 1867? Was it the fault of the Indian?

I read as follows from the report of the Secretary of the Interior to the House of Representatives, July, 1867, to show how war was again precipitated and hostilities reopened with the Cheyennes, in the spring of 1867:

> In April, 1867, the Cheyennes, who had been at peace since the treaty of 1865, were quietly occupying their village on the grounds assigned to them by that treaty, when a military command under Major-General Hancock, without any known provocation, burned down the homes of three hundred lodges, (including about one hundred lodges of friendly Sioux,) and all their provisions, clothing, utensils, and property of every description, property thus being destroyed to the value of $100,000.

This act of outrage launched us into another Indian war. The Kiowas and Comanches were involved, and during 1867 and 1868 that war cost the Government, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Interior, $40,000,000.

THE SIOUX WAR OF 1866.

In 1866 a fierce and bloody war broke out with the Sioux. I give the words of the report of the Secretary of the Interior, as to the origin of that war, in the following extract from Executive Document No. 13, first session Fortieth Congress:

> The Indians engaged in the recent hostilities gave notice that they were ready to bury the tomahawk. Commissioners were accordingly sent to treat with them at Fort Laramie, in June, 1866. The commissioners insisted that the Indians grant in the treaty the right to establish two forts on Yellowstone, and at the base of Big Horn Mountains, the only remaining reliable hunting-grounds of these Indians. The Indians in the vicinity of the proposed forts refused to accede to this. While this matter was under consideration a military force arrived on its way to plant the forts. The Indians being informed that these troops were to plant the forts, with or without their consent, withdrew from the council, refused to accept presents, and went to war with the troops.

In a few weeks the Black Hills were swarming with Indian warriors, and that whole country was in a state of siege.

In the transaction that brought on this war the Government was without doubt in the wrong. The entering upon the reservation of the Indians and taking possession of the forts thereon was in direct and flagrant violation of the treaty with the Indians. This war cost the Government from ten to twenty million dollars, and the loss of many hundred lives. Nothing was gained by it; and a treaty was finally made by which peace was secured on no better terms than it could have been secured before the war was commenced, for by the treaty the Government vacated forts C. F. Smith, Phil. Kearney, and Reno, the establishment of which on the reservation in violation of the treaty was the sole cause of the war.

THE NAVAJO WAR.

The celebrated Navajo war was commenced in this way: It seems that the Indians shot a negro boy, the servant of an officer, and they refused to surrender the slayer; but they proposed to make reparation after the Indian custom, by pecuniary satisfaction.

Four campaigns against the Navajoes resulted, in three of which our Army failed of success; in the fourth, by the strategy of the celebrated Kit Carson, the Indians were compelled through starvation to surrender. This war cost $28,000,000 and much loss of life, and accomplished nothing.

The cost of the army in New Mexico, engaged only in watching Indians, is estimated by General Sherman in his report of 1866 to have been, from 1846 up to 1866, $100,000,000. Since that time the cost in that Territory has been $20,000,000; making the entire cost of controlling Indians by the military, in New Mexico alone, $120,000,000.

The cost of the army in Arizona, used only to control the Indians there, is estimated by Major-General Ord in his report of 1869 to average $3,000,000 annually; and Major-General Schofield in his report of 1871 states that $3,000,000 per annum is the minimum cost; and this in the space of fifteen years past would aggregate $45,000,000. The extra cost of the campaigns against the Apaches would swell the amount to at least $75,000,000.

THE MODOC WAR.

The last experiment we have had in the way of war with Indians was the celebrated Modoc war, if a contest with a few dozen Indians may be called a war.

The history of this war is one that reflects no credit upon the Government, while it strikingly exemplifies the utter folly of the policy of fighting Indians as a question of economy.

I have endeavored to look into the facts connected with the outbreak of that war, and the result of my examination is the conviction that the war was entirely unnecessary, could easily have been avoided, and that the fault lay at the door of the Government; that it was caused by gross wrongs inflicted upon the Modocs by the Government, and was precipitated by the rashness of military officers.

Prior to 1864 the Modoc Indians had possession of a small tract of country on Lost River, near Tule Lake, where there was abundance of fish and game. There was some good land, and the white man determined that he must have it, and the Indian must leave; for it has been the universal practice never to let the Indian retain any good land for a very long time when white men want it. So a treaty was fixed up with the Klamaths and Modocs in 1864, by which those Indians agreed to give up the lands they were then on and go to a new reservation. The new reservation was barren and almost worthless, but the Government agreed to pay as consideration for the removal and the release of the lands of the Indians as follows: $8,000 per annum for a period of five years, commencing on the 1st day of October, 1865, or as soon thereafter as the treaty should be ratified, and certain smaller annuities annually for ten years thereafter; also to pay said Indians the additional sum of $35,000 for purchase of tools, farming implements, seeds, clothing, &c.; also to build, as soon as practicable after the ratification of the treaty a saw-mill, flouring-mill, suitable buildings for a blacksmith, carpenter, wagon-maker, and buildings for manual-labor school and a hospital; which buildings were to be kept in repair at the expense of the United States for twenty years, and tools and materials for the saw-mill, flour-mill, carpenter, blacksmith, wagon-maker, and books and stationery for the manual-labor school were to be furnished by the Government for twenty years.

These were the conditions upon which the Modocs agreed to release their lands and go to the new reservation. This treaty was not ratified by the Senate until July 2, 1866, nearly two years after it was made. When ratified by the Senate certain amendments were made to it, which rendered it necessary that the amendments should be assented to by the Indians before the treaty was binding upon either party. The assent of the Indians was not given until December 10, 1869; consequently until that date there was no existing treaty for removal.

The treaty was proclaimed February 17, 1870. Captain Jack and his band claimed that they had never assented to the original treaty; but on the theory that they had, they were not authorized to consider the treaty binding until December 10, 1869. Prior to this date, and before the treaty was ratified, the Klamaths, the more numerous tribe included in the treaty, went to the new reservation; but Captain Jack and his band of Modocs did not go until the treaty was fully perfected.

In 1866 the Government paid to the Indians who had gone on the new reservation, or rather paid to their agent for them, the amounts due all the Indians included in the treaty for the first year, $65,400; thus paying this money to only a portion of the Indians included in the treaty, the Modocs getting none of it. The annuities due in 1867, 1868, and 1869 were also paid in the same way—before the treaty was perfected—the Modocs getting none of the money. In December, 1869, the same month the treaty was finally perfected and made binding by the formal assent of the Indians to the amendments by the Senate, Captain Jack, with his Modocs, went to the new reservation. And what did they find? They found that the greater portion of the consideration had been paid by the Government to the Indians who had gone in advance. They found no saw-mill, no hospital building, no school-house, no teachers, no books; they found nothing provided by the Government; they found that the Government had entirely failed to carry out the provisions and agreements so solemnly made in the treaty.

I see that two years later, August, 1872, the agent for that reservation, who had then been appointed, on taking charge made a report of the condition of the agency, from which I read the following words:

On taking charge the 1st of May, 1872, I found no attempt had been made to establish a school of any kind; no school-house erected, and no funds on hand to use; no teams, and no tools.

These Modocs spent the winter of 1869-'70 at the reservation. They were treated by the Klamaths in a hostile and oppressive manner, and they were so much weaker than the Klamaths that they were in their power. To relieve them from the hostilities of the Klamaths they were removed two or three times to different parts of the reservation, but they were followed up by the Klamaths. They had no protection by the Government against the encroachments of the Klamaths; they had no food and were compelled to kill and eat their ponies. Now, I claim that by no rule of law or principle of justice were they required to remain upon that reservation. They left it, as they had a right to leave it, and went back to their old home on Lost River.

General Canby in his report of 1872 says:

I am not surprised at the unwillingness of the Modocs to return to the reservation, where they would be exposed to the hostilities and the annoyances they have heretofore experienced (and without adequate protection) from the Klamaths.

After they thus returned to their old home some arrangements were made with them of a temporary character, which I learn from the same report of General Canby, from which I read as follows:

In the summer of last year (1871) the superintendent sent commissioners to confer with the Modocs at Lost River, who authorized them to remain where they were until the superintendent could see them. This has been understood as a settlement of the question until some permanent arrangement could be made for them, and, unless they have violated some subsequent agreement, I do not think that the application of force, as asked for, would be either expedient or just.

These Indians, thus compelled to return to their old home, were not inclined to stubbornly resist the Government. All they wanted was a place to live, where they could live; but it was impossible for them to live on that reservation with the Klamaths. They expressed a desire for a reservation separate from the Klamaths, and were willing to go wherever the Government desired, where they could live.

But the secret of all the trouble was that the country they had had possession of at Lost River was wanted by the white settlers, and the Indian must go, and in the fall of 1872 an order was issued for their immediate and unconditional removal to the Klamath reservation.

They refused to remove, and a military officer rashly made an attempt to arrest some of the chiefs. The result was a war, in which the Government lost one hundred and sixty lives and the Indians lost twelve. And this little war with these few dozens of ragged Indians, which could have been avoided honorably, and ought to have been, cost us millions of dollars. And what did the Government gain? The Modocs are not on the Klamath reservation. After they were conquered, they were taken three thousand miles and placed upon a good reservation in the Indian Territory. This was all they asked before the war; why could it not have been granted then?

The name of Modoc is now a synonym for infamy by reason of the cruel assassination of the United States peace commissioners, and General Canby, under the flag of truce. And while I do not stand here to apologize for that cold-blooded butchery, yet it is but just to those who have no advocate, and few friends, for me to say that the Modocs had had wrongs sufficient to drive to desperation any people in the world; and we should remember in our denunciation of their barbarism that they were in that bloody drama following the example which had been set them by the white man in the cold-blooded assassination by white men of forty Modoc Indians out of a party of forty-seven who had met at a convivial occasion on invitation of the whites, and who fell on them unexpectedly, and thus murdered them, and this was in 1852 near that same spot.

Is it surprising, sir, that savages at war should follow the example thus set them by civilized white men?

The men who were assassinated by the Modocs were good men; they were not responsible for the wrongs done to the Indians; but white men were held responsible, and the innocent suffered.

After a careful reading of the published correspondence, it is my conviction that if there had been no soldiers within five hundred miles, and the officers of the Government had desired to act honorably with the Indians, the entire difficulty would have been amicably settled without war or loss of life; for all the Modocs wanted was ordinary justice, which was refused to be done, and in the language of Captain Jack it was simply a question whether to die by bullets at their old home or to starve to death among the Klamaths. They were willing and anxious to settle down peaceably on any reservation where they could live and have land to cultivate; and the Government, having disregarded the treaty itself, had no right to force the Indians to go to the Klamath reservation. This whole Modoc affair is a fair exemplification of the injustice with which we have been accustomed to treat the Indian, and the usual course in which his legal rights have been ignored and disregarded where the interests of white men stood in the way; and it is certainly a striking proof of the inexpediency of the war policy in connection with the Indians.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a brief review of the history of some of our Indian wars for the past forty years; and if in this record there is any encouragement for those who advocate a military policy for the Indian service, I fail to see it.

It is estimated that the cost of military operations against Indians for the past forty years amounts in the aggregate to over $500,000,000, of the correctness of which estimate I have no doubt.

With this record before the country, it is difficult to see upon what ground the policy of turning the Indians over to a war policy can be maintained, even as a matter of economy.

The advocates of the peace policy are perfectly willing to submit to the test of past experience this question, and to try it simply upon economical grounds; for the records will show that the entire expenditure in the civil department of the Government in the past forty years has not exceeded in the aggregate $60,000,000. I do not, of course, include in this the amounts paid to Indians as purchase-money for lands bought of them by the Government.

I do not claim, Mr. Chairman, that all this great expense in connection with the Army could have been avoided. While the most of the wars were unnecessary and ought to have been avoided; yet in the control and subjection of the wild Indians the Army has been and is a necessity, and very much of the expense has been unavoidable. So far as the wild Indians are concerned they must still be kept in check by the Army, and the military arm held over them until they are sufficiently civilized to permit the entire withdrawal of the Army, as the large majority of them are now. But the great truth exemplified is, that in simply an economical point of view it is the true policy to civilize the Indian, and to get rid of the necessity of the Army at the very earliest possible day, and that to do so is true economy.

The Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Seminoles in the Indian Territory number sixty thousand, and they do not receive a cent of gratuity from the Government. No soldiers are required there; and no Army expense while in Arizona, to restrain ten thousand wild Apache Indians, the Government pays $3,000,000 annually for the Army.

Why this difference? Because the five tribes first mentioned are so far civilized that they require no military control. You find among them school-houses and churches, but no forts; school-teachers, but no soldiers; you find there the printing-press and the newspaper. Therefore it is that while the ten thousand Apaches in Arizona cost the Government for the Army $3,000,000 annually, the sixty thousand Indians named, in the Indian Territory, are no expense to the Government.

Is it not, therefore, good policy and true statesmanship to educate and civilize the Apaches at as early a day as possible, and without regard to the expense? The answer must be yes; and it is equally true as to the Comanches and Cheyennes and the wild Sioux of Dakota.

I append, Mr. Chairman, the following table, showing the number of Indians in each State and Territory, the names of the agencies and of the agents in charge:

Table comprising a list of the several Indian agencies, with the names of the agents and the number of Indians at each agency, in the various States and Territories.

State or Territory.	Agency.	Agent.	Number of Indians.	Total.
New York	Forestville	Daniel Sherman		5,141
Michigan	Lansing	George I. Betts		9,167
Wisconsin	La Pointe	Isaac L. Mahan	5,125
	Green Bay	Thomas N. Chase	3,000
				8,125
Iowa	Sac and Fox	A. R. Howbert		335
Minnesota	Chippewa	E. Douglass	4,547
	Red Lake	R. M. Pratt	1,141
				5,688
Nebraska	Great Nemaha	Charles H. Roberts	316
	Winnebago	Taylor Bradley	1,522
	Omaha	T. T. Gillingham	1,001
	Pawnee	William Burgess	2,376
	Ottoe	J. W. Griest	447
	Santee	Joseph Webster	917
				6,579
Kansas	Kickapoo	B. H. Miles	274
	Kansas or Kaw	M. Stubbs	533
	Pottawatomie	M. H. Newlin	483
				1,290
Indian Territory	Quapaw	H. W. Jones	1,219
	Neosho	J. T. Gibson	2,823
	Sac and Fox	John H. Pickering	1,136
	Kiowa and Comanche	J. M. Haworth	5,005
	Wichita	J. Richards	1,528
	Upper Arkansas	J. D. Miles	3,070
	Cherokee	J. B. Jones	17,217
	Choctaw	Albert Parsons	22,000
	Creek	Edward R. Roberts	13,000
	Seminole	H. Breiner	2,438
				70,333
New Mexico	Navajo	William F. M. Arny	9,114
	Mescalero Apache	Samuel Bushnell	1,875
	Cimarron	Thomas A. Dolane	1,110
	Southern Apache	B. M. Thomas	500
	Pueblo	E. L. Lewis	7,879
	Abiquiu	William D. Crothers	1,270
				21,848
Dakota	Yankton	J. G. Gasmann	1,947
	Sisseton	M. N. Adams	1,540
	Devil's Lake	William H. Forbes	1,020
	Cheyenne River	H. W. Bingham	6,000
	Whetstone	E. A. Howard	5,000
	Grand River	Ed. Palmer	6,269
	Fort Berthold	L. B. Sperry	2,103
	Upper Missouri, (Crow Creek)	H. F. Livingston	3,000
	Ponca	C. P. Birkett	738
	Flandreau, (no report)	J. P. Williamson	250
				27,867
Colorado	White River	J. S. Littlefield	800
	Los Piños	C. Adams	3,199
	Denver	J. B. Thompson	350
				4,349
Arizona	Pima and Maricopa	J. H. Stout	4,326
	Colorado River	J. A. Tonner	8,024
	Moquis Pueblo	William S. Defrees	1,700
	Papago	R. A. Wilbur	6,000
	Camp Verde	J. Williams	2,058
	Camp Apache	J. E. Roberts	2,814
	Chiricahua	T. J. Jefford	1,100
				26,022
Montana	Blackfeet	R. F. May	7,500
	Crow and Lemhi farm	James Wright	4,877
	Milk River	William W. Alderson	10,625
	Flathead	D. Shanahan	1,821
	Fort Belknap	W. H. Fanton	7,130
				31,953
Wyoming	Shoshone and Bannacks	James Irwin	1,024
	Red Cloud	J. J. Saville	9,177
				10,201
Utah	Uintah Valley	J. J. Critchlow		1,718
Idaho	Fort Hall	H. W. Reed	1,500
	Nez Percé	J. B. Monteith	2,807
				4,307
Washington	Neah Bay	E. M. Gibson	604
	Yakama	J. H. Wilbur	3,000
	S'Skokomish	Ed. Eells	875
	Tulalip	E. C. Chirouse	3 600
	Quinaielt	G. A. Henry	544
	Colville	J. A. Simms	2 849
	Puyallup	None, farmer in charge	200
	Chehalis	None, farmer in charge	600
				12,782
Oregon	Warm Springs	John Smith	626
	Grand Ronde	P. B. Sinnott	924
	Siletz	J. H. Fairchild	1,058
	Umatilla	N. A. Cornoyer	837
	Klamath	L. S. Dyar	1,120
	Alsea	In charge of employé	343
	Malheur	H. Linderville	1,200
	Not under any agent, (estimated.)		3,000
				9,108
California	Hoopa Valley	E. K. Dodge	725
	Round Valley	J. L. Burchard	1,119
	Tule River	J. B. Vosburgh	317
	Mission		4,000
	Not under any agent, (estimated)		15,000
				20,161
Nevada	Pyramid Lake	C. A. Bateman	6,000
	Southeast Nevada	George W. Ingalls	3,000
	Not under any agent, (estimated)		4,204
				13,204
Indians in North Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, Florida, and Texas, not under any agent, (estimated)				2,000
Total				292,188

It appears from this table that there are about three hundred thousand Indians, not including the Indians of Alaska. Of these three hundred thousand there are not more than forty-five thousand that require any military control; the wild Sioux of Dakota, numbering about twenty-five thousand; the Apaches of New Mexico and Arizona; and the Kiowas, Comanches, and Cheyennes, numbering about twenty thousand.

Of these Indians the wild Sioux are gradually and as rapidly as could be expected becoming peaceable and tractable, and the presence of a small force of the Army is all that is now required, or that will be required if the proper care and discretion are exercised. It is for these wild Indians that the larger portion of the expenditure of funds is required. We appropriate $1,350,000 for the Sioux, including all the bands, and while this seems a large sum, yet it is small compared with what it would cost to fight them. General Ord estimates that to fight the Sioux he would require $10,000,000 the first season, and to go into a war of extermination it would take a generation; so that the expense can be better imagined than calculated.

Our only course with the Sioux is to keep peace with them and avoid war—feed them until they get tamed down. They will lose their wild character, their inclination to rove, and their desire to fight; and we must get them into a condition where they can be controlled and gradually got to labor.

This wild element of the Sioux does not include the entire nation. The whole Sioux Nation numbers about thirty-five thousand; but a portion of them are now so far civilized that they are peaceable and managable, and cannot easily be led into war. Among these are the Yankton Sioux, who number about two thousand.

I make the following extract from the report of the agent of the Yankton Sioux in Dakota, made September 20, 1873:

A great number of houses have been built on this reservation during the past year, and many are under way. These houses are well built, of logs.

During the spring and summer the Indians have remained quietly at home planting and tending their corn, potatoes, and gardens.

The religious services of the several churches of this agency are remarkably well attended. The conduct of the Indians at church is good; they are quiet, orderly, and to a good degree attentive. Quite a number of their young men have been prepared, and conduct their services in the Indian tongue; quite a large number have become church members, and are endeavoring to live in accordance with their solemn vows. Bishop Hare, of the Episcopal Church, has taken up his residence at this agency.

As showing the improvement in the wilder portion of the Sioux, I read the following extract from a report made by Bishop Hare, of the Episcopal Church, who was chairman of a commission to examine into the condition of the Sioux, and who made this report in March last. Bishop Hare appeared before our committee the other day, and we were impressed with the fact that he is a true and devoted man, and one upon whose opinion and judgment much reliance can be placed. He has made his home among the Sioux, and is laboring for their civilization:

The advance which has been made toward the solution of the Sioux problem, in the case of all those tribes which have been brought under the operation of the present policy, is manifest. It was but six years ago that the Indians now gathered about the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies were constantly upon the war-path, and were among the most dangerous foes of the Government. Under the present policy their wild, fierce spirit has been taming down and their proud sense of power and the defiant temper which resulted from it have been decreasing, while their dependence upon the Government has been increasing every month, so that a general war movement on their part, except under extraordinary provocation, is almost out of the question. Your commissioners have failed to discover any symptoms calculated to weaken their faith in the practical wisdom of the present policy of the Government and of its desire to avoid a war with the Sioux if it be possible. The history of our past Indian wars is humiliating. It is folly to drive to desperation, except under the pressure of absolute duty, a wild and ferocious people, who could bring into the field from six to seven thousand warriors, with whom war is a passion, who range over a wild country of vast extent which is a terra incognita to the white man, but every inch of which is familiar to the Indian, and whose warfare would be characterized by all the peculiar difficulties with which guerrilla war confronts the army of a civilized people.

Only two methods of carrying on such a war can be conceived of, it is believed, which would give any assurance of success.

The first is to descend to the level of the Indian and fight him with wild frontiermen, after his own savage mode; a course which a civilized people cannot adopt without self-degradation.

The other method is to inaugurate war on a scale gigantic enough to surround or occupy the whole Indian country; a plan which would call for an expenditure of money and the raising of an army which our people are not likely to authorize and sustain unless under a sense of duty or of wounded national honor, which there is no likelihood the present or future attitude of the Indians will create.

The Shoshones and Bannacks in Wyoming, the Crows and Blackfeet north and northwest of the Sioux in Montana, and the Arickarees in the northeast, numbering about twenty-five thousand, are all friendly and peaceable and could be armed with perfect safety, and would fight for the Government against the Sioux.

In the South the wild Indians are the Apaches, numbering from ten to twelve thousand; Kiowas and Comanches, five thousand; Arapahoes and Cheyennes, thirty-five hundred. The Apaches are now mostly gathered on reservations, and are coming gradually under subjection. With these wild tribes in the South as with the Sioux of the North we will have to continue the feeding policy for a few years longer, but they are all, and especially the Kiowas, Comanches, and Cheyennes, improving quite satisfactorily.

These wild Indians of the South are under the care of the Quakers, who seem to have secured their confidence and respect and who have been eminently successful in keeping them at peace and advancing them toward civilization.

The superintendent of the central superintendency, Enoch Hoag, whom I know well and of whom I can testify that he is an honest and devoted man, recently made a report to the executive committee on Indian affairs of the Society of Friends. That letter was dated February 25, 1874. From it I read the following extract, which shows fully their success with the Kiowas, Comanches, Cheyennes, and Arapahoes; and, sir, the comparison of the policy and its results from 1870 to 1874, as portrayed in that letter, with the policy in 1864–'65 and 1867–'68 toward the same Indians, is all the evidence I want of the wisdom of the peace policy:

In the spring of 1870, with one of your committee, (J. D. Hoag,) I gathered the Cheyennes and Arapahoes in council near Camp Supply, on the western portion of their reserve. This was the first time they had been gathered in council after the war and the first time they had been called together for such purpose without a military guard. At this council the purposes of the Government touching its future dealing with them was fully explained; that while on their reserve in peace the Government had directed the military not to disturb them, but were entirely under our care and protection, but if they should leave the reservation, whether peaceably or for hostile purposes, they would be beyond our jurisdiction and would be liable to be followed by the soldiers. I earnestly entreated them to remain in their own proper homes near the agency and receive the care, aid, and protection of their agent, who had then for the first time in their history made his home with them away from a military post or military protection; that their sick, aged, and infirm would be cared for and due efforts made to promote their comfort and happiness. The tribe, as such, has since remained at peace. A very few murders and some raiding in the four years have been reported, originating with some of their young men under great provocation and without the knowledge or approval of the chiefs. Small bands of Kiowas and Comanches have raided into Texas more or less, but the reports of their raids have been greatly exaggerated and often reported without foundation. During this period raiding has diminished regularly from year to year. For 1873 we have authentic report of but very few murders known to have been committed by Indians of this superintendency in the State of Texas. This falling off of raiding is more marked, however, in the decrease of depredation claims. During the five years preceding 1874 about three hundred such claims passed through the superintendent's office, averaging sixty per year, while of claims for depredations alleged to have been committed in 1873 only ten have been presented.

We have labored continuously to reclaim these few raiders from their bad habits. We have convened them with their tribes in repeated councils, in which we have been joined by delegates from the civilized tribes, with very encouraging results. The chiefs of all the tribes as well as many of the young men separated from these councils with strengthened desires for a better life. Subsequently some of their leading chiefs and principal men have visited the general council at Okmulgee, and carried its civilizing influences to the plains and rehearsed them in their councils. Through the restraining and reclaiming effects of these councils the Kiowas and Comanches have returned to their agent all of the captive children within their camps, seventeen in number, which threatening demands had failed to accomplish. Said captives have been restored to their rejoicing parents, and stolen stock has from time to time been brought in by various chiefs and delivered to the agent so far as found available. These results have been reached by appeals to their better nature and without the offer of reward, and they stand pledged to return in the future all stock brought into their camps by any of their young men who occasionally plan raiding excursions secretly and in opposition to the known will of the tribes, and it is not infrequently that the leading men, when they have discovered such expeditions, have shot the ponies of the raiders to defeat the same. And these chiefs offer their services to-day, and in the future, to accompany the military into Texas and aid to the extent of their power in arresting trespassers and suppressing these evils. The chief of one of the most noted bands of raiders of the plains (Mowaway) recently came to me and urged that another Comanche take his place as chief, alleging as his reason his desire that none of his people go off the reserve; that he could not restrain some at all times, and he did not want the displeasure of the Government. These pledges of prompt delivery of stolen stock without reward, of their aid as scouts to the military in the future, with the record of full and free return of captives, is sufficient evidence of their loyalty to the Government and of their disposition to remain at peace, and demand reasonable consideration from the Government and its officials.

The number of Indians in this superintendency is estimated at seventy-five thousand souls. Not less than sixty thousand or four-fifths of these Indians have abandoned the hunting life and adopted civilized habits; have mostly located farms and are engaged in common industrial pursuits, and are independent of Government aid. The remaining one-fifth, or fifteen thousand, embracing the Kiowas, Comanches, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Apaches, and Osages, although peaceable as tribes, still cherish the hunting life, but a large number of them are abandoning their old customs and locating on settled homes. More than two hundred families, or one thousand individuals, of the Osages alone within the last year have selected such homes, and upward of two thousand acres of land have been plowed and fenced, largely by Indian labor, for that purpose. Although this change to a settled life is slow, it is nevertheless reaching to the Comanches and Apaches and to some of the Kiowas. Many among their more prominent men are asking our aid to locate them.

Outside of the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, and Seminole Nations we have provided facilities and placed in schools more than five hundred Indian children who were entirely destitute of such privileges when we assumed their charge. The advancement of nearly all the tribes in industrial labor, schools, and enterprises leading to civilization has been regular and commendable from year to year. The following tabular statement exhibits their comparative conditions in 1868 and 1872, while for 1873 the advancement has been much more than that of any previous year:

	1868.	1872.
Population	16,208	17,957
Number of schools	3	13
Number of scholars	105	388
Number of teachers	6	16
Number of Sabbath-schools	.....	11
Amount contributed to schools by any religious society	.....	$3,355
Acres cultivated by Indians	3,220	9,464
Wheat raised, in bushels	633	3,247
Its value	$1,135	$3,957
Corn, bushels	31,700	209,910
Its value	$24,000	$106,122
Oats, bushels	.....	9,123
Their value	.....	$3,656
Potatoes, bushels	1,770	14,501
Their value	$1,770	$7,293
Other vegetables, value	.....	$7,330
Hay cut, in tons	750	5,484
Its value	$3,590	$30,670
Horses owned, number	17,924	42,892
Their value	$702,250	$1,576,171
Cattle owned, number	640	6,557
Their value	$15,200	$103,099
Swine owned, number	1,074	10,702
Their value	$3,238	$30,077

The Indians of Nebraska and Kansas are all perfectly peaceable, and rapidly becoming self-sustaining. They get nothing now from the Government excepting what they have by treaty. That portion of the Quakers known as the Hicksites have charge of the Nebraska Indians, and they are faithfully and devotedly laboring for their good, and are succeeding admirably.

In New Mexico the Pueblo Indians, numbering some eight thousand, are now so fully peaceful and civilized that they are regarded as competent for citizenship.

The Navajoes of New Mexico, numbering nine thousand, are also peaceable and remain upon their reservation, and are self-supporting with the aid of the annuities due them, by treaty, of $70,000 annually. After the war with these Indians to which I have referred, they were fed by the Army upon the reservation at an expense of $75,000 per month, as reported by General Sherman, and he stated at the time that it was cheaper to feed them at that rate than to fight them. They are now getting but $75,000 a year, and are rapidly improving. They make blankets which are considered of first quality, and they have now ten thousand horses and one hundred and seventy-five thousand sheep.

A force of one hundred and thirty cavalrymen was organized among this tribe, consisting mostly of the chiefs and head-men. They are uniformed and act as a police force for the preservation of order and the recovery of stolen stock found upon the reservation. They co-operate with the Government, and prove to be faithful and reliable.

As to the Indians of Washington Territory, Oregon, California, Nevada, Idaho, Utah, Montana, and Colorado, I do not believe that the presence of the Army is necessary, unless it is to protect the Indians against the white men; and in my opinion the Army is kept in those Territories and States more for the reason that the people there want the trade and money that the Army brings than for any other reason, and the fear of Indians is only a pretext.

I am credibly informed that five companies of soldiers have recently been sent to Walla-Walla, in Washington Territory, and I have it from the best authority that there is no more use for them there, so far as Indians are concerned, than there is in this city. I am told that for the purpose of getting the soldiers there an Indian scare was gotten up by white men disguising themselves as Indians and getting some Indians to join them, and riding through the country in hostile style, giving out that there was to be an Indian uprising, and although the troops had been several times refused, the clamor was so great that they were finally sent there, and since then everything has been lovely, and a good market is had for the people of that locality at the expense of the Government. Why, sir, the inspector assigned to that district stated to me the other day that last fall he rode horseback with but one guide, an Indian, all through that country, from Walla-Walla to the Yakama agency and over the mountains north of there, among the Indians, and that he felt no more fear than he would in traveling in the old States; that he found the Indians perfectly peaceable, hundreds of them working as wood-choppers, and that no one thought of any danger from them.

The principal reservation in the vicinity of Walla-Walla is that of Yakama, and as showing the danger to be apprehended from those Indians, I will state that for ten years those Indians have been under the charge of Father Wilbur, a Methodist preacher, who has lived with them all that time with the exception of a year that he was supplanted by a military officer as agent, who came near ruining the Indians in the short time he had charge; and I read as follows from the report of Father Wilbur for 1872:

> In recalling the history of the year just closed I find abundant reason for congratulation in the memory of the health, peace, material prosperity, and moral progress of the Indians under my jurisdiction.
>
> They have comfortable tenements, in which are found many of the comforts and some of the luxuries of civilized life. They have horses and cattle, are growing wheat, corn, and vegetables adequate to the use of their families and some surplus for sale. Usually their churches are crowded with sincere and earnest worshipers, who are led in their devotions by the agent or by one of the native preachers.
>
> Our school for the past year has averaged over forty scholars. During the past year one hundred thousand feet of lumber have been sawed in our mill for the use of the Indians; the logs were cut and hauled by them.

And these are the Indians who are so dangerous that the people out there at Walla-Walla must have four companies of soldiers to protect them, at an expense of $300,000 per year!

Why, sir, the entire appropriation made by this bill for the Indian service in Oregon and Washington, including the expenses of agencies, pay of officers, and incidental expenses, and all annuities paid to the Indians, amounts to $240,000; so that the cost of those soldiers at Walla-Walla is more than the entire expense of the Indian Department for both Washington and Oregon.

In Washington, Oregon, and California there are two regiments of infantry, numbering eleven hundred soldiers. These two regiments cost the Government at least $1,000,000 per annum, while the entire expense of the Indian Department for Washington, Oregon, and California, including supplies to Indians and expenses of agencies, is but $320,000. In this estimate I have put the cost of the military at too low a figure. I have no doubt but the cost of the Army in California, Oregon, and Washington exceeds $2,500,000 per annum, and this expense is all unnecessary; to continue it is reckless extravagance.

As showing the truth of the statement I have made, that the presence and expense of the Army in that country is unnecessary, I read the following from the evidence of Major Powell, taken before the Committee on Military Affairs. Major Powell has for about six years past spent his time among the Indians in Oregon, California, Nevada, and Idaho; visited all the bands, was with them in their councils, and understands them perfectly:

> The CHAIRMAN. State the disposition of those Indians toward the whites.
>
> Major POWELL. All of those Indians are at present friendly, and are anxious to become farmers; are begging for land and cattle, and are accumulating cattle. The presence of the troops among them is bad.
>
> Q. How many of those Indians are in a state of hostility to the Government?
>
> A. None of them whatever.
>
> Q. Then you have given your opinion that there would be more peace and quiet on the frontier without the troops, or if they were entirely withdrawn.
>
> A. Yes, sir. * * * The money given to the army in this district of country, where the Indians are already subdued, if used in the management of the Indians themselves, would take them out of that country, to gather them all on reservations even in Illinois, and purchase the lands necessary for them, and induce them to come to them.
>
> Q. Can these tribes, with the exception of the Utes, (in Colorado,) be collected upon small reservations with safety?
>
> A. Yes, with safety, and better without the presence of troops than with it.
>
> Q. And can they be induced to go into agricultural pursuits?
>
> A. They have agreed to do so. I met sixty-six tribes last summer. They said that if the Government will give them a title to land, they will go to work. * * * I have set up a great part of the night for twenty-five or thirty nights this summer in Indian councils.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is the testimony of a man who understands the Indians of Oregon, California, Nevada, Utah, and Idaho and Western Arizona, I presume, better than any other white man living, and this is his testimony in relation to the Indians of that section of the country; and his testimony includes all the Indians in California and Oregon east of the Sierra Nevadas, Utah, Nevada, Southwestern Idaho, and Northwestern Arizona. And what Major Powell says of those Indians is true equally of all of Washington, Oregon, and California, and I reiterate the statement that for all the Indians in Washington, Oregon, California, Utah, Nevada, Idaho, and Colarado there is no necessity for any portion of the Army, and no necessity for the annual expense of not less than $4,000,000 for the army in that country to keep Indians in subjection.

The Indians in nearly all the reservations are looking to agricultural and pastoral life, especially the latter. When the commissioners last year were treating with the Shoshone Indians for the purchase of the south portion of their reservation in Wyoming, in the council the commissioners proposed to give the Indians other land in exchange for what the Government proposed to buy. The Indians said they wanted no more land, but were willing to sell the land. I read the following extract from the report of the commissioners:

> WASH-A-KIE. We do not want that land up north, but we will sell this land for cattle.
>
> Mr. BRUNOT. Do you know how much cattle you want for the land?
>
> WASH-A-KIE. We will trade our land for cattle. It would be good to milk the cows and drink the milk. I don't know how many cattle, but I think about a thousand.
>
> Mr. BRUNOT. Suppose we were to make a bargain about the cattle, what would you do with them?
>
> WASH-A-KIE. We would corral them and milk them. We would like to have cattle. The Utes and other Indians have cattle. We are poor and have none.
>
> TO-AS-HAUT. We are poor; we have nothing.
>
> Mr. BRUNOT. Would the white people get the cows from you, or would you take care of them?
>
> DEGONDA. We would take the same care of them we do of our horses. The whites do not beat us out of them.

It was thus the choice of these Indians to have cows instead of money or land, and they sold the Government the land for $25,000, to be paid in cows in five yearly installments.

The Government also made a treaty with the Ute Indians of Colorado last year for the purchase of four million acres of their reservation. I see by the report of the commissioners that they refused to sell any of their farming lands, and one of the chiefs said:

> We will soon need all the farming land on our reservation, as the time is not far distant when the Utes will have to give up hunting and take to farming and stock-raising, as the whites do.

This tribe have already six thousand horses and many cattle and sheep.

A treaty was also made last year with the Crow Indians of Montana for the purchase of a portion of their reservation. They also declined to sell agricultural lands, evidently looking forward to agriculture for their support. And this feeling is beginning to pervade all the Indian tribes. And when they arrive at this state the necessity of an army is obviated and the great expense of it can be avoided?

Why, sir, if the Indians were all in the condition of these semi-civilized tribes I have referred to, our Army expense could be reduced from $32,000,000 to $10,000,000. A saving of over $20,000,000 annually could be made in the expenses of the Army. You may take the testimony of the officers of the Army, taken before the Committee on Military Affairs, and it will be seen that the reason given for the necessity of continuing the Army at anything like its present strength is that the safety of the settlers in the West requires the presence of the Army to control the Indians, and from that testimony it clearly appears that aside from the Indian service there is small use for an army.

I have been considering this question merely as one of economy; merely as involving the expenditure of more or less money; upon the theory that the only duty we have in relation to the Indian is to dispose of him and of all questions concerning him in such manner as to spend the least possible amount of money, and that if we could exterminate him at an expense of $100,000,000 and could civilize him at an expense of $150,000,000, it would be our duty to exterminate him.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a higher view to be taken of this question than that of a financial character merely. It is our duty as the dominant race—a powerful, civilized, and professedly Christian people—to do what we have the power to do: civilize, educate, and elevate this unfortunate race thus thrown by Providence upon our hands. They are our fellow-men, our brothers, made of that one blood of which was made all the races of men who "dwell upon the face of the earth." They are unfortunate; we are fortunate. They are weak; we are strong. They are ignorant; we are educated. They are poor; we are rich.

This civilization and elevation of the race cannot be done through the Army. In no respect is the Army a fit instrument to civilize men—just the reverse.

In the language of General Sherman to the mayor of Atlanta, when remonstrated with by the mayor and denounced as a barbarian for driving the people of Atlanta from their homes: "War is barbarism, and you cannot refine it." In almost every respect war is to be dreaded, and ought always to be avoided if it can be honorably. In the words of Madison:

> Of all the evils to public liberty war is perhaps the most to be dreaded, because it comprises and develops the genius of every other evil. War is the parent of armies; from these proceed debt and taxes. And armies and debt and taxes are the known instruments for bringing the many under the dominion of the few.

Every war tends more or less to sink the people toward barbarism; and how assuredly would this be the case with a people who like the Indians have but partially emerged from barbarism. As a consequence, our Indian wars have always left the Indians in a worse condition as to civilization than when they began, and left them also with intensified feelings of hatred and revenge toward the white race, and thus made it more difficult for the influences of civilization to reach them; and this result and effect of wars upon the Indians has been at all times a great hinderance to their civilization. And yet, in spite of the evil tendencies of the wars so frequently waged with the Indians, the civil department of the Government has succeeded in elevating the Indians much more rapidly than could have been expected with all the opposing influences to contend against.

Prior to 1849 the War Department had control of the Indians. Before that time not much had been done to civilize them. They had in the earlier years of the Government so large an extent of country to roam over that they were not brought upon reservations, and it was difficult, if not impossible, to bring them within the influence of schools and of the processes of civilization.

In 1849 the Department of the Interior was established, and the Indian jurisdiction transferred to that Department. From that time until 1869 the Indian agents were appointed from civil life, but not much attention was paid to their qualification for the position as teachers and missionaries. But in 1869 the President adopted and has since pursued the policy of appointing agents with direct reference to civilizing the Indians, with a view to their final elevation in the scale of citizenship, and to aid this end the co-operation of the different religious societies of the country was solicited to act in conjunction with the Government. This aid was extended, and since that time (with the exception of about one year as to some tribes) the agents have been selected by the religious societies having charge, and on their recommendation appointed, and the moral responsibility of the elevation of the Indians at each agency thus rests upon the society having charge, they selecting the teachers, missionaries, and other employés.

The Society of Friends was the first to whom the invitation was extended to give their aid in this work, which was I think in 1869, and the devotion and earnest perseverance with which the people of that society (a people long celebrated for their philanthropy and their sympathy for the poor and oppressed) have prosecuted the work given to their charge is certainly deserving of the highest commendation, and their effort to elevate the downtrodden and outcast Indians is an exemplification of true religion. Other religious societies and churches were afterward invited and entered upon the work, having different fields assigned to them, and all have displayed energy and true devotion, and all are meeting with success.

I apprehend that this responsibility and this work were not accepted by the churches of the country in the light of being so much political patronage parceled out to them by the Government, but as an earnest appeal to the churches of the land to bring to the aid of the Government in this work the power of religion and of the organization of the churches to missionary ends. It was accepted, not as a political work, but as an opportunity to carry out that command of the great Master, "Go ye unto all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature;" and that it was accepted in this spirit, the interest taken in the work and the expenditures made by different denominations of Christians fully show.

It appears by the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that during the year 1873 the religious societies having charge of the different agencies contributed and paid, from their own funds, $130,000 for education and missionary work among the Indians; and this does not include all that was given, for much was given that was not reported. Thus it will be seen that the churches do not simply lend their moral influence and supply the employés, but they give liberally of their money, looking upon this in the light of any other missionary work.

Sent out by the churches and societies and laboring faithfully for the elevation of the Indians are many devoted and Christian men and women, who enter upon the work as a duty, and who to enter upon it have left homes of ease and plenty, and who evidently have not consulted their comfort or their pecuniary prosperity in taking it up.

I do not say that all sent out by the churches are of this class of people. I am sorry to believe they are not. I think they ought to be, and hope they will soon be. In times gone by much odium has been thrown upon the Department of Indian Affairs, from the fact that many dishonest men managed, through political influences, to get into the position of Indian agents, not for the purpose of aiding in the civilization of the Indians, but to get rich by swindling the Indians, going on the theory that it was no crime to cheat an Indian, and the people had, to a great extent, lost confidence in the honesty of the Indian service. But the present policy is rapidly working a change for the better in that respect, and I would desire to impress upon those having the selection of agents and employés for the Indian service the importance of the selection of honest and devoted men for the work; otherwise the result will be failure of the policy and injury to the churches.

There must be honesty in the Indian service, or it will be impossible to civilize the Indian; for if frauds and peculations and swindling are practiced by the white men, officials of the Government, the Indians will assuredly find it out, and as a matter of course will lose all confidence in the civilization or Christianity of the white race.

And taking into view the character of officials sent out among Indians in past years, and the character of the majority of white men around them, and the great frauds and villainous wrongs perpetrated upon them by whites, I must say that the Indians would naturally be led to prefer their own civilization to that of the white man.

It is the purpose and the policy of the Government to purify the service; and its efforts, seconded by the philanthropic people of the country, are meeting with success.

The examination of the statistics will show a very gratifying advance, judging by the best tests of progress, toward civilization, to wit, advancement in the industries and in education. I present to the House the following table, showing the census as to schools and industries of the Indians for the years, respectively, 1864, 1872, and 1873:

	1864.	1872.	1873.
Number of schools	89	2,643
Number of scholars	261	8,094	9,026
Number of acres farmed by Indians	18,989	273,753	297,075
Number of houses for Indians	2,397	15,167	17,678
Bushels of wheat raised by Indians	44,062	265,965	288,306
Bushels of corn raised by Indians	237,462
Bushels of potatoes raised by Indians	130,000	513,000	406,000
Tons of hay cut by Indians	3,052	46,670	161,543
Harness and mules owned by Indians	14,938	161,530	284,400
Cattle owned by Indians	7,449	102,442	449,570
Swine owned by Indians	10,709	381,000	828,056
Sheep owned by Indians	560	120,049	214,000
Value of animals owned by Indians	$4,865,000	$7,911,000	$8,914,000

In addition to the above I give the following statistics for the year 1873, for which I have no figures of former years to compare with:

Number of rods of fence made by Indians during year	573,982
Number feet of lumber sawed during year	9,139,000
Number of saw and grist mills	110
Number of carpenter and blacksmith shops	254

These figures, Mr. Chairman, are certainly a satisfactory demonstration of the rapid progress of the Indians under the present policy of the Government. The progress is more rapid than could have been expected with all the discouraging circumstances which have surrounded the work.

A large portion of the Indians are now self-sustaining and the tribes are all progressing in that direction, and without doubt in a few years all will be self-sustaining. Many lose confidence in the civilization of the Indians from the fact that they seem to progress slowly, but it must be borne in mind that the civilization of a barbarous race is necessarily a slow process. Our ancestors were hundreds of years in emerging from barbarism to full civilization, and we must be patient with the Indian race.

It is but a few years since the process of civilizing the Indian really commenced as to those who are yet wild and troublesome. A few years since they were roaming free and wild, retreating as civilization advanced; but not until they had no farther to retreat and were forced to settle and remain upon reservations, were they brought face to face with civilization. And since that time the wildest and worst of them are slowly yielding to its influences, as the frozen earth yields slowly to the genial spring showers and the advancing sun.

I know, sir, there are many who endeavor to throw odium upon this policy of civilization, but it is the true and enlightened policy, the only policy worthy of this great nation, and if persevered in and sustained it will succeed in civilizing the Indian and raising him up to citizenship in much less time than he could be destroyed by the Army, and at a tithe of the expense. Sir, education is a power mightier than the sword; while it works quietly, gradually, and slowly, yet its influences are deep, far-reaching, and mighty. It marches not with the "pomp and circumstance" of war, and yet its onward march is more irresistible, its victories greater and more lasting in their effects. In its contests with darkness, vice, and barbarism, it does not fill the land with the ruins of towns, with homes destroyed, and fields desolated. It does not entail upon the people burdens of taxation to grind them down in slavery for generations, but it brings prosperity, wealth, happiness, and liberty to all the people. I believe it was Lord Brougham who said:

> Let the soldier be abroad if he will, he can do nothing in this age. There is another personage less imposing, in the eyes of some perhaps insignificant. The schoolmaster is abroad; and I trust to him, armed with his primmer, against the soldier in full military array.

I hope we shall have no more Indian wars. If we must, I trust that they shall be only such as shall be forced upon us by the Indians and which cannot be avoided by the Government. We should employ school-teachers instead of soldiers, and build school-houses instead of forts. And, sir, I say what I believe the people of the country will respond to, that there is no measure of this or any other administration entitled to a higher meed of praise than the installation of the policy of peace, education, and civilization in the treatment of this unfortunate race.

Mr. Chairman, the peace policy with the Indians is the most economical and is also the only policy worthy of this great and powerful nation. I have no doubt but that the great mass of the people desire that it should be sustained and continued. As I have said already, I think we have reached the maximum of the annual expense, and in a few years can rapidly and permanently reduce the expenditures as the Indians become self-sustaining and slowly and gradually rise in the scale of civilization. No man in this country ever understood the Indian character better than General Sam Houston, of Texas. In a speech in the United States Senate in January, 1855, he used the following words, which I commend to the consideration of those who claim that the Indian cannot be civilized and that the proper course is to exterminate them:

> Interest, it is said, governs the world, and it will soon ripen into affection. Intercourse and kindness will win the fiercest animal on earth except the hyena, and its spots and nature cannot be changed. The nature of an Indian can be changed; he changes under adverse circumstances, and rises into the dignity of a civilized being. If you war against him, it takes a generation or two to regenerate his race, but it can be done. I would have fields around the trading-houses; I would encourage the Indian to cultivate them. Let them see how much it adds to their comfort, how it insures to their wives and children abundant subsistence, and then you turn the Indian over to civilization; you charm him and he becomes a civilized man.
>
> Sir, while people are seeking to civilize and christianize men on the banks of the Ganges or the Jordan, or in Brahmapootra, why should not the same philanthropic influence be extended through society, and be exerted in behalf of the Indian? Is not the soul of an American Indian on the prairie worth as much as the soul of a man on the Ganges or in Jerusalem? Surely it is. Then let the American Government step forward; let it plant the standard of regeneration and civilization among the Indians, and it will attract the imitation of the citizens in their philanthropic efforts.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I know that the subject upon which I am about to talk to the committee is one which does not excite that general interest that almost any other question would excite upon this floor. The people whose cause we plead before this honorable House do not make up a great, powerful, and wealthy constituency with a member upon this floor. Their interests are generally looked to by us with an eye simply to the amount of money we can save to the Government. But you, gentlemen, will permit me to remark that I believe that the justice of their cause pleads before us for a calm, deliberate hearing and investigation. And you will permit me further to remark that I believe that there is no Bureau among all the Bureaus connected with this Government that is so important in its character as this Indian Bureau, or one whose duties and responsibilities are as difficult to discharge as this Indian Bureau. You will permit me further, in the commencement of the remarks which I shall make on the bill now before the Committee of the Whole, to say that in my judgment no appropriation bill ever comes before Congress that is so difficult to satisfactorily adjust and pass upon as the bill which is now pending. And I say this, because I believe there is less special knowledge upon the part of the American people and upon the part of Congress on the subject of Indian affairs, of the laws in relation to them, and of the treaties existing between the Government and the different Indian tribes, than on any other subject which comes before Congress for action. It does not follow from this that there is a lack of general intelligence either upon the part of the people or of Congress. Yet we all must remember that our progress as a people has been so rapid, and our affairs as a nation have necessarily so absorbed the attention of our people, that the nation has failed to give that attention to the history, character, and condition of the American Indian that his welfare, and perhaps the welfare of our own people, in many instances deserved.

Although there is much in what has heretofore seemed the fate of the unfortunate Indians to awaken our sympathy, and much to disturb the sobriety of our judgment; much that may be used to extenuate their own atrocities; much which betrays us into an involuntary admiration, yet we have generally looked upon them as a race of people who were passing away. Everywhere, at the approach of the white man, we have beheld them fade and disappear like the withered leaves of autumn before the gale. Two centuries ago the smoke of their wigwams and the fires of their councils rose in every valley and upon every mountain side, from Hudson's Bay to the farthest Florida, from the ocean to the Mississippi and the lakes; yet to-day one-half the American people can say they have never seen even one of this remarkable race. We have known the Indian only as one of the opposing forces in a mighty conflict between civilization on the one hand and savagism on the other, with ourselves representing the civilization and the Indian the savagism. We perhaps have studied our own side of the case very thoroughly. One thing is certain, we have looked upon the character of the Indian, his claim as to his rights, and his demands for a redress of his grievances from our stand-point, and the presumption is that we have largely presumed always in our own favor; that we have generally resolved every doubt so as to inure to our own interest there can, I think, be no question.

We have usually held that "the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof," and we are "His chosen people," and have viewed the Indian as an Ishmaelite, whose fate, like that of the Wandering Jew, was on, on, ever on, before the advancing steps of the white man. A wanderer, houseless and homeless, whose only duty was either to get out of the way of the advancing tide of civilization or be ingulfed by it. How often do we hear it from speech, song, and story that the Indian must not stand in the way to impede, hinder, or delay the grand strides we are making toward a complete and perfect civilization of the whole American continent. True enough he should not. But ought we or can we afford to advance our civilization so rapidly as to involve the ruin, yes, even the extermination, of this once powerful race, who were the—

> Monarchs of all they surveyed,
> Their rights there were none to dispute;
> From the center all round to the sea
> They were lords of the fowl and the brute?

Civilization should not outrun justice, but should rather go hand in hand with her.

It may be correctly asserted that there is no true civilization, the frame-work of which is not based upon the principles of eternal justice, and the object of which is not to confer the benefits and blessings of civilized life upon all who may be touched by it. The civilization which brings enduring fame is the one which gathers up, cares for, and absorbs the weak, the poor, the oppressed, the ignorant, the untutored, and even, if you please, the savage, and which brings to all these classes the charms of civilized life.

I believe this is the kind of civilization which marks the era in which we live; at least I am certain it is the kind that duty demands we shall propagate. I believe the better spirit of this age recognizes the fact that even the North American Indian, under the influence of proper treatment, will not only accept our civilization, but be improved by it to such an extent that he will soon rejoice in such acceptance.

Three races, the Caucasian, the Ethiopian, and the American, are in the presence of one another on this continent. Will the American race disappear forever from the forests which for thousands of years have sheltered it, and from the valleys and plains, lakes and rivers, which for centuries have given it food? There is no necessity for it. This almost boundless continent is broad enough to afford homes for the children of all these races. The Caucasian and the Ethiopian have become men and brethren, and why should not the same result be produced as to the Caucasian and the Indian. I think simple justice and fair dealing will in a few years convince all of us that the Indian can stand on the same plane with his white and black brother, and say with Paul, that "of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." It requires but a cursory glance to satisfy any one that the civilization of the Indian is progressing much more rapidly than even the most sanguine could a few years ago have anticipated.

In truth the harmonization of the races on this continent has been so rapid, and their progress, under all the circumstances, has been so great, that we must all be convinced that the finger of God Himself directs the work.

> There is a divinity which shapes our ends.

And this declaration applies to nations as well as individuals.

I believe all men admit that there is an eternal divine justice guiding, governing, and directing the affairs of men and nations; from the decrees of which divine justice neither men nor nations can escape, if they would. The result to both men and nations of a violated law of nature and of nature's God is the payment of a penalty, and sometimes a terrible one, and from the payment of this penalty there is no escape. It may be that this annual Indian appropriation bill is evidence of a part of the penalty we are now paying as the effect of a broken law, a broken promise, and a broken faith, which has often been kept only so long as it was plighted. If this annual appropriation is the only penalty which will rise up to confront us in the future, I shall be content. If we escape thus, it will be well with us.

From time immemorial in this country we have professed a desire to civilize and settle the Indians, but at the same time we have never missed an occasion to purchase at a nominal price their lands, and to get them in many instances by means not so creditable, and thrust them farther back into the wilderness and upon the desert. Thus they have been compelled to lead a wandering life, and sad experience has taught them to look upon us as unjust and indifferent to their fate.

In the past we have tried to civilize the Indian by forcing him away from civilization. He has felt that he was a homeless wanderer with nowhere to lay his head; with no spot he could call his own. The Government by its policy in the past, though perhaps lavish enough in its expenditures upon the subject, has constantly defeated the purpose of such expenditures and its own policy; and the Indians in general, receding farther and farther from the advancing wave of civilization, have heretofore retained their savage habits and barbarous customs. This policy of offering civilization to the Indians with civilization left out has long been felt to be an erroneous one. The great warrior and statesman and just man who is now President of the United States felt, when he first came into office, that it was not only an erroneous policy but a grossly unjust one. Therefore he was led to declare in his inaugural address to the American people "that the proper treatment of the original occupants of this land—the Indians—is one deserving of careful study. I will favor any course toward them which tends to their civilization, christianization, and ultimate citizenship."

These are words which should arrest the attention not only of Congress, but of the whole nation. They are words which do credit to the head and heart of the President. And it now remains for Congress and the nation to discover and practice the policy toward these unfortunate people which will lead to their civilization, christianization, and ultimate citizenship. I suppose all desire this as a result, but there appears to be a wide difference of opinion as to the best method of attaining this much-desired object. Some think it can be done best and most cheaply by turning the whole management of Indian affairs over to the War Department. Others think it cannot be done at all in this way; and still others believe that you must let it remain under the management of a peace establishment, if you would teach the Indians the arts of peace, and by such teaching bring them up to a grade of civilization which will enable them to become laborers and producers by labor, and thus be self-supporting.

I shall endeavor to show in the course of my remarks that the true policy toward the Indian is one of peace; that this policy is not only the most economical, but it is the most just; that this policy cannot be carried out under the management of the War Department; that the transfer of the management of Indian affairs to that Department means perpetual war with the Indian, and that the only peace you can expect as a result is the peace of desolation—the peace which would sit brooding over the once happy homes of these people after their extermination as a race. I think I will be able to show that the Indian can be civilized. But before I take up these propositions, it may not be uninteresting to the House and the country to know something as to the number of the Indians, the extent of their reservations, and what number can be called civilized, what number are semi-civilized, and what number are wild or barbarous. Then I desire also briefly to refer to some of the details of the bill now before us.

I submit herewith a table, which I will incorporate in my remarks, prepared with care by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, showing the population of Indian tribes residing on reservations, and the area in square miles and acres respectively of the several Indian reservations in the different States and Territories:

Table showing the population of Indian tribes residing on reservations.

States or Territories.	Population.	Area.
		Sq. miles.	Acres.
Washington	14,192	6,460.65	4,134,695.38
Oregon	7,720	9,788.00	6,264,320.00
California	2,799	111.50	71,363.00
Arizona	6,970	8,822.00	5,646,080.00
Nevada	6,000	4,025.00	2,576,000.00
Utah	4,800	3,186.00	2,039,040.00
New Mexico	14,948	7,237.00	4,631,664.00
Colorado	5,000	23,100.00	14,784,000.00
Dakota	34,867	57,450.00	36,768,000.00
Idaho	4,984	5,010.00	3,206,400.00
Montana	33,135	52,704.00	33,858,600.00
Wyoming	2,000	4,200.00	2,688,000.00
Nebraska	6,598	1,402.92	897,871.88
Kansas	972	581.04	371,865.39
Indian Territory	71,150	68,991.00	44,154,240.00
Minnesota	7,803	8,976.92	5,745,233.07
Wisconsin	6,045	938.26	600,489.36
Michigan	9,164	1,221.00	781,905.00
New York	5,070	139.90	89,537.00
Total	244,217	264,345.19	159,309,304.08

Now, while this is the most accurate statement the Department has been able to get, it cannot be said that it is any more than approximately correct. Several of these reservations have never been surveyed, and their extent has been arrived at by a geographical knowledge of the country, and by measurement upon the map. Then as to the population it may be remarked that the estimated number of Indians is too large. The Indians themselves always overestimated their number. An Indian has a very exaggerated idea of numbers and of quantity; then he has a powerful motive for overstating his strength. He has always sought to magnify the strength of his race in the estimation of the white man. It has become a chronic habit with him. Again, he gets more rations by having more people. It may be that interested white men, who live among the Indians sometimes, have motives to suppress the truth if that truth would depreciate the number of the Indians.

The Department has time and again made efforts to get a correct Indian census, but has never been able to get one that would give entire satisfaction as to its correctness. The table I have submitted shows the number of Indians on reservations to be 244,217. This does not include the roving bands of Indians to be found in several of the Territories; these probably number in the neighborhood of fifty thousand; then as a further addition we have the Indians of Alaska, who are estimated to number from fifty thousand to seventy-five thousand.

Now, my own opinion is that this estimate of the total number of Indians is much too large. I believe that the Indians, all told, in the United States to-day do not number over two hundred and fifty thousand. I think my distinguished friend from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] who has given the subject as much attention and who knows as much about Indian affairs as any man in the country, will agree with me. I am also sustained in this opinion by a report recently made by Major Powell, as a special agent of the Department, in which he states that he has but lately visited sixty-six tribes in Utah, Nevada, Arizona, California, and Southern Idaho, and has taken an accurate census of the same, and where it was supposed there were about thirty thousand Indians there are but ten thousand four hundred and thirty-seven. But, fortunately for our Treasury, these Indians have not been sharing very largely of its bounty.

Now, if the same rule of decrease would apply to all the other tribes as that which Major Powell has discovered to be correct, two hundred and fifty thousand is a very large estimate. But I think it would be hardly correct to apply this as a rule to many of the other tribes, for the reason that they are better known to us, and we have had much better opportunities for ascertaining their true population.

There is one thing in this connection which may be noted, and it is this, that since our permanent white settlements at Jamestown, Virginia, in May, 1607, and at Plymouth, Massachusetts, December 16, 1620, there has been a constant decrease of the Indian. Then he numbered about two million five hundred thousand; now he numbers about two hundred and fifty thousand, showing an average diminution, in the past two hundred and fifty intervening years, of about ten thousand per year. The table which I have submitted shows that Indian reservations make up an area of 264,345.19 square miles, and of 159,309,304.08 acres.

The following table, being a comparison of the Indian population, the extent of reservations, and the total area of the Territories, exhibits the fact that in the Territories alone there is a population of 184,962 Indians; that the area of their reservations in those Territories, in acres, is 121,274,999; while the whole extent of these Territories, in acres, is 666,229,319:

Territory.	Population.	Reservation.	Total.
	Indians.	Acres.	Acres.
Washington	15,487	1,640,480	44,769,160
New Mexico	18,640	3,912,944	77,568,640
Utah	12,800	2,039,040	54,065,043
Dakota	27,185	34,768,000	96,596,128
Colorado	7,300	14,784,000	66,880,000
Montana	18,835	25,113,000	92,016,640
Arizona	5,066	139,000	72,906,240
Idaho	4,469	3,206,400	55,228,160
Wyoming	2,400	2,688,000	62,645,068
Indian territory	71,150	32,984,135	44,154,240
Total	184,962	121,274,999	666,229,319

It thus appears that the Indian reservations cover one acre out of every five and four-tenths acres in the whole public domain not included in States, and which gives to them an assignment of seven hundred and twenty-nine and one-third acres per capita.

It must be apparent to every one that this amount of land is much too great for any practical benefit the same may be to the Indians. It is now the policy of the Government to persuade the Indians to accept smaller reservations, and pay them for that which they do not actually need; the proceeds of the sales of their unrequired lands to be devoted to their support, education, and civilization.

As to the civilization of these Indians, it may be said with a reasonable degree of assurance, according to a standard taken with reference to what might fairly be expected of a race with such antecedents and traditions, that about ninety-seven thousand are civilized, that about one hundred and twenty-five thousand are semi-civilized, and seventy-eight thousand are wholly barbarous. About one hundred and thirty thousand of the Indians support themselves upon their own reservations, receiving nothing from the Government except the interest on their own moneys or annuities granted them in consideration of the cession of their lands to the United States. There are about thirty-one thousand entirely subsisted by the Government, and eighty-four thousand in part subsisted. Those who subsist by hunting and fishing, upon roots, nuts, berries, grasshoppers, &c., or by begging and stealing, number about fifty thousand. There are about one hundred and fifty thousand Indians who remain constantly on their reservations, and are under the complete control of agents appointed by the Government; about ninety-five thousand who occasionally visit their agencies either for food or talk, or for both, but are generally roaming either on or off their reservations, or engaged in hunting or fishing. There are about fifty thousand who never visit any agency, and over whom the Government as yet exercises but little control except to keep them quiet. The most of these, however, are peaceable and inoffensive, and commit but few acts of hostility against the whites.

Of the whole number of Indians about one hundred and eighty thousand have treaties with the Government; forty thousand have no treaties with the United States, but reservations are set apart by Executive order or otherwise for their occupancy, and they are in charge of agents appointed by the Government; twenty-five thousand have no reservations, but are more or less under the control of agents appointed for them, and have more or less assistance from the Government; about fifty thousand have no treaty or other agreement with the Government.

I now desire to briefly call the attention of the committee to the details of the bill now before us.

The Committee on Appropriations, in preparing this bill, have been prompted by the same desire that has governed them in making up all other bills, to wit, to pursue the most rigid economy compatible with the good of the service. They have sought to avoid doing anything that might tend to disturb the peace between the whites on the border and the Indians, or anything that might work unjustly toward the Indians. They have no desire to in any way cripple the present policy adopted toward the Indians; but they do think that policy can be carried out for the next fiscal year upon the amount of money proposed to be appropriated by the bill now before us.

There was estimated for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various tribes for the next fiscal year the sum of $6,765,799.61. This bill proposes to appropriate the sum of $4,969,488.43, making a difference between the amount estimated and the amount to be appropriated by this bill of $1,800,291.18. There was appropriated by the annual appropriation bill for the present fiscal year the sum of $5,581,920.70. The difference between what was then appropriated and what is proposed to be appropriated by this bill is $546,442.27. The committee have not provided for any appropriation for the pay of superintendents except the one in the central superintendency, believing that all the others can be dispensed with.

The bill proposes to dispense with quite a number of Indian agents, and particularly those of the most civilized tribes in the Indian Territory. It reduces the pay of the interpreters from $500 to $400.

We have sought to curtail contingent expenses all that it seemed possible to do. It must not be forgotten that there is a very large amount of money named in this bill upon which there can be no reduction, unless by a violation of solemn treaties made with the different tribes. It may be correctly said that something over two millions of the amount named in this bill is appropriated because solemn treaties have provided that it shall be so annually appropriated.

The increase of our appropriations for the Indian Department is frequently a source of surprise, and sometimes of amazement. It becomes important, in this connection, that we should inquire the reason of this fact, if it exists as a fact. That such is the case cannot be denied. If there is no good reason for this large increase we should at once cut it off. But I think the reason is apparent when we look to the history of this matter for the last ten years; there is a very large difference between the amount appropriated for the year 1865 and the amount appropriated for the year 1874.

Now, what is the reason of this difference? In the years 1867 and 1868 General Sherman and others made treaties with the following tribes of Indians: The different bands of Sioux; the different bands of Utes; the Kiowas and Comanches; the Cheyennes and Arapahoes; the Mountain and River Crows; the Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes; the Navajoes; the Blackfeet; the Shoshones and Bannacks, and the Shoshones, Bannacks, and Sheep-Eaters; by the terms of which several treaties certain amounts therein named were to be given to the Indians for such purposes as the treaties specified. Now, under these treaties how much did Congress appropriate for these several tribes for the present fiscal year? Why, the sum of $3,427,574. How much was appropriated for these several tribes before the making of these treaties—say in the year 1865? Only the sum of $297,000; there being a difference in the amount paid these tribes before and since the making of these treaties of $3,130,574.

This showing I have made will, I think, fully explain the reason for the increase of our expenditures in the Indian Department.

Now very many may and do question the good policy of thus increasing the expenses of this department, but in order to do so they must also question the propriety of making these several treaties. It is too late now to shake off the responsibility of the payment of this amount of money, unless you are prepared to break in pieces the treaties made by Generals Sherman, Harney, Terry, Augur, and others. Before taking this step it would be well to consider that at the time of, and for a long time prior to, the making of these treaties many of the tribes with whom the treaties were made were at war with the whites upon the border; that a state of complete insecurity to the lives and property of the white settlers existed wherever any of these tribes were to be found; that since the making of these treaties comparative peace has been maintained with these several tribes. Then, as measures of safety and security, the treaties of 1867 and 1868 should be maintained.

It can easily be shown that from an economical view of the question it is better to maintain them, as it is capable of the clearest demonstration that it costs less to feed these Indians than to fight them, and that one or the other must be done by the Government I think no one can doubt. It is to be hoped, however, that this state of affairs will not last always. Indeed I think it will not, as the most of these Indians are much tamer and much nearer civilization now than when these treaties were made with them. The fact that they have kept the peace for six years is evidence of this. The time had come, when these treaties were made, for a change in the policy of the Government toward these wild Indians.

The policy of removal had been the one in vogue with the Government toward nearly all the Indians in the country. And I may be permitted to say in this connection that this record of Indian removals is one of the most revolting character; one which will not bear the test of an application of either reason or justice. From the Eastern to the Middle States; from there to Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota; thence to Missouri and Iowa; thence to Kansas, Nebraska, Dakota, and the mountains; and if the policy had not been changed in 1867 and 1868, whither now these people would have been forced to go no one can tell. The effect of the old policy was to clear the pathway for the pioneering white man, but this was done by the extermination of the Indian, and if not by the extermination, at least by the perpetuation of his native barbarism.

But the very condition of things forced a change of policy. The mighty current of progress had driven him back and still farther back from his home and the graves of his ancestors in the East, until there was no longer any place toward the setting sun to which the Indian could be removed. Colorado, Utah, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, and California had all become necessary for the abode of the white man. Therefore as we could no longer force the Indian back from our line of civilization, we must leave him in his old home or exterminate him.

Against the policy of extermination, although we had seen it go on for many years, the civilization of the age revolted and Christianity stood aghast; besides, this policy of extermination must be practiced at a cost of many lives of our people and at an expense of many millions of dollars to our Treasury. The Indian was surrounded on all sides. He saw the approaching footsteps of civilization. He again saw the white man upon his heels. He knew he was already beyond him, and in wild despair he said "there was but one remove farther, and that was to the general burial-ground of the race." He saw the land of his fathers again fading from his view. He was preparing to bid adieu to the graves of his kindred, and to take a last look at his soon to be deserted villages, but before doing so, and taking up his mournful line of march to a home which was nowhere, he felt called upon to once again invoke the god of battles in defense of his wife and little ones, his home and hunting-grounds. When the treaties of 1867 and 1868 were made, many of the wild tribes with whom the commission treated were and had been upon the war-path. They appeared determined to wage war upon the whites who had sought homes in the country which they thought ought to remain their hunting-grounds.

I am satisfied that no one can doubt the good policy of making these treaties, when we compare the attitude of these different tribes toward the Government now with the one maintained by them before and at the time the treaties were entered into. No one, if he but looks into the question, can fail to be convinced of the great good resulting from the treaties. It is true it costs us a large amount of money; but, I repeat, does it cost us as much as to fight them?

There is really no way left these wild Indians to get a living unless they get it from the Government. The day of the chase is about over. He must for the present either be assisted by the Government or left to perish from starvation. And from his well-known character, and from his past history, with which we are familiar, we can readily infer that he will not, after being driven to desperation by want and starvation, tamely submit to his fate, but will rather strike a blow for life that will cost us many of the lives of our gallant and hardy pioneers. And a war of this kind in the future, as in the past, will be a heavy drain upon our Treasury. There seems to be no plan left for us but the one marked out by the policy which dictated these treaties.

You may persuade these wild men of the West that it is good policy for them to accept smaller reservations, but you never can convince them that they ought to go farther to the west, because they know there is nowhere for them to go. And you cannot drive these people any longer. Your moral sense forbids it. If you try to do this, I bid you pause and remember that if our lands are taken, we believe that civilization justifies us in resisting the invader. Yea, it does more than this; it brands us as cowards and recreants if we submit to the wrong.

Civilization has made its contract with these people and has guaranteed the rights of the weaker party. Now, will we stand by the guarantee, or will we still continue to satisfy the covetous longings of a sordid avarice and, as we have done in the past, demand of him his home. And if he looks upon the land around him with a sadder heart and says, "This is as dear to me as is the home of his childhood to the civilized man; I, too, love these plains and mountains, rivers and lakes, and now to be forced to leave them will break those tender chords of the heart which vibrate to the softer sensibilities of human nature, and dry up the fountains of benevolence and kindly feeling, without which there can be no acceptance by me of your civilization," and he refuses to go and resists, is civilization again to confront him with the gospel of peace in the shape of the Ten Commandments in one hand, and the sword in the other, and demand his extermination? I trust that no such policy as this will ever again disgrace the annals of this nation, but that we will rather make an effort always in the future to atone for the wrongs which we have inflicted upon this people in the past.

But you ask, how can this be done? I answer, it is easy enough. But apply the principles of justice, and do unto him as you would have him do unto you, and the fruit of your action will be the civilization of this despised and persecuted race.

The Indian has many noble qualities. He is courageous. At times he appears to be insensible of fear. He shrinks from no danger, and he fears no hardships. If he has the vices of savage life, he has the virtues also. He is true to his country, his friends, and his home. We call this patriotism, and by it we are inspired to place everything, even life itself, as an offering upon its altar. If he forgives not injury, neither does he forget kindness. If his vengeance is terrible, his fidelity and generosity are unconquerable also.

That he has been cruel and revengeful, I admit. But has he not been treated as an outlaw, and has not his companion been the wild beast? Has he not been driven from the home he loved? Has he not often been tortured and killed? Have not the last of many tribes been compelled to mournfully exclaim, "There runs not a drop of my blood in the veins of any living creature?"

Let civilized man be his companion, and the association will warm into life virtues of the very highest worth. He will stand forth a new man, with new hopes, new desires, and a new life before him. And the result will be that he will accept our civilization and become a tiller of the soil. In the sweat of his face will he soon learn to eat bread.

The duty of the Government is twofold: First, to protect the white settler; and secondly, to do justice to the Indian, and by doing justice, to civilize him. And as you cannot drive him farther to the West, these duties must be performed with the Indians remaining on their reservations, and those reservations surrounded by white settlements.

But it is declared in Congress and out of Congress that you cannot civilize him. I answer, you can. Other nations have wrought upon this people a civilization which has at least drawn them from their heathen idolatry, and let in upon their minds the broad sunlight of a liberal Christianity. I allude now to the Spanish government and its management of Indian matters. When Cortez and Pizarro first landed upon the shores of Peru and Mexico they came with the lust of gold in their hearts, caring nothing for the people to whom the country belonged; they governed them by the sword; they practiced upon those unoffending natives the most terrible cruelties. This continued as long as the fabulous stories of the unheard-of richness of the country attracted thither the flower of the Spanish chivalry. It is said by some historians that the bloody Spaniard, by oppression, cruelty, and the sword, put to death six millions of these people. There came a time when there was to be a change.

The necessities of the home government caused an appeal to be made for the return of the scions of the best families in Spain, who had come to the New World in search of renown and of gold. Then it was that the Indians were strong enough to assert their claims to better treatment at the hands of their ruthless and bloody conquerors. It was from necessity granted them. The man of God came and extended to them the cross instead of the sword.

From that day to this the Indian has been the ruling race in Mexico and Peru, and under the influence of a peace policy it has made rapid progress; and I am not so certain that it is now incapable of imparting to its once cruel and oppressive Spanish masters lessons of benevolence, charity, mercy, and kindness. As the fruit of this peace policy toward Indians, we have to-day in New Mexico the Pueblos, one of the most civilized and industrious tribe of Indians on this continent.

Then, again, let me call your attention to the course of England toward these people and toward all people conquered by her. That conquest has been her mission none can deny.

It was Daniel Webster, I believe, who said—

> That to her, for the purpose of conquest and subjugation, Rome in the height of her glory is not to be compared; a power which has dotted over the surface of the globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drum-beat, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England.

Bloody, unrelenting, and cruel toward the people she has overcome with the sword she has been, all must admit. But she has been compelled to put up this symbol of death and practice the arts of peace toward the Indian in India and toward his relative on our own continent, and the consequence is that they are rapidly becoming a civilized and Christian people.

But why refer to the history of other nations. Have we not civilized some of these people? And what we have done with some of them can be done with all. It so happens that, under the silent and apparently slow operation of efficient causes, certain tribes of our Indians have already emerged from a state of pagan barbarism, and are to-day clothed in the garments of civilization, and sitting under the vine and fig-tree of an intelligent Christianity, blessing the day wherein the white man commenced to deal justly by them.

Within the present century their blanketed forefathers struggled in deadly conflict with our pioneer ancestors in the lovely valleys of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi; among the gorges and along the banks of the beautiful streams of Western North Carolina and East Tennessee, and in the everglades of Florida; and made classic the fields of Talladega, Emucfau, and the Horseshoe Bend. Within the memory of many men their tomahawks reflected the light of the burning cabins of white settlers on the Nolachukey and French Broad, the Hiawassee and the Tennessee Rivers, and their tributaries; their scalping-knives dripped with the blood of our border settlers, and their defiant battle-yells woke the echoes among the green savannas and tangled forests of the South.

How grand the contrast which greets the world to-day! The blanket and the bow have been discarded; the spear has become a pruning-hook, and the hatchet a hoe; the dance of death has ceased, and the war-club lies buried. In place of the skin-lodge and the primitive tepe, you behold the cottage and the mansion; the buckskin robe, the paint and beads have vanished, and in their stead are to be seen the tasteful fabrics of civilization. Medicine-lodges and their orgies and heathen offerings are mingled with the dust of a forgotten idolatry. They are replaced by the school-house and the church, and the feet of many hundred little Indian children, who are intelligent and thirsting after knowledge, are seen every day entering these houses, where they can learn the mighty truths of science; while churches dedicated to God, and vocal with His praise from the lips of redeemed thousands, reflect upon their domes and spires the earliest rays and latest beams of that sun whose daily light greets them as civilized, enlightened, and christianized who were but so recently heathen savages.

Need I say that I refer to the Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles? They are to-day a civilized, Christian people. There may be portions of them who still carry with them the old habits of paganism and superstition, but you will find their average intelligence almost up to the standard of like communities of whites. We need not confine our attention to the tribes I have named if we wish to find men and women who are even now on the high road to civilization, but we can look to what remains of the once powerful, warlike, and bloody Six Nations, to be found in the State of New York. They, too, have broken in pieces their war-god, and have erected instead thereof the altar of peace, civilization, and Christianity.

Then, again, we behold the Miamies in Indiana, the Chippewas in Michigan and Wisconsin, the Flatheads in Montana, the Crows, the Bannacks and Shoshones, the Santee Sioux in Nebraska, the Winnebagoes, Omahas, Pawnees, Sacs and Foxes, and the Ottoes, the Kickapoos, and Pottawatomies in Kansas, and the Pueblos and recently warlike Navajoes in New Mexico, and many other tribes I might name who are to-day making as rapid progress toward civilization as could be expected. But I have named enough for the purpose in view, to wit, to show that Indians can be civilized. I grant you that the civilization of the Indian has hitherto been slow. We should not fail, however, to remember that it has taken twelve centuries to bring us to our present grade.

Twelve hundred years ago our ancestors were barbarians, and all through that long lapse of time we have been engaged in attaining our present position, and I am not so sure but there is room for improvement yet. The Indian has not been brought in contact with civilization. The better class of white men and women living on the borders of his reservation have shuned him. You have placed him on reservations and built a wall around him in the shape of your intercourse laws, and no white man could scale that wall. He has in many cases copied our vices, but failed to imitate our virtues because, as a rule, none but the refuse of our population who could and would evade the intercourse laws and get among the Indians by stealth have mingled among them. The brave, hardy, and patriotic frontiersman has not cared very much to cultivate the friendship of his Indian neighbor. But beyond the tide of emigration, and hanging like the froth of the billows upon its very edge, is generally a host of law-defying white men—many of whom are refugees from justice—who introduce among the Indians every form of demoralization and disease with which depraved humanity in its most degrading forms is ever afflicted. Just as the better class of whites have appeared so near the Indian that their influence might be felt for good upon him, he has been required to move again.

It is not surprising that the philosophic chief of the Arapahoes, Little Raven, laughed heartily in the face of Mr. Commissioner Taylor when he told him something of hell and heaven. Mr. Taylor remarked that "all good men, white and red, would go to heaven, and all bad ones to hell." He inquired of the chief the cause of his laughter. When the chief recovered his breath, he said: "I was much pleased with what you say of heaven and hell, and the characters that would go to each after death; it is a good notion, heap good; and if all the whites are like the ones I know, when Indian go to heaven but few whites will trouble him there; pretty much all go to the other place." I think the fact stands out clear, indisputable, and well-defined that Indians, not only as individuals but as tribes, are capable of civilization, and that when such civilization takes place it makes the Indian a better man, prepared to become ultimately a citizen of this great Government, and it settles forever the vexed question as to what shall be done with the Indian.

Now, if like causes under similar circumstances always produce like effects, it follows that the application of the same causes that have produced civilization in some tribes will bring about like results in other tribes under the same circumstances. What causes operated to bring about the civilization of the Cherokees? The Cherokees lived on the borders of the white settlements for a long time, with a boundless wilderness behind them, to which they retired after each successive advance by the whites, until finally they reached the mountain regions of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and what is now called East Tennessee. Here they remained for many years, until the enterprise of the whites surrounded their possessions on all sides and began to press heavily upon their borders.

They had up to this time made small progress in civilization. They still depended upon the chase, and still clung to the habits and customs of their savage ancestors. Little change took place until they abandoned the hunt, and until the presence of emigration on all sides compelled them to reduce the area of their territory, and until the disappearance of game compelled them to resort to a pastoral and agricultural life to save themselves from starvation. Agriculture and stock-breeding brought with them the important idea of individual rights, of personal property, and the notion of fixed local habitations. When this state of affairs was produced, civilization followed as a matter of course. And this is precisely what is now going on with nearly all the other tribes under our control to-day. If it produced such beneficial results as to the Cherokees and other civilized tribes, is it not reasonable to presume that like happy results will ensue as to the other tribes?

I think it requires but little reflection to convince any one that the true solution of the vexed Indian question lies in the civilization of these people. If this be the best policy, leaving out of consideration the question of Christian duty on our part, then we should at once adopt the best means to produce this desired result. Can this work be done best and most economically by turning the management of Indian affairs over to the War Department? If so, all should at once favor the transfer of this business to that Department. In my judgment, before you can determine this question you must determine what you are going to do with the Indians.

If you intend to have peace with him and civilize him, he should be under the management of the civil department of the Government. If you intend to have war with him, and consequently exterminate him, you had better transfer the management of his affairs to the Department of the Government the business of which is war. Now, I know that some gentlemen believe that in this business "the winter of our discontent" is to be "made glorious summer" by their crying havoc and letting "slip the dogs of war" on those people. I believe otherwise. And for this belief I have the very highest military authority.

It will be remembered that in the year 1867 President Johnson appointed a commission in pursuance of an act of Congress approved July 20, 1867. The commission was authorized by the said act to visit such tribes as were then waging war, and to call together their chiefs and head-men for the purpose of ascertaining their reasons for hostility; and, if thought advisable, to make treaties with them, having in view the following objects, namely:

First, to remove, if possible the causes of war; secondly, to secure as far as possible our frontier settlements, and the safe building of our railroads to the Pacific; and thirdly, to suggest or inaugurate some plan for the civilization of the Indians.

Now, who were upon that commission? Four civilians and four military officers high in rank. Who were these military men? Lieutenant-General W. T. Sherman, Major-General William S. Harney, Major-General Alfred H. Terry, and Major-General C. C. Augur.

Of course these gentlemen went on this duty in the capacity of civilians; but the presumption is they certainly had no prejudice against the military arm of the Government. On the 7th of January, 1868, they submitted a report to the President; and in order to show the opinions of General Sherman and his associates on the commission at that time, I will ask the Clerk to read but one paragraph of that report.

The Clerk read as follows:

This brings us to consider the much-mooted question whether the Bureau should belong to the civil or military department of the Government. To determine this properly we must first know what is to be the future treatment of the Indians. If we intend to have war with them, the Bureau should go to the Secretary of War. If we intend to have peace, it should be in the civil department. In our judgment, such wars are wholly unnecessary, and hoping that the Government and the country will agree with us, we cannot now advise the change. It is possible, however, that, despite our efforts to maintain peace, war may be forced on us by some tribe or tribes of Indians. In the event of such occurrence it may be well to provide, in the revision of the intercourse laws or elsewhere, at what time the civil jurisdiction shall cease and the military jurisdiction begin. If thought advisable, also, Congress may authorize the President to turn over to the military the exclusive control of such tribes as may be continually hostile or unmanageable. Under the plan which we have suggested the chief duties of the Bureau will be to educate and instruct in the peaceful arts—in other words, to civilize the Indians. The military arm of the Government is not the most admirably adapted to discharge duties of this character. We have the highest possible appreciation of the officers of the Army, and fully recognize their proverbial integrity and honor; but we are satisfied that not one in a thousand would like to teach Indian children to read and write, or Indian men to sow and reap. These are emphatically civil, and not military, occupations. But it is insisted that the present Indian service is corrupt, and this change should be made to get rid of the dishonest. That there are many bad men connected with the service cannot be denied. The records are abundant to show that agents have pocketed the funds appropriated by the Government and driven the Indians to starvation. It cannot be doubted that Indian wars have originated from this cause. The Sioux war, in Minnesota, is supposed to have been produced in this way.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. This is just as good authority as I desire on this subject. This was written and proclaimed by these eminent military men after they had gone over the whole field and had looked at the subject from every side. I am aware of nothing that has occurred since this report was made to change the opinion of any one on this question. Again, Major Powell, who is as familiar with the Indian tribes as almost any other man, has given his opinion on this question, and I deem it of the greatest value, from its pertinency to the question, and from the fact of its being the opinion of a gentleman of the largest experience. It will be remembered that he was before the Military Committee of this House during the present session, and I will ask the Clerk to read a part of his testimony bearing on this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Are the Indians entirely secure, if the troops are withdrawn, from the encroachments of the frontiermen who come into the country?

Major POWELL. I think they could be made secure by other means better than with military power. The original policy was to remove the Indians from the east to the western country, and the wild tribes were thus re-enforced by the addition of half-civilized Indians from time to time; but now there is no more unexplored and unoccupied country to which the Indians can be driven. It is necessary to pursue a policy toward the Indians adapted to this changed condition of affairs. When there was a great unknown district just beyond the frontier where lines of settlements were growing up, it seemed necessary to protect this frontier by troops, who were minute-men, to go out and defend the settlers from sudden attacks or surprises. This state of affairs no longer exists, and we should no longer deal with the Indians as if they were distinct nations or had independent governments, but we should deal with them as individuals, and when an individual Indian or a number of them are guilty of crimes some means should be provided by which the guilty parties could be brought to justice, rather than to continue the present method of punishing tribes or the Indians at large for the offenses of such individuals. What is now needed for the Indians under consideration is not some means for wholesale punishment, but some means to secure justice between Indian and Indian, and between white man and Indian. As at present managed it is something like this: A hungry Indian steals a beef, or a tired Indian steals a horse; white men set out in search of the thief and kill the first Indian they meet; the Indians then retaliate, and the news flashes through the country that there is an Indian war on hand; troops are sent to the country, and a trivial offense costs the Government the expense of an Indian war. In the sequel no justice is secured, the proper Indians are not punished, and usually in such a case the white men of the frontier are greater sufferers than the Indians, as these last have no great amount of property to lose, and their knowledge of the wilderness and their customs of stealthy warfare are such that it is impossible to punish them severely, except by means which are repugnant to civilized minds.

I am decidedly of the opinion that the military method of dealing with the Indian offenders is altogether bad, failing to secure justice between Indians and whites, and between Indians and Indians, entailing upon the white men of the frontier much loss of property, some loss of life, and keeping up a state of constant terrorism among them, and that altogether it is exceedingly expensive.

The Indians themselves fully appreciate this method of wholesale and indiscriminate punishment, and think it strange that we should hold all the Indians responsible, or, at least, whole tribes responsible, for the bad deeds of a few, and are always ready to cite scores of examples of such treatment received by them from the whites in justification of their own offenses which are similar.

Some system should be devised by which the guilty parties themselves could be brought to justice, and by which the Indians could be made to assist in the execution of justice, as in capturing and delivering over criminals.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I might rest here, upon this evidence, with the assurance that every reasonable mind is already convinced that the mailed hand of military power is not the one to guide the Indian along the pathway of civilization.

But we are not left to the positive opinions of learned, practical, and eminent men, for we have the light of past experience to guide us in forming a correct judgment. For seventeen years the management of Indian affairs was under the control of the War Department.

In 1849 it was by an act of Congress transferred to the Interior Department. The management of Indian affairs for this seventeen years that it was under the control of the War Department was, in my judgment, a most lamentable failure, as far as any civilization of the Indians was concerned, or as far as there was any saving to the Treasury. Military power may keep the peace for the time being, and the peace policy contemplates it shall be used toward the Indians for this purpose as well as toward the whites, just as we rely upon the sheriff with his posse comitatus in the counties, or the police in our cities. But this power alone can never civilize. It never has civilized. It may overcome brute force and bloody opposition, and prepare the way for civilization, just as the plowshare prepares the ground which is cumbered with rank and noxious weeds for the seed of the husbandman. But after its work is done another agency than this must carry on the grand work of civilization.

While this arm of the Government controlled this business you had constant Indian wars. The savage war-whoop was heard all along our western border. Almost all the uncivilized tribes were at war during this period. Was the peace any better kept during this time than it has been since? I answer no; not half so well.

Now, I do not wish to be understood as speaking disparagingly of our gallant Army. I yield to no one in admiration for our patriotic soldiers and brave officers. They are our pillar of cloud by day and wall of fire by night, thrown around the nation in times of great public danger; they are our hope when the honor, integrity, and very existence of our nation are endangered by either a foreign or domestic foe.

But I submit there is no greater cruelty you can inflict upon our Army than to compel it to live out among the Indians and take upon itself the work of teaching these Indians the arts of peace. There is no field there for the achievement of the great military deeds which are the pride of the true soldier. Both soldier and officer, as a rule, despise this kind of work.

The history of the past shows that military management has been prolific of wars with these red men, and they can to-day truly say:

That they died not by hunger or lingering decay,
The steel of the white man hath swept them away.

Is this state of war desirable as an economic policy. If we look to the Treasury alone, and do not consider it our duty toward these people to make an effort to improve them and make better men and women of them, I submit we cannot favor a military management of their affairs. If a chronic Indian war with an annual increased expenditure of from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 in consequence thereof is desired, it seems to me the transfer should be favored.

We have had some fruits, in the shape of Indian wars in the past, as the result of military management; and perhaps it may be well for us to go back a little and see what they have cost us, and in many cases what has been their origin. One fact will be found on investigation, and it is this, that while Indian affairs were under the control of the military establishment more than half the time was spent in costly, unprofitable, and fruitless as well as unjust wars against the Seminoles and the Sacs and Foxes, and in troubles of the most vexatious and expensive character with the Creeks and Cherokees. And nearly all the wars we have had since the Interior Department took the management of Indian affairs have had their origin in the hasty and ill-considered action of the military stationed in the Indian country.

I have not time to refer to all of the wars we have had with these people, but will confine myself to those with which we are all familiar.

It is in the memory of almost every member of this House that we had a war with the Seminoles; that for seven long years we fought about seven hundred warriors of this tribe with our regular Army and a large volunteer force, losing about fifteen hundred lives and spending $50,000,000, and at the close of said war the Indians were further from civilization than when the war commenced.

I now desire to briefly call your attention to the war with the Sioux in 1852–'54, which originated in this wise: An emigrant Mormon train abandoned a cow. A lieutenant and squad went to the camp and demanded of the Indians, who had found and eaten her, the man who had killed her. The Indians refused to surrender the man, but offered to pay for the cow. The lieutenant and his squad fired upon them, killing and wounding a number, when they were surrounded and massacred. The great Sioux war ensued, costing us $30,000,000 and several hundred lives, besides a large amount of property.

Then, again, in 1864, we had a war with the Cheyennes. And how did it originate? Why, a ranchman by the name of Ripley went to Camp Sanborn, on the South Platte, and charged the Indians with stealing his stock. A Lieutenant Dunn proceeded with a squad of men to search for it, but did not succeed in finding it. Falling in with a company of Cheyennes, an attempt was made to disarm them, and in the difficulty one soldier was killed and some others wounded. Then followed the Cheyenne war, culminating in the massacre at Sand Creek, where one hundred and twenty Indians, mostly women and children, were brutally murdered in cold blood while resting on their own hunting-grounds under the protection of our flag. This war cost our Treasury not less than $40,000,000, for it will be remembered that it involved not only the Cheyennes, but the Apaches, the Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Comanches, and also many bands of the Sioux, and was only ended by the treaty of peace in 1865 at the mouth of the Little Arkansas.

In 1866 the military took possession of the Powder River country, in Dakota, within the acknowledged territory of the Sioux, and planted military posts Phil Kearny, Reno, and C. F. Smith, without the consent of the Indian proprietors and in direct violation of treaty stipulations. A terrible and bloody war ensued, costing us $10,000,000, many hundred lives, including the gallant Fetterman and his devoted band, and much valuable property.

In April, 1867, a military command burned the peaceful village of the Cheyennes on the Pawnee Fork in Western Kansas, who had been at peace with us since the treaty of 1865, and they were then on lands assigned them by the treaty. The Cheyennes flew to arms and the war of 1867 followed, in which we lost over three hundred soldiers and citizens, and $8,000,000 were taken from the Treasury, a large amount of public and private property was destroyed, and we killed six Indians and no more.

The pretext for our war with the Navajoes was the shooting of a colored servant boy of a military officer by an Indian, and the refusal of the Indians to surrender the criminal. They did propose, however, after their custom, to pay a pecuniary consideration as satisfaction to the officer. That war cost the Treasury $6,000,000.

Now, I might detain the House much longer by a recital of the many conflicts we have had with the Indian tribes, their origin, and their cost. But I think I have referred to enough to satisfy it and the country that you cannot civilize Indians under the management of the military, nor can you save money for the Government. And if Indian extermination be your policy, you can scarcely do that, at least not very rapidly; for we have been in the business through the agency of the military power of this Government for about two hundred and fifty years, and have not quite succeeded in completing the work of carnage and death necessary to their complete annihilation. And what we have done by means of the military arm has cost this country since its first settlement over $600,000,000. And if the cost of killing each Indian in our late wars is a fair average of what this process of getting rid of him is to cost in the future, you will have to pay $1,000,000 for each Indian you exterminate.

But suppose I were to admit they ought to be exterminated without mercy, and that we might achieve the grand consummation, do you not think that it would be purchasing glory at a fearful cost? The fact is you never can civilize the Indians by military management. When an Indian commits a crime or an outrage, the military strike the whole tribe for the offense perhaps of one man. This begets a spirit of resentment and resistance on the part of the whole tribe, and perhaps many tribes, just as it would do with us, and the consequence is a war.

You plant your military camps among them, and your soldiers soon violate even the sternest ideas of Indian domestic morals. Female chastity yields to either trickery or fear; marital rights are generally disregarded, and shameless concubinage spreads its pestiferous stench through camp and lodge until the whole tribe becomes what Dante characterized Italy, "A grand house of ill-fame." The most loathsome, lingering, and fatal diseases which reach many generations in their ruinous effects are spread broadcast, and the seeds of moral and physical death are planted among the miserable and wretched creatures.

You tell me you would not exterminate the Indians. Then you must civilize them.

In the present condition of this country, situated as the Indian is, surrounded on all sides as he is by white settlements, one result or the other is inevitable. There is no middle ground. He can no longer hang on the borders of civilization, but he must either come within its confines or be buried by its mighty wave, which has long since washed our far western shore. You all say you would civilize the Indian. Then will you send him the sword? You would inspire him with the peaceful principles of Christianity. Is the bayonet their symbol? You would invite him to the sanctuary. Will you herald his approach with martial music, the clangor of arms, and the thunder of artillery?

The true policy to be pursued toward the Indians is to get them upon as few reservations as possible. Let these reservations be sufficiently large to afford them plenty of land to cultivate. Teach them the duty and blessings of labor and the arts of peace as rapidly as you can, and as soon as possible put them under the control of that civil law whose seat is the bosom of God, and whose voice is the harmony of the world, so that the individual will be punished for his crime and his violation of law, and the whole tribe will not be made to suffer for the wrong-doing of one man. To do this it may cost much money, but in the end it is the cheapest plan you can adopt. It is certainly the most just and the most Christian.

In this policy lies the solution of this perplexing problem, which has been a source of trouble to the American people from the first settlement of the country. Sir, the benevolent and Christian men and women of the country should remember that these red men worship the same God that we do; that from many a dark bosom goes up a pure prayer to the Great Spirit; that although he has not traced His laws for them on tables of stone, He has traced them on the tables of their hearts; that these poor children of nature may not know the God of revelation, but the God of the universe they acknowledge in everything around them; and, remembering these things, let them enter through the door, which is wide open, fields for Christian labor and benevolent effort that are presented everywhere.

The subject is worthy their highest consideration, and they should put forth every effort to aid the Government in its great duty of protecting, educating, and elevating this down-trodden race to a higher and nobler style of being. And let us not so legislate upon this question, which is so important that it affects a whole race of people, that they will be compelled to soon hear the roar of the last wave which will settle over them forever, or that in the future the inquisitive white man, as he stands by some great and growing city, will ponder on the structure of their disturbed remains and wonder to what manner of people they belonged, or that they, in the language of one of their number, "will live only in the names of our lakes, rivers, cities, and towns," or only in the songs and chronicles of their exterminators, even if these are faithful to their rude virtues as men or will pay due tribute to their unhappy fate as a people. But let us rather so legislate that the few of this people who remain will be brought within the precincts of civilized society, where they will stand as human monuments of Gothic grandeur, fearful and tremulous amid the revolutions of time; and so that the red man, as well as the white man and the black man, will in the near future, even it may be when the grand cycle of the hundred years of our existence as a nation is completed, be ready with grateful hearts to exclaim:

Great God, we thank Thee for this home—
This bounteous birth-land of the free;
Where wanderers from afar may come
And breathe the air of liberty.
Still may her flowers untrampled spring,
Her harvests wave, her cities rise;
And yet, till Time shall fold his wing,
Remain earth's loveliest paradise.

Mr. HANCOCK rose.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Texas will yield to me, I will move, in view of the usual hour of adjournment having arrived, that the committee rise.

Mr. HANCOCK. I yield for that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POLAND reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CORRECTION OF DATE OF COMMISSIONS.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3166) to correct the date of commissions of certain officers of the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MARGARET CONNELLY.

Mr. GOOCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3167) granting a pension to Margaret Connelly; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I send to the desk an amendment which I desire to offer, when in order, to the Indian appropriation bill. I ask that it may be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DAVID A. TELFAIR.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina. I ask that by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. No. 3093) to relieve David A. Telfair from political disability, which comes back from the Senate with an amendment inserting the word "political" before the word "disabilities" in the body of the bill, be taken from the Speaker's table, and the Senate amendment concurred in.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate concurred in.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1573) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location; and

An act (H. R. No. 1935) for the relief of William J. Scott, late aide-de-camp on the staff of General Spear.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALBERT: The petition of Chauncey Brooks, Walter B. Brooks, Derrick Fahnestock, Isaac Thrasher, and John A. Rogers, to be compensated for ninety-nine boxes of tobacco taken by United States troops at Farmville, Virginia, in April, 1865, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BASS: The memorial of the Buffalo Board of Trade, in relation to the removal of obstructions in Saginaw River, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BUNDY: The petition of 121 citizens of Scioto and Pike Counties, Ohio, for the establishment of post-routes from Flat, via Nairn, Harrison Mills, and Scioto, to Sciotoville; and from Flat, via Gibson and Germany, to Waverly, in Ohio, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of Anna B. Wilson, of Georgetown, District of Columbia, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FRYE: The petition of Hannah A. A. P. Bonney, of Poland, Maine, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Rock Island County, Illinois, for aid to the Continental Railway from Omaha to tide-water, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of the Philadelphia Association of United States Marines, for equalization of bounties to members of the Marine Corps similar to that of Army volunteers, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana: Numerous petitions from citizens in different parts of the United States, for the passage of a law authorizing the manufacture of patent-right articles by others than owners of patent-rights upon payment of a reasonable royalty thereon, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. SCUDDER, of New York: The memorial of the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends of New York, in favor of arbitration for the settlement of international differences, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. STONE: The petition of banks, bankers, and merchants of the city of Saint Louis, Missouri, representing several hundred millions of capital, that a law may be passed authorizing and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury, in the manufacture of all Government issues hereafter to be made, to conform to the plan recommended by the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment, March 3, 1869, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. TREMAIN: The petition of Thomas W. Olcott and others, bankers, of Albany, New York, in relation to the engraving of Government notes, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. ——: The petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, in relation to the proposed laying of railroad tracks and running steam-cars on Delaware avenue, Washington, District of Columbia, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 30, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented a petition of citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, in favor of the appointment of a commission, composed of both males and females, to visit the various Indian tribes and confer with them as to the best modes for the restoration and preservation of good-will between the races; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented the petition of Leora J. Allen, of South Carolina, praying compensation for land sold for taxes by the Government during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented twenty-two memorials numerously signed by members of the different granges of the State of Nebraska, protesting against the extension of the patent of what is known as the "Haines harvester;" which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a memorial of ship-masters and ship-owners of the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 675, providing for the abolition of the present system of compulsory pilotage on ships or vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONOVER presented a petition of George H. Wellman, of Lowell, Massachusetts, in behalf of the heirs of George Wellman, deceased, praying that the administrator of the estate of said decedent have leave to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for a further extension of the letters-patent for an apparatus for stripping top-flats for carding engines for the term of seven years from and after the expiration of its present term; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of J. E. D. Couzins, of Saint Louis, Missouri, praying an appropriation of $10,000 out of the fund appropriated for the detection and punishment of the crime of counterfeiting as compensation for time, labor, and money expended in discovering an extensive counterfeiting establishment, with all the implements and materials used for bank-note engraving; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition and accompanying papers of Mrs. Martha G. Vaughn and Mrs. Louisa Jackman, praying compensation for services rendered the United States Army during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FENTON presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Glover & Mather, praying compensation for transporting the United States mails between Louisville and New Orleans; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hold in my hand a paper which I desire to present to the Chair. Whatever relates to the organization of the Senate, to its practices, traditions, and precedents, is always interesting and valuable; and I think this paper is particularly so, drawn up as it has been by an officer of the Senate who has been very long in our service, longer than any of us, upon the tenure of the office of the President of the Senate pro tempore. I move that the paper be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a memorial, numerously signed by ship-masters, ship-owners, merchants, and others, of New Orleans, Louisiana, asking the abolition of the present system of compulsory pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the memorial of Thomas W. Cooke and others, merchants, owners, and ship-masters of New Bedford, Massachusetts, asking the abolishment of the present system of compulsory pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the memorial of Cortlandt Parker, administrator cum testamento annexo of George W. Anderson, deceased, late of Savannah, Georgia, praying reimbursement for certain stocks in mining companies alleged to have been seized and sold under illegal decrees of the United States courts for the southern district of New York; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the business men of Indianapolis, Indiana, disapproving the veto of the President of the United States of the so-called "Senate finance bill," and recommending certain financial measures for the relief of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

HAYDEN'S CRETACEOUS FLORA OF THE WEST.

Mr. ANTHONY. Some days ago I reported from the Committee on Printing a resolution to print, not for popular distribution but for scientific and departmental distribution, the report of Professor Hayden on the Cretaceous Flora of the West, a very valuable work, which has been prepared at considerable expense, and requires only the small cost of printing the letter-press, about $600, in order to complete it. The Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] objected at the time, but I believe he is satisfied that the resolution is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be taken up if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed and bound twenty-five hundred copies, in quarto, uniform with the series, of Professor Hayden's final report on the Cretaceous Flora of the West: one thousand copies for the Department of the Interior, one thousand copies for the Smithsonian Institution, and five hundred copies for the office of the United States geological survey of the Territories.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the resolution be read again.

Mr. ANTHONY. There are no copies provided for popular distribution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only difference between that and the ordinary resolutions for printing extra documents is that these are to be distributed by the Department of the Interior and other agencies of the Government, and the ordinary rule has required distribution by Senators and Members of the House, the difference being against the Government. If we publish extra numbers of expensive documents like this and direct them to be distributed by the Secretary of the Interior, what is the result? They are distributed to whom he pleases at the expense of the Government of the United States. That is just as much worse than the franking privilege as the franking privilege was worse than the payment of postage by everybody. This presents a question on which I intend to divide the Senate; and it is whether or not the Government of the United States will continue the practice of printing documents for free and gratuitous distribution.

The mere provision that these copies shall be distributed by the Secretary of the Interior does not relieve the proposition from the objection that has been made; on the other hand, it adds to the objection. The Secretary of the Interior is a single officer; he distributes these documents to whom he pleases; he distributes them at the public expense; he franks them, because the mere stamping them with the stamps that are furnished by the Government of the United States does not change the character of the process. It is his frank; but instead of having his name written on the back as formerly, it is in the form of a stamp printed at the expense of the United States, which carries the document free to whoever he directs it. In other words, he is to distribute this expensive document instead of Congress. I say this is worse than the restoration of the franking privilege—far worse.

Now I wish to give the Senator from Rhode Island a case that has actually occurred with me. I desire to do what is a duty imposed on me, to distribute the Congressional Globes that have been sent me. If I pay the postage I must pay $2.20 for each set of the Globe of the last session, consisting of only three volumes. In other words, I pay out of my own pocket about two hundred dollars to distribute the Globes of last session that fall to my share. I can, however, employ the express companies to do it for less than half that sum. They are willing to distribute these documents if I pay a dollar a set. The result is that documents will be printed at the public expense and distributed at my expense. Always desiring to get the cheaper mode of transportation, I take the express companies and employ them to distribute these public documents to my constituents, instead of distributing them through the mail. The consequence is that the Government of the United States loses the carrying of these documents, gets nothing for it, while it pays the contractors the full price for carrying the public mail. That is the result, and the loss falls upon me, for I have to pay the express companies, or, which would be the same thing, require my constituents to pay them if I choose to do so.

Now I say that we ought, once for all, either to provide for a mode of distributing these documents by public agents, by ourselves, by members of the Senate and House of Representatives, or to abandon their publication. The idea of transferring the franking privilege in a body on all these public documents to the heads of Departments and persons who have no lists, no communications, no correspondence with the people of the United States is "whipping the devil around the stump" in a most offensive way. How can the Secretary of the Interior know to whom to distribute these documents? Shall he distribute them only according to his own will and pleasure to favorites of his? I know the Secretary of the Interior would not desire to do it. The probability is that he will come to me and come to every Senator here and ask for the names of persons in the State of Ohio and the State of Rhode Island to whom to send these documents. He will affix the official stamp on the documents, and they will be sent to persons that we direct them to be sent to. In this way the law which repealed the franking privilege will be practically abrogated in a most offensive way. He may, if he chooses, assume the power and the right to distribute these documents; but to whom? Does he know the people of Ohio or the people of Rhode Island as well as I or the Senator from Rhode Island? Does he know who in New Jersey would prize Hayden's report as well as the Senator from New Jersey? Not at all. If, therefore, he assumes to do what you here authorize him to do, he distributes at the public expense these valuable public documents hap-hazard. If, however, he does what he would naturally desire to do, goes to the Senators and Representatives to know who are the proper persons to receive these documents, that would be an evasion of the law which prohibits the transportation of public documents through the mail free.

I say, Mr. President, that there is no way but for us to stop the publication of all these public documents except such as are necessary for us in the ordinary discharge of our public duties, or else to provide some way by which they can be distributed through the representatives of the people. I prefer the former; I prefer that we shall stop the publication of documents; but I say now that if Professor Hayden's book, which is to be a very expensive book, involving large engravings, illustrations, the most expensive type, the most expensive material, is worth publishing, it would be better to hand over the materials to Appleton & Co., and they will publish whatever will sell without cost except to those who choose to get the benefit of the publication. We may very well collect the material together; we may publish such as is necessary for our own use to guide us in making laws and performing our official duties; but if there is any value in these publications, private publishers will publish them and distribute them, and those who receive the copies will pay for them. If they are not worth publishing, if there is no demand for this information, no public use to be derived from it, no profitable instruction to be derived from it, publishers will decline to publish them.

Therefore, without prolonging the debate on this matter I desire to divide the Senate, and I shall call for the yeas and nays on the passage of this resolution as a test vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think when the Senator from Ohio understands the state of this publication he will withdraw his objections. His objections, of course, are to the publication of new works. This has already been published so far as the main expense is concerned. The engravings have already been made; the book has already been ordered to be printed; and this resolution involves the expense of only $600 for the letter-press and the press-work of the additional number.

I do not entirely agree with the Senator as to the duty of the Government to furnish scientific information. There is information of immense value that only Government or public institutions largely endowed can properly investigate. It is our duty and it is for our interest to explore the country, especially the western portion, because the more settled portions will find other means of exploration. We should explore it geologically and mineralogically and botanically and in every scientific way. I think it is a duty of the Government to do that; and when such investigations have been made there can be no other way of utilizing the results than to make them public. Whether they should be made public at the cost of the Government or of those who may buy the books for the mere expense of printing, is a question on which the Senator and I, perhaps, would not differ; but this is a publication the main expense of which has already been incurred, and which will be almost wasted unless this trifling sum of $600 is added.

The distribution by the Secretary of the Interior is not what I should prefer, but it is the best that is at present available. Undoubtedly the Secretary of the Interior would ask the Senator from Ohio, would ask me, touching the libraries and scientific institutions in our respective States where these books would be useful, and we should furnish him with a list, and he would put a stamp on each volume, and it would be sent by mail without costing the Government anything. Mail contractors do not charge more for carrying these documents.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then why not provide that we shall distribute them?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think there should be such a provision, and I am in favor of some such system as the Senator indicates; but this survey was ordered, all the materials of the book were collected before the abrogation of the franking privilege. According to strict rule I suppose the publication of the work should be administered under the old law. Still, out of deference to the intimations which the Senate have given out, the Committee on Printing have made no report in favor of the popular distribution of any document. We did try to get five hundred copies of the Navy Register, and failed ignominiously in that. This is only an expenditure of $600, in order to utilize a book which without it will be of very little use or of no use at all, compared to the cost of printing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I can suggest a compromise that will dispose of this matter satisfactorily. Why not give Professor Hayden all these materials? They are of no value to us. We have distributed them and used them as far as we thought it advisable to do. Why not give them to Professor Hayden and let him do the best with the materials on hand? And I can assure the Senator that there are precedents for this. I once had the honor of serving upon the Committee on the Library, and a proposition was made to republish the volumes of the Wilkes expedition, together with some very valuable documents and papers that had never been published, but that were in the Library. Admiral Wilkes was very desirous to have them published and see this information spread broadcast. Finally, after the most patient consideration, rather than incur a large expense of probably over $100,000, we give the materials by act of Congress to Admiral Wilkes, and I understand out of those materials he has culled interesting matter which was published and which publishers were willing to take and publish. It seems to me that if the Government had published that same information it would have been at a cost of $100,000. Admiral Wilkes published and sold in the ordinary way all that was worth publishing, and so it was disposed of.

I still make the objection that if these documents are to be distributed, they ought to be distributed by the representatives of the people so as to secure a distribution all over this country in all parts of the Union among our constituents. If not, we ought not to publish them for distribution; we ought not to print them at all. I, for one, am disposed to stop now and to vote against the publication of any public documents for distribution until the law points out a mode in which they can be distributed. Under this proposition the Secretary of the Interior franks these documents.

Mr. ANTHONY. It does not cost the Government anything.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then why not give it to members? The Senator's position is an admission that our act in repealing the franking privilege was a mistake, a wrong, and that we have not the courage to rectify it. It costs for the distribution of the Globe of last session $2.20, and it is only three volumes; and what will be the cost of the distribution of the RECORD of this session nobody can tell; it will be about ten volumes, I imagine. For last session there were but three volumes of the Globe and it costs for distributing them through the mail $2.20 and through the express companies one dollar. The result is that the express companies are now taking business that ought naturally to go through the mails. In the State of Ohio I find it far better to distribute all the matter that I am compelled to distribute by express. Private competition has reduced the price of distributing the Congressional Globe down to one dollar to any point in Ohio, while the Government charges $2.20; and the result is that public documents printed at public expense are sent to my constituents by the express companies at my cost.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is likely the whole business of the Post-Office Department might be done cheaper by express companies; but I do not see the application of the Senator's argument to this case. It certainly would have been of doubtful expediency for Congress to publish the exploring expedition at a cost of $100,000; but it is a very different thing to publish this work, the chief cost of which has already been incurred, at $600, and I do not wish that this case shall be made a test of the policy which the Senator from Ohio indicates. I think this ought to stand upon its own merits, if it has any; and I think it has a great deal of merit. This is a book that has been prepared, the engravings are already made, and nothing remains but just the press-work and the binding. If it was a question of printing this book, if the materials were here and it was a question whether we should go into it or not, then the argument of the Senator from Ohio would be perfectly applicable; but that has already been done, and it was done before the franking privilege was repealed. This is merely cleaning up our old work.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply want to correct a mistake into which I have been led. My colleagues on the Committee on the Library tell me that the proposition about Admiral Wilkes's book did not finally pass Congress. It was debated and agreed upon by the Committee on the Library. It seems it did not finally pass Congress; although that was the proposition, Congress refused to reprint Admiral Wilkes's book. The proposition I mentioned was made, and I supposed it had been passed into a law, but my colleagues tell me it never passed.

Mr. RAMSEY. I regret very much that the Committee on Printing have not before this time taken some action on a paper I had referred to them some months since, suggesting, as is done in the publication of English documents, that there be impressed on every public document the cost of it and the expense of its transmission by mail. It is well enough to say that persons can get these documents by purchasing them if they want them; but you furnish the public no facilities for getting them, no information as to how they shall be had, and what the price of them is. For example, a man in Kansas or Nebraska or California wishes a certain document, this document, for instance; he does not know what the price is at which the Government will sell it nor the cost of its transportation by mail or otherwise, as is done in England. I think we might with great facility do it here and impress that cost upon every document we publish. In England every public document is paid for and transmitted by mail or by express or as ordinary freight. Even the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland has to pay her postage on her documents and letters. But we ought to grant the public some facilities for ascertaining what they can get these things for when they want them.

Mr. ANTHONY. We have not printed any at this session.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I sympathize with the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in his regret that the chairman of the Committee on Printing has not made a report on the proposition he states; but at the same time I beg to express my regret that the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has not reported a bill which I introduced some months since, dispensing with the pre-payment of postage and fixing a regular price for transporting by mail all these documents, not to exceed twenty cents.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will say to the Senator that the committee have had some difficulty about establishing a different system of postage for officials from that established for the people. They would come to such a system with great reluctance, and have not yet brought themselves to a unit in support of the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If my friend would only report the bill adversely we could get it before the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Can the Senator from Rhode Island inform the Senate how much expense has already been incurred in the preparation of Professor Hayden's report?

Mr. ANTHONY. It would be impossible to tell; but the whole cost of the survey as well as of the publication will be comparatively useless unless we print the book.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there no approximate estimate of the amount of expense already incurred?

Mr. ANTHONY. Nothing has come before us on that point. All that was referred to us was the cost of printing according to the resolution offered, and that will be $600. What was the previous cost of preparing the material we had nothing to do with; but it must have been considerable.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a matter of some importance to the Senate, if the only question is in regard to the expenditure of $600 to print the report, to know how much has already been expended in its preparation.

Mr. ANTHONY. What has been expended in the preparation was not at the Government Printing Office. The engravings were done from the general appropriation—the appropriation for the survey.

Mr. SCOTT. As bearing on the question which the Senator from Kansas asks, I have turned to the statutes and find that in the appropriation bill of last year we appropriated $75,000 for the purpose of having the geological explorations made by Professor Hayden, and in the previous year we appropriated $75,000 more. I do not know whether this report on the Cretaceous Flora of the West is embraced in the report of last year or of the previous year; but it strikes me the practical question before the Senate now is, will we bury the information which we have obtained at a cost of $75,000, or will we spend $600 more for the purpose of making it public; and that, it seems to me, is bringing us to a very practical question which lies a little back of this appropriation of $600. It is this: not simply shall we print the results of these explorations; but shall we hereafter make appropriations for having these explorations made?

We now have at least three publications of this character, and are annually making appropriations for the purpose of obtaining the material to make them. Professor Hayden's explorations, Major Powell's explorations, and the annual reports of Professor Raymond upon the mineralogical resources of the West. In that point of view I think that the discussions which come up here occasionally on the reports of the Committee on Printing are directing attention to a very important question; and that is, how many of the publications which the Government has heretofore made are worth printing, and for how many of them would the public pay if they could get them at their own expense? These three publications, I confess, are among those which have elicited the largest demand from the public. I know that I have had several requisitions made upon me for the very publication which the Senator from Rhode Island now proposes to print—this report on the Cretaceous Flora of the West. I know of no publications that are more meritorious than these three; and yet I am free to say that until Congress shall devise some general mode of distribution, or take the ground emphatically that hereafter there shall be no distribution of these documents, I am unwilling to incur much further expense in printing them.

I shall vote, however, for this resolution on the ground that Congress has already given its sanction to the collection and preparation of this information at an expense of $150,000, and it would certainly be very bad economy to bury information obtained at that cost for the lack of an appropriation of $600.

Mr. HOWE. With reference to the suggestion made just now by the Senator from Ohio touching the publication of Wilkes's exploring expedition, I really do not know how the fact is in reference to the assignment of any of the material of that work to Mr. Wilkes or to anybody else.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am informed by the former chairman of the Committee on the Library that final action resulted in not transferring it to him, but in authorizing the publication of three volumes of that information.

Mr. HOWE. I was about to say that we did make an appropriation of $9,000 to complete the publication of three volumes, partly executed at the time the appropriation was made, and the committee has been trying very assiduously to get that work done. Part of it is done. One volume is published and another one is ready for the binder, if it is not in the hands of the binder.

I partake of the grief avowed here by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] that we have not been able as yet to agree to that proposition of his to facilitate the distribution of these documents. I have once or twice said, and I want to say it once more this morning—how many times hereafter I will not now affirm—that I believe if we would publish these documents, the valuable ones, and offer them to the public at the cost of publication and of postage, they would take them in very large numbers, and they would be taken by a class of our constituents who would be much more profited than all those have been to whom we have been in the habit of sending them.

I have experimented a little on this theory myself, and the experiment has gone a great way to convince me that the theory I embraced at the outset was correct. We publish a larger number of the Agricultural Report than of any other. It is long since every copy belonging to me for distribution was sent out, and I begged and borrowed as long as I could, and all the resources I could draw upon are exhausted. Several other documents have also been exhausted. And yet I have made no sort of endeavor to advise the people of Wisconsin at large that they could have these things. Those have called for them who had indirectly got the information that they might have them in that way.

However, I do not think we need take up time to discuss this whole subject this morning. This is a very simple matter. It involves the expense of about $600 to lay before the public, or to bring within reach of a portion of the public, a work in which, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has said, we have invested $150,000. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that as a principle the publishing of books and giving them to the heads of your Departments here to distribute is all wrong. I agree with him that that is a worse system of distribution than you had heretofore, that such an officer will not make so good a distribution of the books as we would, and we did not make a very good distributon. Besides that, his distribution will be precisely as expensive as ours, for no matter whether we frank a document or he pays postage on it, the financial and economical results to the Government are precisely the same. But this is a small matter. The work is all ready for publication, and I think we had better complete it; and then if we want to order an edition hereafter that will be commensurate with the demands of the public, it will be in a shape that we can command it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will propose an amendment to this resolution to bring it within the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I think that proposition will solve the whole problem of the distribution of documents in time, and upon an equitable and fair scale.

I had occasion to advert to this subject a few days ago, when I stated my own convictions that the practice of distributing documents is unequal and unjust, in any sense I can look at it, to the American people. It is necessarily partial in its application, and unjust for that particular reason. And finally, so far as the conveyance of information is concerned, it must always be inadequate; and as the sources of information are so ample in this country, there is no necessity devolving on the Government of the United States to make these expenditures.

Now, the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota is, that whatever documents the Government has or thinks it wise to publish (and clearly, as in this case, where it explores it should publish the results) should be accessible to everybody—scientific institutions, colleges, libraries, or persons desiring them—upon application and payment of the simple cost of production. Now, to bring this within that principle, I propose the following amendment to the resolution, to come in at the end:

Provided, That such report shall not be distributed at the public expense, and only upon application therefor and upon payment of the cost of printing the same.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to suggest to my friend from Maine that it would be very much better for us to pass a general law of that kind instead of tacking it on to a special little measure like this. This is not extensive enough to give a fair trial to the system. If you apply that rule, for instance, to the great Agricultural Report, where there are a large number of persons wanting the document and a large number of copies printed, it might perhaps be fair as an experiment; but here, where only a few hundred copies are printed and are useful principally to the makers of school-books or to literary institutions, there is not a sufficient popular demand to try the experiment. I would suggest to my friend that it is much better not to add his proposition to this resolution, which is too small to carry so heavy a weight, but to bring it forward at some other time as a system, and I certainly will vote with him on that occasion; but, it seems to me, here it is too heavy a load.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If there was no urgency about this matter it might lie over until the proposition already before the committee is reported upon. But, clearly, this involves a principle; I hardly think it is an experiment. It seems to me that in a practical way, if we have it in our power, we ought to establish precisely the ground on which we will publish these things. If they are for the Government, and we do not intend them for popular distribution, we should put them within reach, at whatever be the cost to the Government, of any person who chooses to apply for them. But I am not particular about it. I submit the proposition to the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not precisely like this amendment, but I will accept almost anything to get rid of the matter. The Senator from Maine must understand that there are three distributions in this resolution; one is by the Secretary of the Interior, to which his amendment might apply, but there is also a distribution of a portion by the Smithsonian Institution, and a portion go to the Bureau of which Mr. Hayden is agent.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On what supposed policy is it that that distribution indicated is a wise one? If it is to be printed at the cost of the Treasury, why should the distribution be assigned to these three parties?

Mr. ANTHONY. To the Smithsonian Institution, because that institution has relations with all the scientific people of the world, and I suppose that there is no agency which can place a scientific work better than the Smithsonian Institution. To the Secretary of the Interior, because he has relations with all that region of country which is described in this work and the information in which is of especial value to the people there. To the Bureau itself, because they also have relations with scientific men. They have received assistance from a great many men to whom some acknowledgment is due.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I can understand that the argument may be worth something so far as the Smithsonian Institution is concerned, because that is constantly in relations with all scientific bodies of the world and may desire to reciprocate courtesies.

Mr. ANTHONY. They receive immense exchanges.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But more than a third of the whole number goes to that institution.

Mr. ANTHONY. One thousand to the Smithsonian Institution, one thousand to the Interior Department, and five hundred to the Bureau itself; which is but a fair distribution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What Bureau?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Bureau of which Professor Hayden is the agent—the man who made the exploration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. To the explorer himself?

Mr. ANTHONY. To the explorer and those associated with him.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think this on the whole illustrates the theory of the popular distribution of documents. The more it is talked of, the more we must be satisfied with the inadequacy of the policy we are now pursuing of the publication of expensive books to be distributed in this way.

Mr. WINDOM. I am unwilling that this question should pass from the Senate without expressing my regret also, in concurrence with my colleague and the Senator from Wisconsin, that no means have been adopted for the distribution of these documents. It seems to me the proposition suggested by my colleague would obviate this trouble. We go to great expense in procuring this information, and the people are entitled to it. I think there are certain questions, certain subjects that Congress ought to furnish some information about; but I believe it is fair that those who receive that information should pay what it costs. I can see no objection on any ground to this plan of distribution, and it seems to me it would relieve us from this trouble.

It is high time that the question was settled in one way or the other. Almost every morning when a proposition comes up to publish any little document this discussion arises. Some general bill which shall provide for the distribution of documents without expense to the Government, it seems to me, cannot be objected to by any one. I earnestly hope the committee having this matter in charge will present some such proposition to us that we may act upon it and settle this question. For my own part I am in favor of furnishing to the people information on these subjects. I believe it is of great value to the country. I believe they are entitled to it at our hands. I believe they give us no credit for economy in refusing to furnish them information as to what we are doing. I think we are entitled to no credit for it; but, on the other hand, so far as I have information from the public they disapprove of this policy. Certainly we can compromise on the proposition of my colleague and allow them to have these documents by paying what they cost. I should hope that when the committee bring in their proposition they will allow the people to receive these documents free of postage. The postage that is paid on them is no saving to the Government. It costs us nothing to carry them. The cost of the transportation of the mails is as great now as it was before the repeal of the franking privilege, if not greater; so I do not see that anybody gains by it, and hence I would be very glad if they could be distributed free; but certainly they ought to be so published that those who want to buy them may get them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to ask my friend from Minnesota nearest to me [Mr. WINDOM] what his theory is about carrying the mail? He says it costs us nothing to carry a public document through the mail. Does he really think that is so?

Mr. WINDOM. I can only repeat what I said at the last session, that we pay more for the transmission of the mails since the repeal of the franking privilege than we did before, and I am perfectly confident that the receipts of the Post-Office Department do not cover the expenses of the repeal of the franking privilege.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That may be.

Mr. WINDOM. So I say it costs nothing.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But that is not answering my question. Certainly this service is likely to cost us for the next fiscal year $37,000,000. Now, do we not deceive ourselves when we say that what we carry in the mails costs nothing? Everybody who has examined that question knows that there is no transportation in this country that begins to compare with it in expensiveness. It is four times, more than four times, greater than any other expressage in the country. So we may not console ourselves with the idea that when we load them down by tons and hundreds of tons and thousands of tons it costs us nothing. The bulk has very much to do with it. I believe there is something like fifty-eight tons of mail matter passing through the post-office at New York in a single day. This contributes very largely, of course, to the expense, as only a very small proportion of that is letter matter.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to make a statement in answer to the Senator's suggestion. Before the enactment of the law of last spring, if I remember the provisions of the law then in existence, we paid for the transportation of our mails so much per mile on the railways. We then provided that the mails should be weighed; and I believe I may be incorrect in the statement I made, as broadly as I made it a while ago, that under existing laws it costs nothing. Perhaps it does add something to the cost; but when we changed the law last spring, after the repeal of the franking privilege, we provided for the weighing of the mails and paying in accordance with weight; that is, a sliding scale varying in proportion to weight. Perhaps under existing laws there may be some difference; but what I meant to say was that under this great postal reform which we effected at the last session of Congress it costs more to-day to transport the mails than before we inaugurated that reform. It is a more expensive system than when the people received public documents free; and the very railroads that to-day are complaining most, the large roads that carry the heaviest mails, are those on which the mails are weighed, and those very roads are threatening to-day, and I believe some of them have already given notice, or if not they will very soon, to the Postmaster-General that if their compensation is not largely increased over what it now is they will cease to carry the mails as they are now carrying them. We added $500,000 last spring to these large companies for carrying the mails immediately after the repeal of the franking privilege. It is utterly impossible for me to discover any great economy that we have achieved by that wonderful feat of reform.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the statement made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] is calculated to produce a wrong impression, certainly elsewhere, if not here. He said we pay nothing for carrying these documents in the mails, and then he has given his explanation why we pay nothing for carrying these documents in the mails. He states that we pay more for carrying the mails now than we did before the franking privilege was abolished. I suppose that is true. He says that the railroad officers upon the large routes are now at our doors asking for an increase of compensation. I know that that is so. But I know also that we are paying to-day a compensation upon the weight carried by those roads; and if we were to deduct from the compensation now paid them the weight which is made up of these documents, we should pay them just so much less as that weight would amount to, and if we shall pay them any further sum and continue to send the documents through the mails, paying for the mails carried by weight, we shall be obliged to augment that sum by this additional weight. So the Senator is entirely mistaken when he says we do not pay. We pay as clearly and as distinctly as though we put stamps upon them.

Mr. WINDOM. I think my explanation covered that ground. Perhaps I should have said that we saved nothing by that act.

Mr. HAMLIN. We save nothing; but we shall actually have to pay more to the contractors by adding to the weight. Grant that we do pay more than we paid before; but we pay more in consequence of this very service, that is the carrying of documents and paying by weight for carrying them. There cannot be any doubt about it.

Mr. WINDOM. That is under existing laws.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now I want to say one word in relation to this work. I desire to co-operate with my colleague and every other Senator here to stop the publication of documents to be distributed through the mail by us. When I say that, I exclude from it, for what I think very good reasons, this one document; and I suppose everybody finds one exception to the rules that he may lay down for his guidance. But my exception is because the work had been done before the system of free transportation was abolished. The great part of the work was done in the field. It is one of the few valuable works that we do publish. And the great amount of the expense having been incurred, and this being, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says, cleaning up the thing, I think we had better end what we began and initiate no new thing.

I would, however, prefer that this resolution should lie on the table until we can devise some scheme, and mine would be that we should print and publish to the world just what the cost of each document is and what the postage will be upon it, and have them for all who choose to apply and pay for them, because there are some things that ought to be circulated, and I would let those who want them pay both for the book and for the transportation. Why may not this resolution lie for a short time until some such thing can be effected? Will that be objectionable to my friend from Rhode Island?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will not be objectionable to me. But I was going to say, as I almost always do when the Senator from Maine makes a speech, that he has hit the nail precisely on the head, and said all that could be said in the fewest possible words; but I think he rather departed from his usual felicity of expression when he desired, after having brought this matter completely to the point where it ought to stand, to let the resolution lie on the table. I think this work having been prepared and having been so far published under the old system when we had free transportation, and the cost now being only $600 and the edition very small, we had better wipe this out, clean the thing up, and begin anew on the new publications.

Mr. HAMLIN. I concur with the Senator, and if driven to my vote I shall vote with him; but still I would prefer, and I am quite sure there are other Senators who would strengthen us in our votes if the resolution could lie until the thing can be settled as to how the work shall be distributed. That is the only point.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will agree to that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let the resolution lie on the table informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Jane Loonie, widow of James A. Loonie, late of the Eighty-eighth New York Volunteers, praying for a modification of the pension law so as to allow her to contract and pay such fees as she thinks best, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1145) granting a pension to Martin Laffin, to report it favorably. There is a House report accompanying it, and I do not ask that it be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of J. B. Chandler, praying compensation for the transportation of the United States mails between certain points in Mississippi in 1866, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John Bte. Hortiz, praying that he be allowed a pension for services in the war of 1812, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2216) granting a pension to Cornelia A. Washburn, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 119) for the better security of property in patterns for metal castings, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Let that bill go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. OGLESBY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 754) to promote commerce among the States and to cheapen transportation of persons and property between the Atlantic sea-board and the Western States and Territories; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 755) to relieve James Jackson, of Georgia, of political disabilities; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALCORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 756) to revive, amend, and extend so much of the act of August 11, 1856, as relates to the railroad from Brandon, in the State of Mississippi, to the Gulf of Mexico, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to recommit Senate bill No. 542, for the relief of Butler, Miller & Co., to the Committee on Claims, in order that the memorialists may lay further testimony before that committee. I suppose there will be no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 559) to enable the Central Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company to submit its claims against the United States under existing laws to the decision of the Supreme Court be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3139) for the relief of the owners of the steam ferry-boat A. Burton.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3093) to relieve David A. Telfair from political disability.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1573) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location;

A bill (H. R. No. 1935) for the relief of William J. Scott, late aide-de-camp on the staff of General Spear; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2868) to render available an unexpended balance of appropriation for collection and payment of bounty, &c., for colored soldiers and sailors.

G. A. GOODALE.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of the correspondence in the cases of James Barclay against Lieutenant G. A. Goodale, United States Army, late in command of Fort Klamath, Oregon, for false imprisonment, and the action of T. M. Rouse against same, and how much has been paid and what is still unpaid of the expenses of Lieutenant Goodale.

SUPPLEMENTARY CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the second section.

Mr. ALCORN. While that amendment is pending and before the vote is taken, is an amendment to the first section in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment moved by the Senator from Ohio is an amendment to an amendment and must be first disposed of, after which it will be in order to offer a further amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. Perhaps if the Senator will indicate his amendment, I may be willing to withdraw mine to let him offer his.

Mr. ALCORN. I have no objection to indicating my amendment. It is for the purpose of making the bill precisely what it purports to be; it is for the purpose of vindicating the principle that this bill attempts to set out.

Mr. THURMAN. Please state just what it is.

Mr. ALCORN. It is to amend section 1, line 9, after the word "taxation," by inserting "or in whole or in part by endowment of lands or money heretofore made or which may hereafter be made by the United States Government or a State government." The bill reads now in the first section, commencing at line 7, page 4: "And also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported in whole or in part by general taxation." I propose there to insert "or in whole or in part by endowment of lands or money heretofore made or which may hereafter be made by the United States Government or a State government."

Mr. THURMAN. I decline to withdraw my amendment for that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALCORN. I will offer my proposition at the proper time.

Mr. NORWOOD addressed the Senate. Having spoken for over two hours, he said:

Mr. President, I feel unable to go on further to-day, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate to allow me to finish my remarks, the residue being a constitutional argument on the questions involved, to-morrow if I am able to do so.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move that we lay aside this bill for the present and take up the Calendar.

[Mr. NORWOOD's speech in full will be found in the Appendix.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Let it be passed over informally, but not postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey proposes that the pending bill be laid aside informally to proceed with the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

GREENWOOD LEFLORE.

Mr. ALCORN. I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I move a reconsideration of a vote, as the time may elapse without my having the opportunity. It is upon the vote of the Senate concurring in the report of the Committee on Claims made in the case of John D. Leflore and James C. Harris, executors of the last will and testament of Greenwood Leflore, deceased. I was not present when the vote was taken, and I move to reconsider so that I may be heard upon the report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed the bill was put on the Calendar with the adverse report. It was not postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ALCORN. Very well.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3139) for the relief of the owners of the steam ferry-boat A. Burton was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SIOUX INDIAN TREATY.

The bill (S. No. 457) to abrogate and declare void a certain portion of the treaty with the Sioux Indians, concluded April 29, 1868, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that by the sixteenth article of a treaty between the United States and different tribes of Sioux Indians, concluded April 29, 1868, ratified February 16, 1869, and proclaimed February 24, 1869, it is stipulated that the country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains shall be held and considered to be unceded Indian territory, and that no white person or persons shall be permitted to settle upon or occupy any portion of the same, or without the consent of the Indians first had and obtained to pass through the same; that certain questions have arisen affecting the right of citizens of the State of Nebraska to settle upon, reside in, or travel over a certain portion of that State, those questions being based upon a possible construction of the sixteenth article; that this construction is repudiated by the commissioners on the part of the United States who framed the treaty, as being contrary to its meaning and intent, and would be a violation of the rights of a sovereign State; and that it is desirable for the preservation of peace, and for the common good of both white men and Indians, that all uncertainty and doubt as to the proper construction of this article should be forever removed.

The bill therefore declares that so much of the true intent and meaning of the treaty as might, by any such construction, allow the Sioux Indians to reside in or roam and hunt over any portion of the State of Nebraska, or as might exclude white men from traveling over or settling upon any portion of that State, be abrogated and void.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was to strike out in line 3 the words "so much of" and insert "the true intent and meaning of;" so as to read:

That the true intent and meaning of said treaty of April 29, 1868.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the words "1868," in line 4, to strike out the words:

As might, by any such construction, allow said Sioux Indians to reside in or roam and hunt over any portion of the State of Nebraska, or as might exclude white men from traveling over or settling upon any portion of said State, is hereby declared abrogated and void.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Is declared to be that white men are not excluded thereby from traveling over or settling upon any portion of said State of Nebraska, anything in said treaty to the contrary notwithstanding.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to oppose the passage of this bill. I would like, however, to call the attention of my friend, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] to this bill, and to ask him if he will please remember some remarks which he made not long ago when my colleague presented a petition of a very large number of people of the State of California praying for a modification of certain features of the treaty with the Empire of China by which the Pacific coast might be relieved from the influx of a class which they have found by experience to be undesirable residents in that portion of the country. If I remember correctly, the Senator objected to any action being taken on the adoption of the resolution at that time offered by my colleague, even I believe to the reference, on the ground that the Congress of the United States had no power to interfere with a treaty existing with another power. Here is a treaty with the Sioux Indians. If it is a treaty it is a treaty as much as the one with China. This treaty was ratified by the Senate; it was negotiated by the Executive; it has all the forms of a treaty.

I contended the other day in reply to the Senator from Indiana who is not now in his seat [Mr. MORTON] that it is a solecism to call these agreements treaties, and perhaps that might be the reply the Senator from Maine would make to my observations now. I think there is some aptness in such a reply if it is made, but I at any rate call his attention to the difficulty we are now encountering, a difficulty which is not helped out by past legislation or by former decisions of the United States Supreme Court, because they have proceeded upon an entirely different theory, and that is that we were treating with independent powers; that these treaties had all the constituents, all the requisites of treaties with foreign powers; that so far as they affected the title of property or privileges granted to the United States or granted by the United States they stood upon the same basis as foreign treaties. I myself think, however, that that was a doctrine which grew out of the exigencies of the early days of the Republic, and that this doctrine was announced improvidently by the Supreme Court.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand the Senator to say that the Supreme Court has held that Indian treaties cannot be modified by act of Congress?

Mr. SARGENT. I have not said that. I have not said that the Supreme Court have decided that any treaty may not be modified by Congress. I believe there is power on the part of Congress to direct the Executive to disregard a treaty, of course the Government taking the responsibility.

Mr. CONKLING. That is quite another question. I simply rise to call the Senator's attention to the fact that speaking of Indian treaties the Supreme Court has decided that they were within the power of Congress as to their modification, even though that power was carried to the extent of annulling them absolutely.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt of that power. I have no doubt that that is consistent with the decisions of the Supreme Court. I have no doubt of that power so far as relates to treaties with foreign powers; and I should like to ask the Senator from New York if he thinks the Supreme Court of the United States has put it upon the ground that there is any difference in their validity or requisites between these treaties and treaties made with foreign powers?

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Supreme Court has always, but especially in the case of Boudinot—which was the case of an Indian treaty—held that Congress had power, as illustrated in that instance under the revenue laws, to make provisions which should apply to the Indian tribe in question, a treaty to the contrary notwithstanding. What the Supreme Court might hold as to the power of Congress alone or of all the branches of this Government alone to change or annul a treaty made with a foreign power, is a question differing certainly from this.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the Senator will find by reference to all the decisions of the Supreme Court on the point, that they started on, and have adhered constantly to, the idea that Indian treaties were treaties not only in name but in all the essential requisites of a treaty, that they are the same in every particular as treaties with foreign powers. I know, as the Senator says, in the case of Boudinot they decided that there was power on the part of Congress to annul or modify an Indian treaty. I have no doubt that their reasoning would lead them also to hold that Congress possesses power over the whole subject. I therefore say that I think my colleague the other day was perfectly right when in introducing his petition and resolutions he asked that they be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations in order that Congress (which includes the Executive in the passage of laws) might determine what action could be taken to relieve the Pacific States from a growing nuisance.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am more concerned to know whether the proposition contained in this bill is a just one. I should like to hear from the Senator from Iowa who reported it what is to be the effect of it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I can state in a very few words; but I see that the Senator from Nebraska is on the floor and I will give way to him, as he understands the circumstances.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The object of this bill is not to change a valid and binding treaty on either side, but simply to correct a verbal inaccuracy which allows a construction of the treaty which was not intended either by the Indians on their part or by the commissioners on the part of the United States—a possible construction that will compel the removal from nearly half of Nebraska of all the white settlers there and the exclusion of white settlers from that portion of the State. There is a letter from General Sherman and from Governor Sandford, who were the commissioners who negotiated the treaty, and also a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at the desk, with the bill, which will explain the whole thing, and they can be read if Senators desire to hear them.

Mr. HAMLIN. I should like to ask the Senator one question, whether the tribe are aware of this modification and agree to it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The tribe are aware of this, and they have never placed any such construction on the treaty themselves; but certain men there, for the purpose of making trouble with the Indians, have raised the question; and in order to settle that question once for all, this bill was introduced and has been acted on by the Judiciary Committee and reported with amendments.

Mr. HAMLIN. This bill as amended puts in the treaty the construction to which they agree?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think there is no question about this. It was examined by our committee very carefully. I understand there is no such pretense on the part of the Indians, but only on the part of some persons who are disposed to make trouble there. This is a mere explanation of an existing treaty.

The bill was passed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest that the title of the bill be amended. As it is now, the title is "to abrogate and declare void a certain portion of the treaty with the Sioux Indians, concluded April 29, 1868." Let it be "to declare the true intent and meaning of a certain portion of the treaty with the Sioux Indians, concluded April 29, 1868."

The title was so amended.

WILLIAM J. PATTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was out when the Calendar was resumed. Was the bill (S. No. 459) for the relief of William J. Patton passed over? I understood it was the unfinished business from yesterday morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was laid aside yesterday morning, passed on the Calendar.

Mr. CLAYTON. I did not understand it so. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether he understood that the bill for the relief of William J. Patton was passed over yesterday?

Mr. WRIGHT. My recollection is that the report was being read and was concluded just as the morning hour closed, when the Senator from New Jersey rose and called up the civil-rights bill, and it was left in that condition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] objected to that bill. He objected peremptorily, and refused to withdraw his objection after the report had been read, and so the bill was passed over.

Mr. CLAYTON. He withdrew his objection to hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asked the Senator if he withdrew his objection. The Senator replied that he was willing to hear the report read. The Chair thereupon asked if there was objection to the reading of the report; there was none; and he ordered it to be read, after which the Senator from Vermont declined to withdraw his objection, and the bill was laid aside. The next bill on the Calendar will be read.

JAMES W. GLOVER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 259) for the relief of James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, in the State of New York; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, New York, in his account as such postmaster, with the sum of $498.39, being the value of postage-stamps stolen from the safe of the post-office by burglars on the night of the 16th of April, 1873, without the fault or negligence of Glover.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is there a report in that case? If there is, I think it had better be read. These cases are becoming very frequent indeed.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, on the 17th of March:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred bill H. R. 259, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

It appears from accompanying affidavits of James W. Glover, postmaster, Whitman R. Mowry, assistant postmaster, and Elihu Cooley, an old resident of Oxford, New York, that on the night of April 16, 1873, the post-office at Oxford was broken open by burglars, and that the iron safe in said office had been forced open by means of powder, bar, drills, wedges, and other burglar tools, and that all the money, postage-stamps, and other valuables therein had been carried away. And it further appears from the affidavits of said Glover and Mowry that it had been their custom to keep all the money, postage-stamps, and other valuables belonging to said office locked up in said safe during both day and night, except a small amount which, for convenience, was kept in drawers during the day. And it further appears that on the night of the 16th day of April, 1873, all the money and postage-stamps belonging to said office had been placed in said safe and locked up, except perhaps the amount of less than fifty cents, which might have been left in the drawers. It further appears from the affidavit of said Glover, that the amount of postage-stamps placed in said safe and locked up on the night of the 16th of April, 1873, was about $498.39, and money belonging to said post-office to the amount of $30.05; all of which, together with money and valuables belonging to said Glover, Mowry, and others, was stolen and carried away, and no part thereof has been recovered.

And it further appears from a copy of a letter addressed to the Postmaster-General, on June 16, 1873, by E. H. Prindle, late Member of Congress, and a petition, also addressed to the Postmaster-General, on June 20, 1873, and signed by fifteen of the leading citizens of Oxford, that the robbery was in nowise the result of negligence on the part of the said Glover or his subordinates.

It also appears from copies of letters inclosed in a letter of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General of February 10, 1874, that said Glover wrote to the Department, notifying them of the robbery, on the 17th of April, 1873. The Third Assistant Postmaster-General, in the same letter, estimates the probable amount of stamps in the Oxford post-office April 16, 1873, at $527.25, which differs but slightly from the amount claimed by said Glover, who estimates, from his accounts, postage-stamps on hand, $498.39; cash belonging to office, $30.05; total, $528.44.

In view of the facts as submitted, your committee recommend the passage of the bill for relief for the amount of stamps so stolen.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN COOLEY AND JAMES W. BOSWELL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 595) for the relief of Benjamin Cooley and James W. Boswell; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Postmaster-General is empowered by the bill to examine, adjust, and settle the claims of Benjamin Cooley and James W. Boswell for carrying the mails from Washington, District of Columbia, to Poolesville, Maryland, being routes numbered 3293 and 3304, from July 1, 1860, to June 30, 1864, and to award them such compensation for carrying the increased bulk of mail matter as he may deem just and proper, not exceeding the sum of $1,200 to either of the contractors.

Mr. HOWE. Is there a report accompanying that bill? If there is, I wish to hear it.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, on the 17th of March:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin Cooley and James W. Boswell, respectfully submit the following report:

It appears that Benjamin Cooley was the contractor to carry the mails of the United States on post-route No. 3293, from Washington City, District of Columbia, to Rockville, Maryland, a distance of sixteen miles, from July 1, 1860, to June 30, 1864.

Also, that James W. Boswell was the contractor for carrying the mails of the United States during the same time on post-route No. 3304, from Rockville to Poolesville, in said State, also a distance of sixteen miles, so that the two routes Nos. 3293 and 3304 make a continuous line of thirty-two miles from Washington to Poolesville.

A communication from the Hon. George W. McLellan, Second Assistant Postmaster-General, shows that the contract on route 3293 was for six trips per week at $300 per annum, and on route 3304 three trips per week for the same compensation. At the time the contract was made the mail was very light, averaging from thirty to fifty pounds per trip, and judging from the previous amount of mail matter going over said routes there was no reason to anticipate any large increase in the mail; but about the 1st of July, 1861, a large force of United States troops was quartered around Poolesville and the mail matter increased to some eight or nine hundred pounds per trip, requiring the contractors to use a two-horse wagon for a large portion of the time, instead of carrying the mail on horseback, as it had theretofore been done. By the terms of the contract they were required to carry all the mail matter on the routes, and no mode of conveyance was specified. This sudden increase could not have been anticipated nor considered when the contracts were made.

The evidence shows that, notwithstanding the fact that both these contractors sustained heavy losses by carrying the mails, they both faithfully fulfilled their obligations to the expiration of their contract terms.

One of the contractors petitioned the Postmaster-General, in February, 1862, for additional pay, on account of this unexpected increase of mail matter, which could not be granted, as the law prohibits the allowance of additional compensation to contractors, except when additional trips or extension of routes had, subsequently to date of contract, been ordered, and in such cases only pro rata pay could be allowed.

Your committee, in view of the circumstances and service rendered, report in favor of the prayer of the petitioners and submit a bill therefor, the passage of which they recommend.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. W. READ.

The bill (S. No. 596) for the relief of H. W. Read was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to H. W. Read $1,000, in full discharge for all services rendered to the United States in the transportation and the superintendence of the same of any money from Saint Louis, Missouri, to Santa Fé, in New Mexico, during the year 1863.

Mr. FENTON. I ask for the reading of the report, if there is one, in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MERRIMON on the 17th of March:

The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and accompanying papers of H. W. Read, praying compensation for superintending the transportation of money belonging to the United States from Saint Louis to Santa Fé, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

It appears that petitioner was charged by the Treasurer of the United States with the custody of $200,000 currency at Saint Louis, Missouri, some time during the year 1863, and directed to superintend the transportation of the same to the United States depository at Santa Fé, in New Mexico; it appears that such service was faithfully performed; that it was attended with some danger, and required extraordinary vigilance and care. It further appears that the petitioner has not been paid for such service; that he had been a clerk in the Treasury Department before he undertook the same; that he resigned such clerkship with a view to go to the West as postmaster at Tucson; that he applied to the Treasury Department for compensation, and was advised that he must apply to Congress for relief.

Upon consideration the committee are of opinion that some compensation should be allowed to the petitioner, and fix the same at the sum of $1,000; and they report the accompanying bill, and recommend that the same be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM A. GRIFFIN.

The bill (S. No. 597) for the relief of William A. Griffin was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to William A. Griffin, late superintendent of the national cemetery at Andersonville, Georgia, of $2,325, in full discharge for all claims and demands whatsoever for labor done and damages sustained by him in and about that cemetery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM HAFFORDS.

The bill (H. R. No. 497) granting a pension to William Haffords, of South Yarmouth, Massachusetts, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Haffords, of South Yarmouth, Massachusetts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANE LA FONT.

The bill (H. R. No. 816) granting a pension to Jane La Font, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane La Font, dependent mother of Louis La Font, late a private of Company C, Second Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, but detailed to Battery D, First Rhode Island Light Artillery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISAAC M. GRANT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1951) granting a pension to Isaac M. Grant; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isaac M. Grant, late of Company K, Thirty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 528) to protect the navigable waters of the United States from injury and obstruction.

The bill was read.

Mr. FENTON. I want to look at that bill, and, if there is no objection from any quarter, I ask that it be passed over informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state to the Senator from New York that this bill is merely to prevent the filling up of harbors by throwing over ballast and coal-ashes from steamers and ships. It was unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FENTON. I entirely concur with the object to be attained by the bill, but the manner of doing it is what I want to examine, and particularly the mode of compensation to customs officers and informers here provided for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

VESSELS' PASSENGER-LISTS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1364) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It repeals the thirteenth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and requires hereafter each and every collector of customs to whom shall be delivered the manifests or lists of passengers prescribed by the twelfth section of that act to make returns from such manifests or lists of passengers to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in such manner as shall be prescribed by that officer, under whose direction statements of the same shall be prepared and published.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OLIVE S. BREED.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 814) granting a pension to Olive S. Breed; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary of the Interior is, by the bill, directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Olive S. Breed, widow of J. Henry Breed, deceased, who was a private in Company K, Fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS J. M'INTIRE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1396) granting a pension to Thomas J. McIntire, of Rowan County, Kentucky; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas J. McIntire, late a private of Lieutenant John P. Beach's company, (forty-fifth,) Second Battery of Veteran Reserve Corps.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUSAN R. MOORE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 503) for the relief of Susan R. Moore, the relative and legatee of Phœbe Schofield, a pensioner; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It extends the benefits of the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act to amend an act granting a pension to Phœbe Schofield, widow of Lewis Schofield," to Susan R. Moore, the relative and legatee of Phœbe Schofield, who died previous to the passage of the act, so that Susan R. Moore shall be entitled to receive the pension which would have accrued to Phoebe Schofield had she been alive when the act passed; but the pension is only to be calculated to the day of the death of Phœbe Schofield.

Mr. PRATT. I move to amend the bill in its title and in the body by substituting "Sofield" instead of "Schofield."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY PAY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LOGAN. If there is no objection, I should like to call up the bill (S. No. 320) to increase the Pay Department of the Army, which was passed over the other day with the understanding that it should not lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. PRATT. I appeal to my friend from Illinois to postpone that motion for five minutes until we dispose of some pension cases which we have just reached. We shall get through with them in about five minutes.

Mr. LOGAN. I will agree to anything; but we have hardly had any bills from my committee acted on at this session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 320, to increase the Pay Department of the Army. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CONKLING. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; which establishes the number of paymasters at fifty instead of sixty, as was designated in the eighteenth section of the act of July 28, 1866.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole; the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the number of paymasters is hereby established at fifty, instead of sixty, as was designated in the eighteenth section of the act of July 28, 1866; said paymasters to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors of cavalry.

SEC. 2. That so much of said eighteenth section as relates to the persons from whom said paymasters shall be selected be, and is hereby, repealed.

Mr. WEST. There was an amendment offered to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has been reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill fixing the number of paymasters in the Army of the United States."

Mr. WEST. I offered an amendment to that bill, and the bill has been passed under a misapprehension. I asked whether the amendment I offered was considered, and I was informed from the desk that it was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote by which the bill was passed will be reconsidered.

Mr. SPENCER. I object. The bill has passed.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Louisiana offered his amendment to the Army appropriation bill when it was under discussion, and it was not adopted. The Senator, I think, is mistaken as to his having offered any amendment to this bill. He offered an amendment to the appropriation bill providing that paymasters might be detailed from the line, but it was voted down.

Mr. CONKLING. After hearing the Senator in front of me [Mr. SPENCER] object to reconsidering this vote, I want to try my hand at whatever the rules of the Senate may permit me to do to reinstate the bill so that the Senator from Louisiana may have the opportunity to offer his amendment. I think it will hardly do, when a bill has been passed without a division, one member of the Senate being under a misapprehension and having been misanswered from the desk of the Secretary as he was, although inadvertently of course, to say that we will not go back and reinstate the measure so that he can be heard. I move, therefore, to reconsider the vote by which this bill was passed.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no necessity for any attempt of this kind. There is no disposition on my part to have anything done that the Senate does not fully understand. If any Senators think there is anything that is not understood by the Senate, I am willing that the bill should be reconsidered to give an opportunity to have amendments offered. I only said that the Senator from Louisiana was mistaken as to his amendment. He offered it to an appropriation bill and not to this bill, which is the fact, and it was discussed and voted down. Now I am willing that the vote shall be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reconsideration?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say that my friend from Illinois borrows, as he sometimes does, trouble by replying as he did to my remark. He made no objection to this reconsideration. The Senator from Alabama objected to it, and I referred to his objection, not to anything said by the Senator from Illinois. Therefore certainly it was not necessary for him to take offense at any observation that I made. I meant no offense to the other Senator, but it was to him and to him alone that I alluded, because he and he alone made the objection.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I am very much astonished. I certainly said nothing showing that I was offended, or that any person had attempted to offend me. I said nothing of the kind, nor did I intend anything of the kind, nor did I allude to anything that the Senator from New York had said. I alluded to the condition of the bill and the misapprehension of the Senator from Louisiana. I do not see why it is necessary always to speak about offense. Nobody has given me any offense. I merely made the remark I did that no one in the Chamber should be deceived, that the bill might be reconsidered by consent. I am willing it shall, and that the Senator shall have full and ample opportunity of offering any amendment that he desires.

Mr. SPENCER. I objected to the reconsideration of this vote because I believed that everybody in the Senate fully understood it. The President of the United States and the Secretary of War have repeatedly recommended in several communications that the Pay Department of the Army should number fifty paymasters. They say there is a necessity for that number. We having once voted upon the question, I saw no occasion for reopening it.

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator be good enough to quote the recommendation of the Secretary of War and read it to us?

Mr. SPENCER. The letters are with the bill, or the chairman of the committee has them in his drawer. I think they are with the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of my friend, does he tell the Senate that since the reduction of the Army, since the legislation on that subject, the Secretary of War has recommended that the number of paymasters be fixed at fifty; that he has recommended it officially in writing, or verbally, or in any other way that the Senator feels at liberty to refer to?

Mr. SPENCER. I think the dates of those letters are since the passage of the appropriation bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator will find himself quite mistaken about that.

Mr. SPENCER. At all events I know that they desire that the number should be fixed at fifty. The question of whether Army officers should be detailed from one branch of the service to the Pay Department was discussed at length during the pendency of the Army appropriation bill, and that proposition was voted down by a vote of the Senate. That is a thing I should be very much opposed to under all circumstances.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. Let the vote be reconsidered if there is no objection, and then I will read the letter for the information of the Senate. I hope there will be no objection to the reconsideration.

Mr. SPENCER. I withdraw the objection I made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote ordering the engrossment and third reading of the bill will also be regarded as reconsidered. The question now is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, in which stage the bill is open to amendment.

Mr. WEST. The Senator from Illinois has scarcely stated the facts correctly with reference to the amendment that I offered to this bill. Undoubtedly he was under a misapprehension; but I made the proposition on the Army appropriation bill, and when it was ob jected to by the Senator I withdrew it, and I at that time gave notice that I would offer it to this bill whenever it came up. When this bill came up and was about being put upon its passage I asked whether that amendment was being acted upon, and I was, of course inadvertently, answered that it was. But as the bill is now before the Senate, and it is alleged that the Secretary of War in his report recommends an increase of the Pay Department of the Army prior to the curtailment of the Army of which the Senate is well advised, I would ask the attention of the Senate to page 11 of the Secretary's report, in which he called attention to the fact that the Paymaster-General recommends it, but he does not back up the recommendation even by a suggestion of his own. He says nothing about it. So without some other authority than that, unless there is something subsequent in the hands of the chairman of the committee, there is nothing in the report of the Secretary of War that warrants us in taking any such action.

I have already spoken to the Senate on this subject, and every one is, I think, familiar with it. The question is whether there is any necessity to increase the staff of the Army when you have reduced the rank and file. I do not think there is.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as I am personally concerned it is a matter of very little importance to me whether this bill passes or not. I am merely performing a duty that I think is proper to be performed in this Chamber.

I do not desire to detain the Senate by discussing this bill, but I want to state one fact. I do not know why there is such a desire to persistently oppose the increase of the Army against the recommendations of men who ought to know. Suppose we consider this proposition for a moment. You say you have decreased the rank and file of the Army; that is, you stop recruiting private soldiers for the Army. I ask any man who understands anything about military affairs to tell me what effect that has upon the Pay Department? That does not reduce the number of companies in the Army; it does not change a post in the Army; it does not change a command in the Army; and the same necessity exists for paymasters to pay the different posts, the different companies, the different regiments, the different batteries at the different forts, as did before you decreased the Army one man; it does not change the status one particle. If this necessity existed for paymasters prior to the reduction of the mere private soldiers of the Army it exists to-day, for that does not affect the Army at all so far as the Paymaster's Department is concerned.

Now I will send to the Secretary's desk a letter that I received, after the discussion in the Senate on this subject, from the Paymaster-General, sent to me through the Secretary of War with his letter.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PAYMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 24, 1874.

SIR: I send you the following communication, as promised by me verbally yesterday, and I will respectfully urge that it be forwarded to the chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate.

In the debates in the Senate on Friday, the 20th instant, (as also in a previous debate a month since,) it was alleged by several Senators that if the number of the rank and file of the Army is reduced five thousand no increase of the Pay Department is necessary. I wish respectfully to represent, through you, that the number of paymasters required would be precisely the same; for the number of remote posts could not be reduced, and thus the travel of the paymasters would remain the same. The geographical distribution determines the number needed, and not the number of troops.

I would therefore again earnestly urge the passage of a bill for such increase, for I have not now a number sufficient for the proper discharge of the duty. I have not a number sufficient for purposes of discipline. If a paymaster should be arrested, I do not know what could be done to supply his place. I hope next summer the War Department will be able to aid me in making certain changes to relieve officers who have been long at remote stations, and more officers are needed for that purpose.

I assented to the proposition to authorize the War Department to make details of officers as acting paymasters, but it would be only as a make-shift when, as now, the emergencies of the service should imperatively demand it. The measure I would most strenuously urge is that providing for the permanent basis of the Pay Department.

I would most respectfully request the honorable Secretary to represent to the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate the necessity and urgency of legislation on this subject.

As the next session is a short one, it is especially desirable that legislation should be accomplished at this long session, when there is more opportunity for deliberation and action.

The President, in his various messages, December, 1871, 1872, and 1873, has urged the propriety of such legislation. In his last message he is justly emphatic and strenuous as to the needed increase of this department. If Congress should adjourn without such action the interests of the service would suffer.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. ALVORD,
Paymaster-General United States Army.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to state to the Senate that this bill was draughted after a consultation with the Secretary of War. I went myself to see the Secretary of War. I had no communication from him on the subject except his letter merely transmitting this letter. The Paymaster-General recommends more paymasters than are authorized by this bill. I thought that probably his recommendation was a little larger than was necessary. I went to the Secretary of War and asked him whether he thought the recommendation of the Paymaster-General should be agreed to by the committee and a bill reported accordingly. I suggested to him that probably we could get along with a less number of paymasters, and the Secretary told me that he thought the Pay Department could get along with fifty. I then made the bill just in accordance with that conversation. The Paymaster-General has urged me frequently to increase the number beyond fifty. The bill as it now stands was reported by the committee after consultation with these men and after ascertaining the facts as to the necessities of the service.

As I stated before, the letter read shows the fact that the reduction of the private soldiers does not change the work of the paymasters. The organization remains precisely the same; the posts are just the same; they are not changed; their locality is not changed; the travel is the same. There are two or three disabled paymasters now, one of them in this city, not able to do anything. With the disabled paymasters that are in the service, the Paymaster-General has not, in my judgment, sufficient force to-day to transact the business necessary for his department.

I am as far from urging an unnecessary increase of the Army as any man. I think I have shown that on former occasions. I have never desired it and do not desire it now, nor would I vote to increase any arm of the service unless I thought it was absolutely necessary. But if this is not necessary in connection with the Pay Department of the Army, then there is nothing necessary in connection with the Army.

Mr. WEST. There is no doubt, as the Senator from Illinois has stated, that the reduction of the Army down to twenty-five thousand men in no way lessens the labor of the Pay Department; that is, those troops are scattered about the country, and perhaps we have at some posts forty men where we had fifty before, and consequently we have to send just as many paymasters to those posts as if we had not reduced the Army. But what I contend for is that, having so reduced the Army, we have the services of officers of the line available, and we can assign them to that duty and save this money. I say we can take those officers who are released by the reduction of the Army, and, under a provision of law, we can assign them to duty and make them paymasters for the time being.

Now, what is the situation that the Senate will occupy if it agrees to this proposition? Reduce your men and increase your officers. I say, take any surplus officers who are released and put them on this duty.

As to the recommendation of the War Department I ask the Senate's attention particularly. Under date of March 24, since the Senate agreed to this reduction, the Paymaster-General still harps upon the necessity of this increase in his Department. He writes a letter and urges that the Secretary of War shall urge upon the committee the necessity of it. Now, if the Senator from Illinois would read the letter transmitting this, the Senate would see that there is not one word of indorsement from the Secretary of War of this project. It comes from the Paymaster-General. That is all. He wants his force increased. Give him subaltern officers; take lieutenants, take captains; he can avail himself of them.

There is one other proposition (and that is what I specially object to) in this matter. I do not want to take civilians, picked out of the city of Washington and elsewhere, and make full-fledged majors out of them at a minute's notice by a stroke of the pen. Take your majors of the Army; how did they win their spurs? By twenty-odd years of service. Certainly no more onerous duties are imposed on these paymasters than these men discharged who were in service twenty years before you could make majors out of them. How did your quartermasters get to be majors? By service as lieutenants, by service as captains, by long and arduous duty. Here you propose to take men with no more duty than to handle cash—though, to be sure, there is a certain amount of responsibility—and make majors out of them. That is my objection to this bill; and when the Paymaster-General admits that there is a make-shift, that he can get along with additional men that can be given to him under the amendment I offered, I think it is the duty of the Senate to adopt that course. I do not think we ought to be putting more officers into the field when we have taken the men out of it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana whether or not paymasters of the Army are bonded officers.

Mr. WEST. Certainly, they are.

Mr. CLAYTON. If paymasters are bonded officers, would officers of the line transferred to that duty be responsible?

Mr. WEST. If the Senator had considered, as I thought it was considered, the amendment which I will now read, he would not have asked that question:

Provided, That so much of the act of July 7, 1838, as prevents the detail of officers of the Army as acting paymasters be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and hereafter the Secretary of War shall have authority to make such details and to prescribe the bonds which he may consider necessary to be given by the officers so detailed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand whether or not the Senator from Louisiana moves an amendment to this bill.

Mr. WEST. I shall presently, when I get an opportunity.

Mr. CLAYTON. I doubt very much whether an officer of the line can be assigned to the duty of paymaster, and made to give a bond. That is altogether a different arrangement from the line of his duty. These paymasters, when they enter the service, know that they are required to give a bond for the performance of their duty. They enter the service with that knowledge. The officers of the line understand no such thing.

Mr. WEST. Allow me to appeal to my friend, because he and I have some little knowledge of military service. Does he not believe many officers of the line would be glad to do this additional staff duty about the country?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. WEST. I do. I have known them.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do believe that an officer in the service as a line officer, understanding that it was not his business to assume responsibility for money, cannot be assigned to that duty and made to give a bond; while upon the other hand I believe it is the dictate of economy that we should have men assigned to this duty who are to be responsible for handling the public funds. I think it would be a measure of very poor economy indeed to take officers from the line, without any responsibility, to perform this service.

Mr. WEST. In reply to what the Senator from Arkansas says, I will tell him that there are over three hundred officers of the line now on duty on the staff, and they would be very glad to get the opportunity to perform this service.

Mr. CLAYTON. Are they bonded officers?

Mr. WEST. No; but they are held under responsibility and liability.

Mr. CLAYTON. What responsibility?

Mr. WEST. The responsibility of their commissions.

Mr. CLAYTON. But does that make money good in case the Government is defrauded and its money squandered?

Mr. WEST. This will. I offer an amendment, to come in at the end of the first section:

Provided, That so much of the act of July 7, 1838, as forbids the detail of officers of the Army as acting paymasters be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and hereafter the Secretary of War shall have authority to make such details and prescribe the bonds which he may consider necessary to be given by the officers so detailed.

Mr. LOGAN. I am free to admit that we are a little unfortunate sometimes in our judgment about matters. The Military Committee have thought at times that after consulting with the proper officers in connection with their duties, they could arrive at correct conclusions and obtain proper information; but possibly they may not be able to do that. Now the Senator from Louisiana knows very well—he has been an officer in the Army himself—the inconvenience of having men of certain lower rank to others where the rank ought to be equal in the Army. Now, what is the effect of the amendment that the Senator proposes? It is to detail a few lieutenants perhaps, or captains, from the line of the Army, where they ought to be learning some other duty than merely to count money. The duty of a paymaster is merely clerical; it is merely a duty that requires him to understand how to keep accounts and how to pay out money; that is all there is to it. A line officer's duty is very dissimilar. Line officers should attend to their companies, or their regiments, or their battalions, or their batteries, and they are constantly improving in their duties and learning them better every day. When you transfer a man from the line to a service that requires no duty which ought to be incumbent upon an officer at all, you detract from him as an officer of the Army.

The truth is that the Paymaster's Department ought to be called the Paymaster's Department, and there ought to be no rank in it, for it is a mere clerical duty, and some of the best armies in the world have had the pay department without this rank. But where you give the rank, as it has been given in this country, where the Pay Department has a certain rank, the officers ought to be specially assigned to that duty and no other, and they ought to be responsible men and men who should give bond, and after they have done that once they ought to be retained in that duty and not transferred to any other.

What would be the result if the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana were adopted? We find every few days here some one comes in for a bill to be passed by Congress to authorize him to receive certain pay, and why? Because he performed the duty of some higher officer. But a few days ago you had up a case that has been for years before the Senate, of a man who performed the duty of Secretary of State when in fact he was not Secretary of State, asking you to appropriate money to pay him for the rank of that office. The result of this will be in future the same thing. If you detail a few captains to perform the duties of majors in the Army; if you require them by law to do it, in a few years hence they will come and say that you required them to perform the duty of a higher rank that did not belong to them and that they are entitled to higher pay for that duty, and Congress will pass the bill.

You have a law, a most ridiculous one, on the statute-book—no, I will not say ridiculous, because it was passed by the Senate and that might be offensive—but during the war a section was incorporated into an Army bill here providing that officers of the Army might be retired with the rank of their command. That was a new feature to men who understand anything about the Army—a rank of command, a thing that does not exist at all; and we have on the roll to-day men retired as major-generals and drawing major-generals' pay who never had that commission. Why? On the very principle that is in this amendment; that is, that they performed the duty of a higher rank than they held; and Congress paid them accordingly. That is the kind of legislation we have in reference to the Army; and yet if our committee examine these questions a criticism is always ready in reference to some bill that tries to keep the Army regulated by a principle that ought to go to every organization of the Government.

Now you have the whole list—I could cite names but I will not—one man retired as a brigadier-general who never held a higher commission than that of captain in the Army. Upon what principle? Upon the very principle of this amendment, that you detail inferior officers to perform the duty of superior officers; and then afterward they will come and ask you to pay them accordingly. That is all there is in it. It looks like economy at present, but in the future it is not economy. We find this thing in the Army all the time. We are lobbied here in reference to things of this kind, and asked constantly to give higher rank to men that they may have higher pay; and that is constantly being done without any reason in the world. The way to make your Army effective and the way to make your Army respect the Government and your people respect the Army is to prescribe rules and hold it strictly to them, organize it into departments and require the officers of each department to perform the functions of their offices and no other. Let your Ordnance Corps perform the duties relating to ordnance, your Quartermaster's Corps do that duty, your Commissary Corps do that duty, and your Adjutant-General's Corps keep the records of the Army and keep the rolls correct. So with your generals; let them be confined to their duty, and they will make better officers; and so with your colonels, your captains, and everybody else.

The idea of taking a paymaster out of the Paymaster's Department and asking him to command a regiment would be considered by intelligent men as one of the most absurd things ever done in the world, for he knows nothing about that, he learns nothing about military duty in the field, nothing but the mere clerical duties he performs on his responsibility, in obedience to the laws of the country, by counting the money, keeping the rolls, checking the rolls, and having the payment entered on the records, and keeping correct records in reference to the pay of the soldiers in the Army, especially so that the accounting officers may readily examine the accounts when they are presented. That is the duty of paymasters; and when you assign other officers to that duty you deviate from the true principle and the true line that ought to govern the different departments or different corps of the Army.

I am sorry to see all the time these invasions attempted here. I have tried while I have been in Congress, since the war, to keep the Army in its proper line, as near as I could. I have failed, it is true, because sometimes, no matter what the theory may be, there is a stronger influence than argument and a stronger influence than principle that does override and govern. I could cite you to an instance that occurred here four years ago. Four years ago a bill passed in the House of Representatives, when I was there, against my protest, and I stood there alone with my committee protesting against it, by which you retired a man by act of Congress on a major-general's pay who never had held higher than the rank of colonel. That is the kind of legislation we have had in reference to the Army. The Military Committee protested against it; but it was done by Congress. You make major-generals here by act of Congress out of men who never held the commission and give them pay accordingly, and this is of the same piece of cloth, so far as the principle is concerned; not so far as the intention is concerned. It is deviating from the line of true principle that ought to govern and regulate the Army in this country.

Mr. WEST. I do not wish to detain the Senate much longer, and would not rise to reply now only that I think the representations—I will not call them misrepresentations because they were not intentional—of the Senator require that I should notice them. He cites the fact that we have paid men with the rank of colonel the pay of major-generals. There is such an act of Congress, and there are such officers in existence. Well, I will merely call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if we have done so we have done so in reward for gallant services on the field, and where an officer led a brigade and was shot down and wounded we have paid him as a brigadier. That is all there is of that.

Now as to the Senator's assertion that we are going to put officers of low rank on duty with high rank, I will call his attention to the practice of the Army as reported by the Secretary of War. Here are three hundred officers doing duty now as assistant quartermasters with all the responsibility of money and property upon them just as onerous as is laid upon any paymaster. They do not grumble; they do the service; they do not get extra pay to-day, nor will they ask for it to-morrow.

I will admit that possibly you might not get a major paymaster to lead a regiment; but certainly you will not get any of these majors paymasters whom it is proposed to appoint to do any such thing. If you propose to take civilians from the streets and make majors of them, when you have your gallant captains and gallant lieutenants who fought in the war and they cannot get that promotion, it is unjust to them.

Mr. LOGAN. Who proposes to take civilians? The bill proposes that the President shall appoint to these places, just as the Constitution provides.

Mr. WEST. And he may appoint civilians. I ask the attention of the Senate once more to the fact that this recommendation has been made by no one but the Paymaster-General. It does not come from the Secretary of War.

Mr. LOGAN. It has been made by the President of the United States in every annual message for the last four years.

Mr. WEST. I had not got that far. It is not recommended by the Secretary of War himself, who is the war minister. The President may have yielded to the solicitations of the Paymaster-General that it should be done, but the Secretary of War, in transmitting the original request, took occasion to say that he only transmitted it. The Paymaster-General appeals to him on March 24 and asks him to do it in these words:

> I would most respectfully request the honorable Secretary to represent to the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate the necessity and urgency of legislation on the subject.

The Secretary declines to do it. It comes here by itself.

Mr. LOGAN. The Secretary of War declined to do no such thing, for the Secretary did recommend to me this very bill. I asked him in person, and we fixed the number at fifty—the Secretary of War and myself.

Mr. WEST. That is a piece of information which is special to the Senator. It is not in the official documents.

Mr. LOGAN. I admit that; but I do not know that that makes any difference. I state the fact.

Mr. WEST. The Secretary of War in conversation with myself rather deprecated the increase. The Paymaster-General in his letter says:

> I assented to the proposition to authorize the War Department to make details of officers as acting paymasters, but it would be only a make-shift when, as now, the emergencies of the service should imperatively demand it.

That is what I want to do. I want to make it a make-shift. Our Government is a government of make-shifts at the present moment with respect to our resources; and we ought not to increase the Army by six majors when we have other officers who are available, and when the practice of the service is to make other officers available. I do not want to see this principle violated by overslaughing the junior officers of the service. Let them win their way to their majorities That is what we ought to give them the opportunity of doing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEST. I offer another amendment. It is at the end of the second section to insert the following:

And any appointments of paymasters which shall be made under the provisions of this act shall be taken from officers now in the Army by promotion.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to say that it cannot be done "by promotion." There is nobody to promote in the Pay Department, and you cannot promote a man from one line of service into another. You can transfer him, but you cannot promote him in that way. It would be a promotion in rank as a matter of course, but the result would be to fix him there as paymaster of that rank.

Now, I cannot see for my life why the Senator from Louisiana is so determined and persistent in his opposition to these appointments. He says there are hundreds of officers in the Army who may be detailed. I make the assertion here now in the presence of the Senate that the Army has not sufficient officers to perform the duties of the Army, and the Secretary of War and the President have both recommended that the staff corps be filled up. There is a deficiency in the Medical Corps of over one hundred officers, and in the different corps a great deficiency. We have refused to fill them up until a necessity arises. But there are not supernumerary officers in the Army to-day to detail for this purpose, and the Senator ought to know it.

There is a bill on the table reported from our committee to fill up the Medical Corps at the urgent request of the Surgeon-General. The President and the Secretary of War for the last four years have been asking for more than one hundred officers to be appointed in that corps. So it is in the different Departments. Why is it that it is so persistently urged here that officers are to be taken who cannot be spared? The Army has no more officers to-day than it requires, and indeed not as many as it needs. I do hope this will not be done. I shall not ask the President to appoint any civilian or any person that is not. He may appoint to the office, and I think he ought to be left free to appoint whom he chooses.

The Senator insists on the gallantry of the Army as a reason why line officers must be detailed or appointed to these positions. Sir, there are thousands of gallant men to-day who are not in the Army, who served faithfully in the war and are carrying wounds and scars, who are just as gallant as those who are in the Army and deserve just as much credit; and if the President should happen to appoint some poor unfortunate man that was in the Army, but does not happen to be there to-day, I do not think the country will be disgraced. I do not know that he will. I do not know anything about it; but I hope that he may be permitted at least, if there are gallant men who can be appointed, to appoint them.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to vote intelligently on this matter, and I want a little information from the Senator from Illinois before I vote. If this bill shall pass and become a law, and there shall be a given number of appointments to be made under it, and they are taken from civil life, you will then add to the expense of the Government precisely what shall be their compensation, to wit, the pay of just so many majors of cavalry. Now suppose the vacancies should be filled from the Army, would there not be just this saving in the expense, to wit, that which would constitute the difference between the grade of office the person might now hold and what might be the pay of a major of cavalry?

Mr. LOGAN. You mean if officers are detailed?

Mr. HAMLIN. No; I mean if this bill becomes a law and the President undertakes to appoint and he takes six captains and makes them paymasters; they will then be majors with the pay of majors of cavalry. Now, if he were to take six civilians, those six civilians would have the pay of majors of cavalry. But if, on the other hand, he took six Army majors or captains, you would add to the expense of the Government only the difference of pay between what those officers were getting and what they would get when they became majors.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; it will not; and I will show in a moment that that would not be the operation at all. If under this amendment the President shall detail or appoint by promotion, as the Senator says, six paymasters, they will be promoted to the rank of major, and thereby they will draw the pay of majors of cavalry. That would leave six vacancies of captains which would be filled, and those appointed to those places would draw the captains' pay. It would be the same thing precisely. It would not make a cent's difference. If you promote these men to majors you give them majors' pay, and the vacancy that you promote them from is to be filled by other persons.

Mr. STEVENSON. They might be compelled to promote an unworthy man for paymaster.

Mr. WEST. When I was told here a few moments ago that the President had recommended an increase of the Pay Department I was not able to controvert it, because I had not examined the message. Now, here is what the President says in regard to that:

With the present force of the Pay Department it is now difficult to make the payments to troops provided for by law. Long delays in payments are productive of desertions and other demoralization, and the law prohibits the payment of troops by other than regular Army paymasters.

I wanted to meet that very objection of the President and detail officers from the line.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana by adding "or from paymasters' clerks;" so that the amendment shall read:

And any appointments of paymasters, which shall be made under the provisions of this act, shall be taken from officers now in the Army by promotion, or from paymasters' clerks.

Mr. CONKLING. Before voting upon this amendment I should like to make one observation, in which I think I may be right, and I hope some Senator will correct me if I am wrong.

It has been said that as the bill stands without amendment the President can select from the Army, a proceeding equivalent to promotion or detail. That is not the law as I understand it. Therefore, when the Senator from Illinois says that he wants to leave the President free to appoint from the Army or from civil life, I suggest to him that he must effectuate that intention by a different provision from the one reported by the Military Committee and which he advocates now. Why? Because this bill provides for the appointment to an office here created by multiplying the number that already exist of a certain rank. The President is to nominate to the Senate; the Senate is to confirm. The commission then being delivered to the recipient of the nomination and confirmation, he comes to hold an office, a new office, an office different from that which he holds as lieutenant in the Army, and I think there can be little doubt that he would forfeit that commission and vacate that place, the general laws as they stand not tolerating him in holding two separate and independent offices. If I am right in this, the effect necessarily of the bill as it stands without amendment is to restrict and compel the President to appoint from civil life. Thus we are brought to consider, in the form we shall give to the bill, whether we intend that, or whether we intend to enlarge the field of selection.

I make this remark without having scrutinized the language of the bill before us. It may be that there is something in it which shows that I am wrong; but it occurs to me that without some modification the effect would be to deny the President the opportunity to select by promotion from the Army and drive him, whether he will or not, into the ranks of civil life for these nominations.

Mr. LOGAN. I think the Senator from New York is very much mistaken. The bill provides that the President may fill up by appointment so many offices. He can appoint a lieutenant or a captain the same as he can appoint anybody else. He may appoint any man from the Army. As a matter of course he vacates his first commission if he is appointed, because he gets another commission and leaves that place from which he is appointed vacant. That is the operation of the bill. It does not restrict the President at all. The President may appoint a lieutenant to-morrow if there is a vacancy in a major-general's office. Of course he vacates his lieutenant's commission by accepting that of major-general. That is all there is in it.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, notwithstanding some shakes of the head when I made my suggestion, the chairman of the Military Committee confirms me in what I said, namely, that no man in the Army, lieutenant or otherwise, could accept this new place without vacating his former place.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course not.

Mr. CONKLING. I thought I was right in that, although I repeat I witnessed so ominous a shake of the head by another Senator who is very high in authority on this subject that I thought perhaps I was wrong.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not presume for a moment that a Senator supposed a man could be appointed to a major's commission in the Army and hold a lieutenant's commission in the Army at the same time.

The bill provides that the President may fill up vacancies in the Pay Department to the number of six. Some Senators seem to misunderstand the bill in this respect: they think it is an increase of the Pay Department. It is a diminution of it. The law to-day authorizes sixty-two paymasters; but there is a provision in an appropriation bill, passed in 1869, which says that no more promotions shall be made in the staff corps of the Army until otherwise provided by law. That provision of law stopped promotions, and the Pay Department has run down from sixty-two to forty-four. That is the way the law to-day stands, fixing the Pay Department at sixty-two, but there is that provision preventing promotions.

Mr. WEST. How many men were there in the Army when the Pay Department was sixty-two paymasters?

Mr. LOGAN. The Pay Department was fixed at sixty-two in 1866, when the Army was cut down. There were hundreds of paymasters in the Army during the war, but in 1866, in the reorganization of the Army after the war was over, we fixed the Pay Department at sixty-two. In 1869 a proposition was moved to an appropriation bill providing that no more promotions should take place in the staff corps until it should be otherwise provided by law.

Mr. WEST. Has not the Army been reduced again since 1866?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEST. It was reduced in 1870.

Mr. LOGAN. It was intended to be reduced very recently, but I do not think that was effected. The Army was reduced from some number of regiments down to thirty in 1870, and the Pay Department ran down to forty-four. And now that Army is scattered all over the country; they cannot be paid with this number of paymasters. I am perfectly satisfied of that fact from the examinations I have made and from the evidence I have received. In conversation with the Paymaster-General he has stated to me the reasons and gone over the ground. I cannot go over it now, but he satisfied me most thoroughly that such was the fact.

Now, if the Senate propose to change the mode and manner of appointment in the Army, I have nothing to say; but if they propose to keep the Army in the line it ought to be, there is but one way, and that is to authorize the President to fill up the corps when it is deficient, and he may do it from the Army, from the Navy, or from where he pleases, and he ought to hunt for efficient men. The idea that a man should be appointed a paymaster because he holds a lieutenant's or captain's commission is perfectly absurd. A paymaster ought to be a good clerk, a good accountant, and an active man. It does not make any difference whether he knows that the right flank means one thing and the left flank another, or whether he knows how to wheel into column or to march by file or in any other way. That has nothing to do with his department; and it ought to be kept in a proper shape.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) If any Senator were so disrespectful to the Senator from New York as to shake his head at any observation made by him, it must have been because that Senator understood the Senator from New York to assert that, as this bill is drawn, the President of the United States could not appoint as a paymaster a man who already held a commission in the Army.

Mr. CONKLING. Without making him vacate his existing commission.

Mr. CARPENTER. With that addendum the first remark was quite harmless. This bill does not propose to let the officer hold both offices: and it would be understood by men of ordinary understanding, and did not need the indorsement of the Senator from New York that when a man was put out of one place into another he would not be in the place he was put out from. [Laughter.] So in every case of promotion, when a man is promoted from first lieutenant to be captain, there is a vacancy in the lieutenants created by that promotion; he cannot hold the rank of lieutenant and that of captain also. So here, if a captain in the Army should be appointed paymaster, he would of course vacate his place in the captains; he would hold the place of paymaster if he was appointed to that place under this act; in other words, I understand the Paymaster's Department to be a branch of the Army.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the honorable Senator who, in addition to his other advantages, graduated, I believe, at West Point, to inform me on this subject: Suppose a man in the Army now as lieutenant is appointed to one of these newly-created places, and in a year or two this place is abolished, which I take it for granted we have the power to do, does that leave him still in the Army?

Mr. CARPENTER. No; of course not.

Mr. CONKLING. So I thought; and yet my friend from Wisconsin made himself somewhat merry and excited the mirth of the rest of the Senate by saying that I seemed to think there was some difficulty in a man's being promoted from one place to another place. I need not have remarked on that. That would be so, as a matter of course. Let me see now, in the light of my friend's instruction, whether I can state my proposition to him so that it will command his judgment and not his merriment. A man in the Army holding a commission, unless he resigns, as I understand it, cannot be deprived of that commission except by the judgment of a court-martial. Am I wrong in that, or am I right?

Mr. WEST. By promotion.

Mr. CONKLING. I am not speaking of promotion; I am talking about a man's being ejected against his will from the Army, if he is the holder of a commission; and if there is any way in which he can be deprived of his commission against his will, except under the Rules and Articles of War, I will thank some Senator to give me the information.

Mr. LOGAN. I will do so if the Senator will give me the opportunity. He can be deprived of his commission by Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. In what regard?

Mr. LOGAN. By reducing the force in the Army?

Mr. STEVENSON. The President can dismiss him.

Mr. LOGAN. There never was a war in this country where after the war was over by act of Congress the Army was not reduced by mustering the officers of the Army out, both regulars and volunteers. That has been done after every war, from the war of the Revolution down to the present time. Even major-generals have been mustered out of the Army by act of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me to resume, I perceive the difficulty, as others very often have done, when speaking of professional questions, in not using professional terms. It is in that way, and in that way only, I think, that I have involved myself in the need of so many corrections. Of course, I know that the Army may be reduced, that the whole Army may be abolished and then there would be no commissions to hold. Of course I know the other things to which Senators have invited my attention; and relying upon the little that I do know upon this subject let me attempt again to state my proposition.

The Army not being abolished, the places continuing, there is no way, as I understand it, except to dismiss an officer the service, by which you may deprive him of the commission he holds. If I am right in that regard, and you promote him to be a paymaster and afterward the paymastership ceases to be, he retains his place in the Army, does he not?—retains his rank according to the Senator from Illinois and according I think to the understanding of us all. Here is a captain to-day; he is in the regular Army; and he is detailed or promoted or transferred to do the duties of a paymaster. Next year the Army is still further reduced, the posts are fewer and his services are not needed; does the fact that they are not needed and that his services cease expel him from the service and deprive him of the commission or degrade him in the rank? Not at all. "Of course not," my friend from Wisconsin says. Now let us see the effect of appointing him under this bill. He is now a lieutenant or captain; he is made a paymaster: next year the need of his services ceases, and the paymastership is abolished; where is he? Is he still in the Army with his old rank? He is not in the Army at all. He is precisely in the condition in which my honorable friend or myself would be had we been appointed being civilians.

That was the suggestion which I made originally; and I say that the bill as it stands working that effect might be modified, if the purpose were to allow the President either to take a civilian or a military officer, by providing that he may detail, promote, or transfer (using the appropriate military and professional phrase) whereas now he can appoint no man in the Army and no man in the Navy—although the Navy is not applicable to it, I refer to it because that suggestion has been made—except the man who consents to take the appointment at his peril, knowing that when this particular place shall cease, his rank and standing in the Army will be forever gone.

I think my friend from Wisconsin will see that I am right in that. If I am, then I had abundant provocation for the remark I made, and the point as I stated it is precisely the point as the Senator from Wisconsin now admits.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator from New York at last shows that he was right in everything except the suggestion he first made, which was not very important to him or to us or to anybody else; and he attached no great importance to it. It was only remarkable in this, that he so seldom makes the smallest kind of a blunder. The Senator was understood to say, and if anybody shook his head he certainly must have understood him to say, that this bill as it was drawn took away from the President the power of appointing to the place of paymaster anybody from the Army, because if he did so he would hold two offices instead of one. That was the proposition, and that was a mistake; and it only tends to show that the Senator from New York is no exception to the universal rule that even great men make small mistakes.

Mr. CONKLING. It was a mistake, if my friend will allow me, but not, as I think the record will show, a mistake of mine. Preposterous as many suggestions of mine may be, I think I did not make one so utterly preposterous as that. I said that he would be holding two offices if he could continue to hold his rank in the Army and at the same time the place to which he was appointed, and that therefore it would work a forfeiture, a vacation of his military place.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. There are a number of men clerks of paymasters who have occupied those positions some years. They have been faithful. They understand their duty. They are the very class of men to whom the Senator from Illinois refers as abundantly competent to perform the duties of paymasters. I moved the amendment so as to give the President an opportunity, if he thinks best, to consider those men, and to consider whether they are not entitled to some promotion as well as any other men who are in the military service of the country. They are as much in the employment, in the service of the Government, as the captains and lieutenants of the Army; and I hope the President will have an opportunity to consider whether he will appoint any of them to this position or not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following as a substitute for the amendments proposed by the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Connecticut——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) It may be read for information, but there is an amendment to an amendment pending, and a further amendment is not in order.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, as follows:

> And all appointments under this act shall be made from volunteers in the late war who held a rank not lower than that of captain.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think it will be conceded by all that, if we are to have the number of paymasters increased, they ought to be taken from that class of persons. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. ALCORN. I do not see why the privates in the Union Army should be cut off from the opportunities of being selected by the President for the performance of the duties set forth in the bill. It does seem to me that this distinction which the Senator from Vermont would undertake to make here in favor of officers is not in accordance with the taste and with the spirit of the institutions of the country in which we live.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very much surprised that a little bill like this should have elicited so much debate; but I shall be careful hereafter on every bill that I bring up from the Military Committee to examine the records, so that we may have a general debate on all military questions that can be suggested. I am opposed to any amendment of any character whatever restricting the President from appointing whom he pleases. Let him appoint a private soldier; let him appoint a clerk of a paymaster; let him appoint anybody he chooses. The Senator from Connecticut desires the bill to be so that the President may appoint clerks of paymasters. The bill is so now that the President may appoint them; but to require the President to appoint a particular class of men to office is an absurdity, in my judgment.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana confined it to a particular class, and I proposed to make that class broader.

Mr. LOGAN. That, then, confines it to two classes; but there are more than two classes in this country. Let it be open to everybody, and let the President appoint whom he chooses. I have more confidence in the President's judgment than some of my friends seem to have. I think the President, having been a military man, is just as good a judge of one who will make a good paymaster as any of us, and I am willing to trust him. Some of our friends are not willing to trust the President; they have lost confidence in him within the last few days. I have not. I think he will make good appointments, and I am willing to leave it to him to do it. If he will appoint some of the friends of the Senator from Connecticut, I have no objection; or some of the friends of the Senator from New York, I have no objection. Let them go and get them appointed, I do not care; but I want the President to have the right to appoint whom he may please; and then we shall have a second shot at them when the names come to the Senate if they do not suit us; but I hope they will.

I have not seen such a disposition manifested on a little bill before in this Senate. It must make a difference somehow or other from what committee a bill comes. How did this bill come from the Military Committee? It just provided that six of the vacancies now existing in the Pay Department may be filled by the President, and that is all there is of it. If you can make a bill plainer than that or better than that, I should like to know how you will do it.

I hope the Senate will not allow any amendment to it. The bill is exactly right. It provides for the President filling up these appointments, and that is all there is in it. He may fill them from the Army, from the Navy, from civilians, or he may take Senators if they desire a position of that kind in preference to the one they have, and he has a perfect right under this bill to do it. I hope all members of Congress and all Senators, and all governors of States, and all captains, and majors, and generals, and privates, and everybody will have a chance at least for these six offices, so that the President may select from forty million people those whom he may think best adapted to the place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Now I move the amendment which I proposed as a substitute for that.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And all appointments under this act shall be made from volunteers in the late war who held a rank not lower than that of captain.

Mr. CARPENTER. That would be an excellent thing perhaps for the President to do; but I think it is a thing that the Senate cannot constitutionally compel him to do. The Senate can no more say that he shall appoint out of a particular class of persons who served in the Army than that he shall appoint out of a particular class in the community. It has no more power to say he shall appoint from this class of persons than that he shall appoint from the lawyers or doctors or any other class. The President must be left free under the Constitution to exercise his appointing power, and he cannot be restricted, directed, or cramped into any particular class. I think that is very plain as a constitutional proposition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I beg the Senator from Wisconsin to remember that it is the common practice to limit the President as to the parties that shall be nominated to an office. For instance, it is frequently proposed that no man shall be appointed to a particular office unless he be learned in the law, and never has there been any objection when that proposition was proposed. So in the case of engineers, persons of particular knowledge and proficiency are required. I do not see any valid objection in the point suggested by the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have that read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

And any appointments of paymasters which shall be made under the provisions of this act shall be taken from officers in the Army by promotion.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. What has become of the amendment in regard to the assignment of officers now in the line?

Mr. LOGAN. It was voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. WEST. In the adoption of that bill the Senate imposes an additional expense of $30,000 per annum, when the Paymaster-General in his own letter admits that he can get along next year. That is all I have to say about it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. WEST. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOGAN. One thing I desire to say. I am sorry to hear a Senator say that this is an additional expense of $30,000, which would be $5,000 for each paymaster. He knows that is not the salary.

Mr. WEST. The Senator says I overstate the expense because the pay is not $5,000; but the pay is $3,000 and the emoluments and the expense of travel are at least $2,000 more.

Mr. LOGAN. There are no emoluments.

Mr. WEST. I beg pardon; there are quarters and fuel, and I know enough of the Army to know that this bill means $30,000.

Mr. LOGAN. I am glad to see persistence in any Senator, but I like to see fairness. What is the use of stating the expense? What has that to do with it? If these paymasters are necessary, how can you look at what they are going to cost? If they are not necessary, we ought not to vote them. I say they are.

Mr. WEST. There we differ.

Mr. LOGAN. Their salary is $3,000 a year, and that is all there is to it. You abolished mileage the other day on the appropriation bill, on the very bill that the Senator offered the amendment to.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Clayton, Cooper, Fenton, Flanagan, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Oglesby, Pease, Robertson, Scott, Spencer, Stockton, Wadleigh, and Windom—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Conkling, Davis, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Maryland, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and West—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Johnston, Jones, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Pratt, Ramsey, Schurz, Stewart, Tipton, and Wright—33.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the question, the Chair will announce that Senate bill No. 1, the supplementary civil-rights bill, is the unfinished business.

Mr. CONKLING. I withdraw my motion for the accommodation of my friend from California.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 30, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, to which I think there will be no objection:

Resolved, That on and after Tuesday next, and until further ordered, the daily sessions of the House shall begin at eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think that ought to lie over for a day.

Mr. NEGLEY. Until Congress shall agree to some time for the final adjournment, I must object to any extension of the time of the daily sessions.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I give notice that on Monday I will move that the resolution be adopted under a suspension of the rules.

JOHN GRAHAM.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, presented a report in writing to accompany the joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) for the relief of John Graham; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

WILLIAM WALKER.

Mr. BANNING also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2292) for the relief of William Walker; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MODOC WAR.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish this House with the names of all persons in California and Oregon who furnished supplies and transportation to the Government during the Modoc war, the amount of each claim, what amount has been paid and to whom paid, what amount remains unpaid and to whom due.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That resolution ought to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to know why the resolution is offered.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will state the reason. The people of my county, and in fact the people of California and Oregon, furnished supplies to the Government during the Modoc war. They were to be paid on the delivery of the articles, and they also furnished transportation. The quartermaster there says that the reports have been forwarded to the Department here. I have been unable to find them, and I desire to know how the accounts stand for the information of my people.

Mr. COBURN. Is there any bill or proposition before Congress to pay these claims?

Mr. LUTTRELL. No; I want to see how far they have been paid.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The resolution ought certainly to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By unanimous consent, the resolution was received and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. AVERILL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House a list of all claims for losses through depredations committed by Indians, presented to the Department of the Interior for ten years past, giving in each case the date when and the place where the depredations were committed, the date of the presentation of the claim, the name of the claimant or claimants, and the full amount of the claim; also the name of the tribes or bands of Indians charged with the depredations and the action of the Department upon each claim, and also the damages done by whites to Indians.

Mr. AVERILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE OUACHITA AND RED RIVERS.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce a bill as a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 112) to authorize the North Louisiana and Texas Railroad Company to construct a bridge over the Ouachita River at or near Monroe, Louisiana, and a bridge over the Red River at or near Shreveport, Louisiana. I would state that it is hardly necessary to read the bill. It contains all the restrictions usually provided in bills of this description.

The SPEAKER. The bill ought to be read. The Chair would have to insist on that himself.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I would inquire if the bill is before the House?

The SPEAKER. It can only be before the House by unanimous consent. Does the gentleman object? It is being read by unanimous consent for the information of the House, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for action upon it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I object to it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBURN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I propose to address to the House a few observations, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] yesterday, on the pending bill in relation to citizenship, and before proceeding I wish, in relation to the order of business and to the time it will probably take, to say to the House that the gentleman from Indiana on my left [Mr. HOLMAN] has sickness in his family, which makes it necessary for him to leave the city to-night, and he desires very much for that reason that an opportunity shall be given for a short time this morning to consider the bill relating to the Louisville and Portland Canal; and if unanimous consent can be given I am willing, at the close of the few remarks I have to make, to give way for that purpose, if the House will consent to it without the bill now before the House losing its place. It will not, as I understand, interfere with the appropriation bill. It is thought that it will take but a very short time, and I shall yield to that bill the time which I should otherwise propose to occupy with our bill to-day. I hope that, after what I have to say this morning, when our bill next comes up, to-morrow morning, it will be finally disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot resist the appeal in behalf of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] but I wish to say in behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means, that being the next committee on call, we have been waiting to report for nearly a week, not feeling at liberty to interfere with the appropriation bills which come up one after another, and this bill coming over as unfinished business from day to day deprives the committee of any opportunity to report.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. We will get this bill out of the way as soon as possible.

Mr. POLAND. I must object to any arrangement such as that suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.]

Mr. DAWES. I think the gentleman from Vermont did not hear the statement of my colleague in regard to the gentleman from Indiana, who is called away by sickness in his family.

Mr. POLAND. Of course I must yield to a personal appeal of that kind.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent at this time that at the close of the few observations I may make the bill in relation to the Louisville and Portland Canal may be taken up.

Mr. DAWES. And does the gentleman propose to take up his bill again after that is disposed of?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. No; not until to-morrow morning.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. How much time does the gentleman from Indiana propose to occupy?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the Louisville and Portland Canal bill will not consume more than two hours.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let us have the time fixed now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am content that not more than two hours shall be allowed for the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] has charge of the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I cannot say how much time will be consumed upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the gentleman from New York would want to occupy an hour. I think that not more than two hours will be required to dispose of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire that general debate on the Indian appropriation bill may be closed to-day, and I will ask unanimous consent that there be an evening session to-night for the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. One unanimous consent had better be settled before another is asked. Is there objection to proceeding to the consideration of the Louisville and Portland Canal bill after the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] on the pending bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. To be limited to two hours.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will consent that the gentleman from New York shall have an hour, and that the other side have an hour.

Mr. GARFIELD. At the end of the two hours the previous question to be considered as operating.

Mr. CONGER. Not to cut off amendments, I hope.

The SPEAKER. It will be considered as operating upon any amendments that may be offered during the two hours.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now ask unanimous consent that an evening session be held to-night for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill under the five-minute rule, general debate to be considered as concluded.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I object.

AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2199) to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution concerning citizenship, and to define certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries and certain duties of diplomatic and consular officers, and for other purposes.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have always had the profoundest sense of the ponderous qualities of my friend from New York, [Mr. HALE;] of his strength and vigor as a lawyer, and of the great value of his public services upon large and very important questions. But I confess that the speech he made to us yesterday revealed him in a new capacity; I was not before aware of his microscopic powers. I supposed he had all the artillery of his profession at his command; but that he was so powerful on pleas in abatement I never suspected. That he was a shrewd parliamentarian I did not doubt; that when he had prepared a magnificent speech upon the rights of American citizens and the glory and destiny of the American nation he should desire that the House and country should not be deprived of it was perfectly natural. But until I heard his speech through, I did not so thoroughly comprehend why it was that he objected to my suggesting to the House three or four little amendments which the committee thought would make the bill more perfect to accomplish the object it was designed to accomplish. Until I heard his speech I did not understand his objections; but then I found that if he had permitted us to offer our amendments in advance it would have made his speech substantially unnecessary. I say so, because I think I can show the House that there is nothing which those amendments would leave in controversy between us, except one or two propositions, on which I trust I can satisfy the House that the committee is clearly right, and the gentleman from New York wrong; but which are of course matters for fair debate and discussion.

It is not my practice in argument of any question to spend any time on general professions of devotion either to the entire country or to any particular class of people in it. I shall dispense with all such statements on this occasion. I will simply ask the House in general to do me and the committee the justice to believe that we have as profound a sense of the grandeur and glory of America, of the rights of American citizens, and of the importance of securing and protecting those rights, as the gentleman from New York; and we cannot have more. We simply propose to show to the House that this bill is in the interest of protecting the rights of American citizens, and by simple and proper methods making those rights secure.

I propose to follow the gentleman in simply commenting on the various propositions of the bill in succession—and shall do it very briefly—which he has attempted to present as objections to the bill as we propose it shall stand. As there seems, however, to have been a grave misapprehension running through the whole of the gentleman's speech, I ask the House to notice the beginning of the second section which states the object of the bill:

That in order to assure to all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof the full acknowledgment of the right to be citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside, it is hereby declared, &c.

After listening to the speech of the gentleman from New York it might perhaps surprise the House, or those who have not carefully examined the bill, when I state that there is nothing in the bill which takes away the nationality of anybody, and that that is not its object or purpose. The first objection which was made was in regard to the provisions in relation to married women; a very interesting subject, and one in regard to which the course of modern legislation has been in one direction. The gentleman speaks about his unwillingness to disturb the well-recognized principles of public and international law. I do not know but he is one of those who prefer to keep the old common-law ideas of the subjection and nonentity of a woman after her marriage. This bill I admit does in that respect make a change in public law, a beneficent and desirable change. What is it?

By the law as it stands the nationality or citizenship of a married woman follows inexorably that of her husband. Now, America is the country of all others that is most interested in these questions relating to citizenship and change of citizenship. While this discussion was going on I had in my mind cases which have occurred in my neighborhood. I will state one of them, and all members of the House must know that such cases are frequent. A respectable young man from Scotland, or Nova Scotia, or Germany comes into one of our country towns in search of employment. He is a man worthy to become a citizen, a respectable person. He finds a young woman there, a native of the United States, with whom he falls in love and forms marriage relations. I remember a case where the daughter of one of our most substantial farmers, whose father had died and left her with a very good farm, made the acquaintance of such a young man and married him. He went on the farm and has continued there, a substantial and excellent citizen. I believe he is now naturalized, but was not for some time after his marriage. Now, do we say that we are so much devoted to the old principles of feudal or English law, or the general principles that prevail among nations, that we will say that that young woman, born on our soil, owning the estate on which she lives, intending to spend her life there, became from the moment of her marriage, and continued up to the time her husband got naturalized, a foreigner and the subject of foreign jurisdiction, and must become naturalized had her husband died before he had accomplished his own naturalization?

Is it not an improvement on the law to say that an American girl marrying in her own country, which she never left and in which she intends forever to reside, shall remain an American citizen, although she does marry a man who is not naturalized here? And that provision is put into this bill, and was the first thing in it that the gentleman commented upon. Putting that provision into it we put in a corresponding provision, probably of comparatively very little importance, which was that a foreign woman marrying one of our citizens abroad and continuing to reside abroad (only this single exceptional case) should be a citizen of this country as against all powers except the country in which she was born and in which she continued to reside; so that if she chose to remain there and wished to be a citizen there, she should not be brought by an inexorable rule under the operation of the principle of law to which I have alluded, and be made a citizen of this country against her will. If the House can see any harm in that, or anything which would justify laying this bill on the table, I fail to apprehend it. The House will notice in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth lines of the bill as read from the Clerk's desk (amended before it was read, although not before it was printed) these words:

Except the power within whose jurisdiction an alien woman married to a citizen of the United States may have been born and shall continue to reside.

That is the only exception.

The next point which the gentleman took up was that children of foreigners born here were not placed in a corresponding position with children born abroad of citizens of the United States. The committee propose to submit an amendment to strike out in line 35 of page 3 the words "born or naturalized" before the word "citizens." These words, "born or naturalized," were put in the bill as originally draughted in perhaps twenty places; but as the committee did not propose to make any distinction between native and naturalized citizens, the words were stricken out in all other places in the bill and remain here by inadvertence only.

In line 26, on page 2, occurs the passage to which the gentleman next alluded in regard to children born abroad:

A child born abroad whose father may be a citizen of the United States residing in and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be regarded as a citizen of the United States at the time of birth.

We propose to strike out in this passage the words "residing in," as perhaps inaccurately expressing our idea and purpose. This amendment seems to obviate entirely the argument of the gentleman on that point.

Mr. HALE, of New York. That leaves it just as the law now stands, I think.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It does not affect it at all. We are stating affirmatively who shall be regarded as citizens, in order that there may not be any question in just such a case as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] put—the case of a very able and eminent gentleman in the public service who was born in Montreal while his father was there as a contractor for building the cathedral. We recognize the principle that the children of citizens, born abroad, shall be citizens of the United States without the necessity of naturalization. It certainly cannot be an objection to the bill that it recognizes distinctly what my friend from New York considers to be the settled law already.

I now pass to another objection which might have some gravity if it were not founded upon a total misapprehension of what the bill provides. I refer to the passage on page 3, under the division "thirdly," lines 35 and the following lines. To make that provision clearer, the committee propose to insert at the end of line 36 the words "in any foreign country;" so that the clause will read "or who in any foreign country enter into the civil, naval, or military service of any foreign prince," &c. The gentleman from New York did not take objection on this point; but there is an objection to the bill as it stands which I will state. There are many citizens of our country who are appointed here (not going out of it) consuls of foreign countries. Of course we do not mean to say that such persons by accepting such appointments cease to be citizens of this country, or are no longer entitled to the protection of the Government on account of holding that relation to a foreign country. There are gentlemen in this city employed as the counsel of the British government in the presentation of claims, who are so far in the civil service of that government. There may be various employments within the country which do not come within the intention of the provision. Therefore it is proposed to insert after the word "who" at the end of line 36 the words "in any foreign country," and in line 39, before the word "secondly," the words "while such service continues;" which I think will make clear to the gentleman from New York what is intended.

But I was going to say, as an answer to the whole proposition which he argued, and when he depicted so painfully the condition of a "man without a country," that this bill does not take away anybody's country. Not a man to whom this refers who leaves the foreign service has lost his citizenship thereby. This bill does not provide for taking away the nationality of a citizen; but it provides under what circumstances persons shall be regarded as within the jurisdiction of the United States, and at that time entitled to protection as American citizens under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. If a man goes into the military service of the Khedive of Egypt and is engaged in a war in the interior of Africa, I take it this country does not want to be under an obligation to send an "Ashantee expedition" to hunt him up as an American citizen, when he is not there on any of our business, but is in the service of a foreign power which undertakes to protect him while his engagement in that service continues.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to ask him whether, under the state of the law as it now exists, while in such military service, he is entitled to the protection of the United States? and whether this bill is necessary to relieve the United States from that duty?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. My friend knows as well as any lawyer can know what is called in the courts a "departure in pleading;" that is, when you have given a thorough and complete answer to what has been said and claimed on the other side, to start in another direction for an inquiry. If my friend has denounced the bill for containing a provision which I have endeavored to show it does not contain, it is hardly an answer to ask me to explain whether under this there is any change of the law as it now exists. I do not suppose he could have made his speech against the bill to the great length he has made it if he had been willing to concede there was no change in existing law; but I do not think it worth while to take up time to discuss that question. If it does not change existing law, and the gentleman does not want such law changed, then the bill is innocent, if nothing more; at least to that extent innocent.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The answer strikes me as rather ingenious than candid, I must say.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It has not been my lot in life, I believe, Mr. Speaker, often to encounter the objection I was not reasonably candid in stating what I thought as directly as possible. But I do not think it is any part of my duty to go into the consideration of what the existing law is, unless I see myself or something is suggested which tends to show that a change is intended. I will therefore, if my friend thinks the bill in this respect is in conformity with existing law, admit it for the purpose of this argument without stopping to discuss the question.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts, but merely to call his attention for one moment. My proposition points to this, that the gentleman has attempted to answer my objections to the whole scope of this provision by saying in a certain case, to wit, a case of military service of another government, we ought not to be required to protect our citizens. I made what I thought a proper suggestion in answer to that. In that case the law is right as it stands. Now this bill proposes to go a great way further; there is where I object to it—not on the point he makes that this bill is innocent.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I should have got to the next point if the gentleman had not interposed. I was coming to it. Take such a case as that of Mr. Burlingame, who went into the civil service of another power and became its embassador. In one part of his argument my friend laid before the House his objection to a double nationality. That was when he was speaking about this little case of the poor girl who got married, that it was an infringement of the great principles of public law that should not be encouraged, that there should not be a double nationality, and he therefore objected to that part of the bill on that ground. When he comes to another part of the bill where we are endeavoring to draw a practical and serviceable line, in order not to have a conflict of double nationality and double national duties for the time being, we are attacked in the opposite direction. What seemed to the committee and what is the purpose of this provision is this, that if an American citizen goes into the civil service as well as the military service of another power, out of his own country, for the time that that relation continues and he has chosen to give his faculties, his powers, his time, and his presence to another nation in its service—while that continues it is desirable there should not be against that nation the assertion of jurisdiction over him or a duty to look after him and interfere with him on the part of the Government of the United States. Why, Mr. Speaker, the present law of the German Empire provides that any person going into the service of that government thereby becomes a citizen of Germany. It works naturalization under their laws. Now, we do not require under this bill that the man shall permanently lose his citizenship in the United States by thus going into the service of a foreign power. But we do think it is reasonable, when we are seeing how we can tell who in foreign countries are our citizens—and that is the object of the bill—to give our people a certain, direct, and easy method of showing their Government they are its citizens and entitled to its protection. We think it is not desirable, if in such foreign service, that they shall have the right to call upon two governments at the same time for protection.

Mr. TREMAIN. Will the gentleman allow me to put a question to him before leaving this subject? I should like to hear what you have to say to the suggestion of my colleague from New York in the cases of Mr. Burlingame and the other gentleman he mentioned on returning to their own country, whether they are not at liberty to resume their connection with this country under their citizenship or to be naturalized.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That was the grave mistake which ran through the whole argument of my friend from New York, [Mr. HALE,] in my apprehension. This bill, as it will be seen, does not say "The following persons shall cease to be citizens of the United States." It says:

> The following persons shall be regarded as not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States within the intent of the said fourteenth amendment, or as not residing within the United States within such intent.

When the native of this country returns from the foreign service, civil or military, there is not one word in this bill to affect his nationality. It is a provision simply to determine what classes of persons, upon what evidence, and on what conditions, shall be entitled to the protection of the United States abroad, and a right to assert there the privileges of American citizenship. That is the extent of it. There is no man who would lose his nationality by any provision in this bill as I understand it, or as it was intended, or as I think a careful reading of it will show.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman not deem it intrusive if I call his attention right here to a point which I think is undoubtedly the turning point of this enumeration of classes of persons? I call his attention to the language of the fourteenth amendment, and to the language of this section in reference to that fourteenth amendment. The fourteenth amendment provides that—

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens, &c.

Now I ask the gentleman if he as a lawyer will maintain that, when this very clause provides that the persons named in it shall be regarded as not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States within the intent of that amendment, it has not precisely the same effect?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Within the intent of the said amendment?

Mr. HALE, of New York. That it has not precisely the same effect as saying that they shall not be citizens of the United States under the provision of that amendment?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I say emphatically as a lawyer—and as I propose to say in regard to another subject which my friend has discussed when I come to it, I was astonished that a gentleman of his great reputation as a lawyer could have thought otherwise—that is not the intent of the bill. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly absurd. This Congress cannot pass anything in derogation of the Constitution of the United States. This never would be construed as so intended; and it is a perversion of its language and its spirit, as it seems to me, to suppose it could bear any such meaning. I do say as a lawyer that no court could so construe it, for the simple and obvious reason, to begin with, that it would be unconstitutional. We are not undertaking to take any man's citizenship away; but the United States have certain duties in regard to their citizens abroad. That provision of the Constitution does not take away the right of a citizen of the United States to become naturalized in a foreign country; it does not relate to it. Its object was to provide who should be citizens of the United States within its jurisdiction. Its object, in short, was to reverse the Dred Scott decision. That was the great purpose of it.

I now come to the gentleman's next point. But I may say in passing that he did not adopt at all—I do not think that he would be likely from his gravity and disposition, to treat the thing seriously, to do so—the objection that was urged the other day by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who contributes so much to the amusement of the House on all occasions, and who objected to this provision, that you must register in a foreign country in order to secure your right to be protected. The argument on which that objection was based was that it is unworthy of an American citizen to have to tell anybody that he is one; that he ought to carry that imperial presence that will not only "give the world assurance of a man," but will make people see at once all the world over that a man of lofty port is an American citizen, so that nobody can innocently doubt it. But I do not see why the argument is not just as applicable at home as abroad, and why it is not as good an objection against taking the census as it is against passing this bill; or as good an objection against making a registry of voters at the polls, or for the purposes of assessment and taxation, which of course all honest and honorable citizens wish to have their full share of and would hate to avoid any portion of, by reason of any mistake or misapprehension as to their citizenship or identity.

My friend, however, went on to object to this provision which requires registration, and in regard to the naturalized citizen of the United States becoming domiciled in the country of his or her nativity unless when otherwise regulated by treaty. He said very truly that we had treaties in which it was provided that the return of a naturalized citizen to the country of his birth should not divest him of his privileges in this country as a citizen—should not divest him of his American citizenship. There is nothing in this bill to conflict with that. But my friend did not tell the House that we already have treaties with six powers, and those the most important, as affected by this question, by which it is provided that his returning and becoming domiciled there, without intent to return to this country, shall work a restitution of his original citizenship.

Mr. MYERS. That is, in the case of a naturalized citizen.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Yes, sir; that without having to go through a renaturalization in the country of his birth he becomes a citizen of that country by returning and becoming domiciled there; and we have five treaties in which it is provided that a term of two years' continuous residence shall constitute the presumption of domicile and permanent residence there, though not conclusive.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to give to an American citizen, a naturalized American citizen, who goes abroad a simple way in which he shall be protected from becoming again a citizen of the country to which he formerly belonged. If he wishes to hold his American citizenship he has only to go and record himself with our minister or consul and his right is secured and his American citizenship is retained. That act on his part is made conclusive proof in his favor of his intention to retain citizenship in America and not to acquire that foreign domicile which is to relegate him to his old citizenship under treaty or under any construction of international law. The whole scope of the bill, if it be carefully examined in all its provisions, is to protect American citizens, to give them a chance to identify themselves so that the Government shall know and have evidence of their right to the protection of the Government. The bill was framed with that very view, and if any gentleman can suggest an amendment which will perfect it in that view he will do exactly what we shall thank him for, and what the committee spent days and days in endeavoring to attain by a careful consideration of its provisions.

I now come to the last objection which the gentleman from New York made to the bill, and I must say that I was astonished that my friend, as a lawyer, should have expressed the opinion he did on a part of this bill. We have got at the end of the bill a provision allowing citizens of the United States in foreign countries to be married before a consul. We have had a law upon that subject on the statute-book for some years; but its operation was confined to citizens who could be married under the laws of the District of Columbia. It was a law apparently hastily gotten up and was framed, I presume, with the idea that Congress could not, except under its authority over the District of Columbia, regulate such a subject. I do not understand that anybody objects to this provision of the bill as a good, convenient, and excellent one. American citizens may desire to be married according to the rites of their church or according to the laws of their country in a place where there might be difficulties and impediments in the way, and this provision that they may be married before a consul is designed to facilitate marriages, and it tends to do that.

The only objection which the gentleman from New York, who seems determined to go over with his microscopic gaze every sentence of this bill to see if he can find a flaw or defect in it—the only thing that he can suggest about that section is, that, as a lawyer, he should think that without amendment it would imply that nobody could be married in any other way. Well, I say candidly and frankly, so that I may not be accused of concealment, that it seems to me exactly as clear that such an objection lies to the bill as if Congress should pass an act providing that certain persons should be admitted to the Botanic Garden or to the Smithsonian Institution, an objection would lie to it that you must have a careful provision in it that such persons should also have the right to walk in the streets of Washington. I do not think that a simple provision that persons may be married in a certain way can be construed as cutting off the right to be married in any other way. The word "shall" is not used in the section, except that it provides that the consul "shall" attend to the matter when requested.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I desire to suggest to the gentleman that if a bill were pending authorizing certain persons to visit the Botanic Garden or the Smithsonian Institution, I should certainly insist that a proviso should be added that that should not exclude other persons, and I should deem it a very pertinent and proper amendment.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Our rules prescribe what persons shall be permitted on the floor of the House. If a rule should be adopted that judges of State courts should come in here, I should think it just as pertinent that an amendment should be offered providing that that should not be construed as excluding the members of this body from the floor. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that that is a very minute criticism. I cannot see its force; but if the House does, I hope such an amendment will be offered by my friend as will provide that this shall not cut off all marriages other than those before a consul, and also, although I have no personal interest in the matter, that it shall not be held to annul or undo any marriage already contracted.

I now yield the floor for the consideration of the Louisville and Portland Canal bill.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The House, pursuant to the order made this morning, then took from the Speaker's table for consideration the bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, with the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House thereto.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I yield the first hour allowed for debate to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR.]

Mr. ARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask only a few moments to submit a consideration or two in connection with a brief recital of facts.

On the 12th day of January, 1825, the Louisville and Portland Canal Company was incorporated by act of the General Assembly of the State of Kentucky. The capital stock of the company was limited to $600,000, to be represented by 6,000 shares of stock of $100 each.

Subsequently, by an act of the Assembly, approved December 12, 1829, the capital stock of the company was increased to $700,000, and a sale authorized of 1,000 additional shares of stock at $100 each; and, afterward, from time to time, in virtue of an act of the General Assembly, approved December 12, 1831, the capital stock was extended to $1,000,000, represented by 10,000 shares of stock at $100 each.

In the mean time, pursuant to the acts of Congress, approved May 31, 1826, and March 2, 1829, the United States became the purchaser and owner of 1,000 shares of the capital stock, of 1,350 shares of the same, and afterward by stock dividend for adjusted interest of 567 shares, amounting in the aggregate to 2,902 shares, at a total cost of $290,200, leaving 7,098 shares belonging to individuals at the estimated cost of $709,800.

Such was the attitude of the parties down to 1842, at which time the United States had received in cash dividends $257,778 and in stock dividends for adjusted interest $56,700, amounting in the aggregate to $314,478, or $24,278 profit, in excess of the entire cost of her stock.

On the 21st day of January, 1842, was approved the act of Assembly containing the following provisions:

An act to amend the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That the act incorporating the Louisville and Portland Canal Company shall be, and the same is hereby, so amended that, whenever the stockholders in said company shall so direct, the board of president and directors of said company shall have the privilege of selling the shares of stock owned by individuals in said canal to the United States, or the State of Kentucky, or the city of Louisville, for the purpose of eventually making the said canal free of tolls; or, further to effect this object, the board of president and directors, when so authorized as aforesaid, shall hereby have the privilege of appropriating the net income arising from said canal to the purchase of said stock instead of making dividends therewith.

* * * * * *

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That the shares so purchased by said board shall be held in trust by it for the purposes herein declared, and shall be voted on by them at all subsequent meetings and elections, until, by the operation of the provisions of this act, all the shares standing in the name of others than the Government of the United States shall have been purchased up; and when the said shares shall have all been purchased, the same shall be transferred to the Government of the United States, on condition of said Government levying tolls for the use of said canal only sufficient to keep the same in repair and pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expenses, and make all necessary improvements so as fully to answer the purpose of its establishment.

On the 4th of July, 1842, the provisions of this act were duly accepted and ratified by the stockholders, &c., of the company, and the president and directors thereof were in substance authorized and directed to appropriate the net income arising from the canal to the purchase of the individual stock, instead of making dividends therewith, and to hold in trust and vote all shares of stock, so purchased from time to time, until by the operation of the provisions of this act all the shares standing in the name of owners other than the United States shall have been purchased up. And when the said shares have been purchased the same shall be transferred to the Government of the United States, on condition of said Government levying tolls for the use of said canal, only sufficient to keep the same in repair and pay for all necessary improvements, so as fully to answer the purposes of its establishment. Those proceedings were officially reported to the United States Government.

Now, the act of 1842 is plainly an executory contract by the State of Kentucky with the United States Government. The terms, conditions, and trusts of the act were substantially, though not formally, accepted by the latter, and in faith thereof money and property were invested and liability incurred from time to time by the United States. And from 1842 to this time not one dollar of dividend has ever been paid into the Federal Treasury.

Between the date of the act and the beginning of the year 1844, four hundred and forty-eight shares of the stock had been purchased and were held as directed therein, thus swelling the United States stock in the aggregate to the total of thirty-three hundred and seventy-three shares.

And on the 22d of February, 1844, was approved an act amending the previous act of 1842, by superadding to the rights and guarantees therein, the grant to the United States of jurisdiction over the canal, in the terms following, to wit:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company," approved January 21, 1842.

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That in the event of the United States becoming the sole owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal, the jurisdiction of this Commonwealth over said canal shall be yielded up to the Government of the United States.

By the two foregoing acts of Assembly both the ownership and jurisdiction of the canal were absolutely granted to the Government of the United States on the terms and for the objects recited in the act of 1842.

The application, in good faith, of the accruing dividends to the purchase of the designated stock regularly progressed until January, 1855, at which time the United States had become the owner of 9,995 shares of the stock, whereupon the company tendered the canal to the United States Government through the Secretary of the Treasury. The latter, in responding to the tender, stated that there had been no congressional legislation authorizing the acceptance of the management and control of the canal; and he requested the president and directors, five in number, to respectively retain one share thereof, and to continue to manage the canal pursuant to the charter until Congress should by appropriate legislation authorize the Department to formally receive it.

The canal board replied:

The canal is now ready to be transferred to the custody of the General Government so soon as the Department may be ready to receive it. The board of president and directors beg leave to say that they will cheerfully continue to direct the affairs of the work, as heretofore, so long as the Department may wish the same intrusted to their care.

And again:

In compliance with the request contained in your communication of the 24th ultimo, I would state that John Hulme, Charles H. Lewis, Charles W. Short, James Marshall, and J. H. Rhorer own each one share of the stock of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, making five shares; the remaining 9,995 shares are in the name of the United States. The individuals above named, making the board of president and directors, as provided by the charter and by-laws, will cheerfully continue to manage the work as long as it may remain unaccepted by the Government.

On the 8th of February, 1855, the Secretary of the Treasury by letter advised the President that—

The canal, with the exception of five shares, is now the property of the United States, and may, as Congress shall direct, be enlarged to suit the trade of the Ohio, as suggested by Mr. Hulme, from the tolls, or by surrendering the canal to the Commonwealth of Kentucky, on such terms as will secure the same object and make it free.

Under the authority of the Kentucky acts of Assembly of 1857, and of the joint resolution of Congress of May, 1860, the canal underwent important additions, enlargements, and improvements; to pay for which the company issued its bonds for $1,600,000 secured by mortgage on the canal, its franchises, tolls, and revenues. The proceeds of the bonds proved wholly inadequate to complete the work, and the United States Government, in conformity with its interests, trusts, and powers, pursuant to the Kentucky acts of 1842 and 1844, in order to complete the canal, appropriated and paid out of the United States Treasury the sums following, to wit:

In 1869, $178,200; July 11, 1870, $250,000; January 18, 1871, $200,000; March 3, 1871, $250,000; June 10, 1872, $300,000, and March 3, 1873, $100,000; making in the aggregate $1,278,200.

Subsequently, in the act of Assembly approved March 28, 1872, the State of Kentucky reiterated her official recognition of the relations of the Government of the United States to the Louisville and Portland Canal in the following terms, to wit:

Whereas the stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal belongs to the United States Government except five shares owned by the directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and said directors, under the authority of the Legislature of Kentucky and the United States, executed a mortgage to Isaac Caldwell and Dean Richmond to secure bonds named in said mortgage, some of which are out and unpaid, and said canal company may owe other debts; and whereas it is right and proper that the Government of the United States should assume the control and management of said canal: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of Kentucky, That the president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company are hereby authorized and directed to surrender the said canal, and all the property connected therewith, to the Government of the United States, &c.

In the mean time the receipts of the canal company for tolls from 1831 levied upon the capital, toil, and peril of the brave and enterprising men who float their vessels upon the Ohio River, exceeded in the aggregate the enormous sum of $5,507,247. The total cost of the canal is set down at $7,847,205, and it is officially stated to be actually worth more money as real estate.

The indebtedness of the company consists of 1,172 bonds for $1,000 each, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, in January and July. Three hundred and seventy-two of the bonds mature January, 1876; four hundred January, 1881; four hundred January, 1886, and their average price in the market is 85, 80, and 70 cents, respectively.

The existing rate of tolls is fifty cents per registered ton; whereas General Weitzel, in his report of September 9, 1872, to General Humphreys, United States Army, avers that seven cents per ton would furnish ample revenue for all the legitimate purposes of the canal.

Such is a brief recapitulation of material facts. It is most extraordinary that the Congress of the United States should have continued so long remiss in not consummating the mere formality of accepting by appropriate legislation the actual possession and control by its agents of the use and management of this work. I regret that gentlemen on this floor, so eminent for ability and probity, as to adorn public life, should still find difficulties in the way of such legislation. It seems to me such regret will be shared by every public man when he contemplates the monstrous wrong of subjecting the commerce which floats free over the great inland seas of the West, to a tribute of $350,000 per annum for floating through but two miles of artificial water-way belonging to the Government of the Union.

It is objected, I believe, mainly, that something indispensable remains to be done by the State of Kentucky to make complete and perfect her surrender of jurisdiction made by the acts of Assembly of 1842 and 1844. Her sovereignty and jurisdiction over the property and use of the canal were absolute. To surrender all she had to the United States in aid of the emancipation and enrichment of commerce was her voluntary act. It was an act of munificence, because it was disinterested and beneficent. She declared in 1844 "that in the event of the United States becoming the sole owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal, the jurisdiction of this Commonwealth over said canal shall be yielded up to the Government of the United States."

And, says Mr. Justice Miller, in August, 1872, in The United States vs. The Louisville and Portland Canal Company:

> The United States is the only stockholder of this corporation. The directors have really no personal interest in the corporation or its property.

The Government of the United States, in this case, the trustee of the river commerce of the Mississippi Valley, is the beneficiary of the grant. Hence if there yet was wanting some technical formality on the part of Kentucky, would it be becoming in any branch of this Government, especially this branch, in any juncture, but especially in a juncture like the present, where delay would be so unjust and disastrous and prompt action so useful to the great interests of commerce and the country, to impugn her character by distrusting her fidelity to her voluntary compact? Any presumption of bad faith in her, would be a presumption at once indecent and impossible; nor, I believe, has any such been suggested or entertained, and hence in no contingency can any loss or complications ensue from the passage of the act. For if something yet remains to be done, what ought to be done by her, must be considered as done. Any other conclusion would be unworthy of the spotless fame of Kentucky and of the official character of this body.

But I submit there is nothing in the question of imperfect jurisdiction in this Government, as the matter now stands, which should awaken concern. Manifestly it is not possible there could result any pecuniary loss to the United States; it is equally manifest a great burden may thereby be removed from a commerce and a class of men entitled to the highest consideration of which this Congress is capable.

The question of imperfect jurisdiction is therefore purely technical upon the one hand, and wholly vexatious upon the other. The acts of 1842 and 1844 are a contract, and the grant cannot be resumed by the Legislature, nor be modified, changed or canceled without the consent of the United States.

It has so often been decided by the Supreme Court that a grant by a State for a consideration received, or supposed to be received, that certain property-rights or franchises shall be exempt from taxation is a contract protected by section 10 of article 1 of the Federal Constitution; that the question can no longer be considered an open one. (Cooley on Limitations, 281, and cases cited.)

The Legislature of Georgia made a grant of land, and on an allegation that the grant had been obtained by fraud, a subsequent Legislature passed an act annulling and rescinding the first, and asserting the right of the State to the land involved. And Chief Justice Marshall in delivering the opinion of the court (in Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch) said:

> A contract is a compact between two or more parties, and is either executory or executed. An executory contract is one in which a party binds himself to do or not to do a particular thing. Such was the law under which the conveyance was made by the governor. A contract executed is one in which the object of the contract is performed; and this, says Blackstone, differs in nothing from a grant. The contract between Georgia and the purchasers was executed by the grant. A contract executed, as well as one which is executory, continues obligations binding on the parties. A grant, in its own nature, amounts to an extinguishment of the right of the grantor, and implies a contract not to reassert that right. A party is, therefore, always estopped by his own grant. Since then, in fact, a grant is a contract executed, the obligation of which still continues, and since the Constitution uses the general term "contract," without distinguishing between those which are executory and those which are executed, it must be construed to include the latter as well as the former. * * * If, under a fair construction of the Constitution, grants are comprehended under the term "contracts," is a grant from the State excluded from the operation of the provision? Is the clause to be considered as inhibiting the State from impairing the obligation of contracts between two individuals, but as excluding from that inhibition contracts made with itself? The words themselves contain no such distinction. They are general and are applicable to contracts of every description.

Contracts and grants made by a State are therefore within the reach of the constitutional prohibition. Says Mr. Justice Story, the question is not whether such contracts or grants are made by law in the form of legislation or in any other form, but whether they exist at all. The Legislature may make a grant, and when it is once made it remains irrevocable and it cannot be impaired.

> So the Legislature may make a contract * * * directly by law, pledging the State to a performance of it; and then, when it is accepted, it is equally under the protection of the Constitution.

Neither is a grant less a contract, though no beneficial interest accrues to the possessor, as in the case under consideration, where the United States has contracted not to use the grant for revenue.

It is well settled that a compact between two or more States is within the scope of the constitutional prohibition. Compact and contract are equivalents. When grants or propositions are offered by one State or government and agreed to and accepted by another State or government, they constitute a contract between the parties. Neither in reason nor in law, says Mr. Justice Story, is there any difference whereby to distinguish between contracts made by a State with individuals, and contracts made between States or governments. Each are equally inviolable.

This Government, therefore, is, and can be, in no condition to be hurt in any contingency. It is the great recipient in trust, by the magnanimous act of Kentucky, of this indispensable public work which has been built up and brought to its present magnitude and completeness, mainly by means of unjust and exhausting exactions upon the capital and industry of the hardy and enterprising navigators of the Ohio, its affluents and tributaries. By Kentucky the work was dedicated to free commerce. It was so accepted by this Government, and is so held by it, subject only to tolls equivalent to its use and preservation.

The Government cannot impair the bondholder's lien upon the franchise, tolls, and revenue of the canal, but with that exception it may do everything besides, in harmony with the trust, and to this there is one universal assent from all concerned, not excepting the president and directors of the canal. And surely the Government is able to take care of itself.

Throughout a period of now more than thirty years the legislation of Kentucky has been all the Government required. For now nearly twenty years—one-fifth of a century—this public work has been a standing tender to the Government. Throughout both periods has gone on with unrelenting obduracy the drain upon every pore of the commerce of the West. Appeal after appeal to this body has been made from year to year, and action as often deferred, without any apparent cause, other than unreasoning procrastination. Petitions, memorials, and deputations, from all over the valley of the West have, session after session, for a quarter of a century, poured in upon and beseeched the Legislature of the Union, and although beguiled by every promise of relief, still it has not yet come. The records and proceedings of this House and of the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol, are loaded with petitions, proofs, letters of heads of Departments, reports of engineers, correspondence, reports of committees, resolutions and bills, all recognizing the propriety and sound policy of this bill, and in the mean time generations have risen and fallen, and now, for the first time, the heroic navigators and oppressed commerce of the great inland seas of the West are to be postponed to a pigmy, in the form of a technicality. Such are the—

> ——whips and scorns of time,
> The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely.

Let technicality, if such there be now, wait; let commerce now advance. Let us be wise with speed and just without delay. Every consideration which ought to weigh with this Congress demands the passage of the pending bill in the form in which it comes from the Senate to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, there are three essential provisions in the bill now pending before the House to which I wish to call attention. They are, first, that after thirty days from the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall take possession of the Louisville and Portland Canal; second, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the outstanding bonds of the indebtedness of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company at maturity or may purchase them before maturity; and the third essential provision is, that the tolls to be charged upon vessels passing through the canal shall for the current year be at the rate of ten cents per ton, and after this year at such rate only as will pay the necessary expenses of operating the canal.

These three essential provisions have been so fully discussed in the two able reports that have been made in the two branches of this Congress and in the debate, that I shall deem it necessary to say but little upon the subject. It is very well understood that this canal is now controlled by a president and four directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and that they levy a charge of fifty cents per ton upon all tonnage passing through the canal. It now costs $500 to pass an ordinary sized empty steamer through this canal. This is such an enormous tax upon the commerce passing through the canal, that it is a great injustice to the State I have the honor in part to represent and to others similarly situated. Gentlemen from other States may possibly look with some complacency upon this burden imposed upon our commerce, but the people of Ohio, the people interested in the commerce that is to pass through this canal, cannot look with much satisfaction on it, nor the people who, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] says, are interested in the question of cheap transportation.

We erect light-houses upon our sea-board and maintain buoys and keep up a Navy in part for the benefit of our foreign commerce. Yet when we ask that our interior commerce shall be relieved of oppressive charges, we are met with efforts to delay and postpone the simple justice we seek, and in the mean time the trade between the West and South is crippled, to the serious disadvantage of millions of people and the commerce of the whole country. And now what is the ground of opposition to the bill? The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] who has discussed this subject with great ability, puts his opposition upon a single solitary ground. In his speech of the 31st of March he says:

> I have never objected, in committee or out of it, to the amount of money involved in the bill. I have placed my opposition from the outset simply upon the question of the cession of jurisdiction.

Mr. WHEELER. And there is where it is alone to-day.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Simply upon the objection that there is no sufficient cession by Kentucky to the United States of jurisdiction over the canal. I will endeavor to show, first, that this canal, in substance and in fact, is the property of the United States; secondly, that the jurisdiction of Kentucky over the canal has already been ceded to the United States; thirdly, that there remains no question of jurisdiction except between the United States and the president and four directors who compose the board of directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company; that there is in fact no question as between the United States and the State of Kentucky which is not already settled. If I am correct in these positions, then my friend from New York [Mr. WHEELER] will agree with me that his objection falls to the ground and that this bill ought to pass.

Then, first of all, does this canal belong to the United States? The Louisville and Portland Canal Company was incorporated by an act of the Kentucky Legislature passed January 12, 1825. Its original capital was $600,000, afterward increased, until in 1831 the company was authorized to issue stock sufficient in amount to complete the canal. By the original charter the affairs of the company were to be managed by a board of directors, including a president and four other members. Under acts of Congress of 1826 and 1829 the Government of the United States subscribed for 2,335 shares of $100 each of the capital stock of the company. To these were added by an adjustment of interest accounts 567 shares, so that in 1833 the Government had 2,902 shares of the stock. In 1842 the individual shares of stock amounted to 7,098. Thus stood the rights of the United States and the rights of individual stockholders up to 1842.

In 1842 the Legislature of Kentucky, by the act of February 21, authorized the directors of this company, whenever the stockholders should consent, to sell to the United States all the shares owned by individuals in this canal company. The act provided that—

> When the said shares shall all have been purchased, the same shall be transferred to the Government of the United States, on condition of said Government levying tolls for the use of said canal only sufficient to keep the same in repair, and pay all necessary superintendence, custody, expenses, &c.

Here, then, was the proposition to the United States made by the State of Kentucky. It was in brief, that the directors might, with the consent of the stockholders, sell out the shares of this company, so that the Government of the United States should become the exclusive owners of the shares, and thereupon all jurisdiction of Kentucky over the canal should ipso facto be ceded to the United States.

In pursuance of the authority conferred by that act of the Legislature and by acts of Congress between 1842 and 1855, the Government became the owner of 9,995 shares of this company—all of the shares except only five. At the instance of the Secretary of the Treasury five gentlemen retained one share each of stock of the company for the sole purpose of keeping up the corporate organization and managing the canal for the United States—not for themselves. It was a part of the arrangement that the United States should at all times have the right to take and pay for these five shares and assume possession and control of the canal in any form Congress might require. Practically, then, the United States became sole owner of this canal company and its property; practically, then, when these five directors assumed possession of the canal at the instance of the United States and for the benefit of the Government, the United States were not only owners of the canal, but the possession of it was in the United States under that act of the Legislature of Kentucky and in pursuance of acts of Congress.

Here, then, is title absolute in the United States. As between the State of Kentucky and the United States the possession was in the United States. The Government of the United States is a corporation; it can only take possession through agents. The maxim applies, "qui facit per alium facit per se." When these directors held this property for and at the instance of the Government of the United States the possession was that of the United States.

It has been already conceded in this debate that it has been determined by Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court, in August, 1872, that this canal was the property of the United States. But, Mr. Speaker, there is more than that. This canal company in 1855 made a report in which they conceded that this canal was the property of the United States. I read from that report:

> The canal is now ready to be transferred to the custody of the General Government as soon as the Department may be prepared to receive it. The board of president and directors beg leave to say that they will cheerfully continue to direct the affairs of the work as heretofore so long as the Department may wish the same intrusted to their care.

How, then, in legal contemplation and effect, did they hold and manage it? For themselves? No; for the United States, and at the instance of the Secretary of the Treasury. They were the mere agents or trustees of the United States.

Again, the Legislature of Kentucky has by the joint resolution of March 28, 1872, conceded that this canal is the property of the United States. I beg to read a single passage from that joint resolution:

> Whereas all the stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal belongs to the United States Government—

That is the declaration of the Kentucky Legislature—

> except five shares owned by the directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and said directors, under the authority of the legislation of Kentucky and the United States, executed a mortgage to Isaac Caldwell and Dean Richmond to secure bonds named in said mortgage, some of which are out and unpaid, and said canal company may owe other debts; and whereas it is right and proper that the Government of the United States should assume the control and management of said canal.

That, sir, is the solemn confession of the Kentucky Legislature conceding the ownership to be in the United States and declaring it right and proper that the Government should at once assume the control and management of said canal. No question was made as to who had possession. The directors had possession for the United States. Their possession was the possession of the United States. The Legislature declared it right and proper that the Government should assume (now mark the words) "control and management;" that is, take the management from the directors and put it in the hands of other Government officers. This is a concession that what the Government had done was done in pursuance of and in acceptance of the provisions of the act of January 21, 1842, and the amendatory act of February 21, 1844. The whole history of the transactions proves this to have been so. It proves that the Government intended to accept, and did accept, the grant made by these acts. Kentucky so regarded it from 1842 to 1872. After the United States have invested in this canal $1,759,262 between the time of the passage of the act of February 21, 1842, and the year 1855—when upon the faith of the legislation of Kentucky, and at the instance of that State, the Government of the United States has invested this vast sum of money in this canal and made itself the absolute owner, by the concession of the Legislature with a declaration that it is right the United States should "assume the control and management of said canal," the State of Kentucky can never afterward turn round and say that the Government of the United States has not acquired absolute jurisdiction over this property. The jurisdiction of Kentucky has been surrendered; it is at an end.

Sir, it seems to me that this is the end of the controversy if we may rely on history, on what the Kentucky Legislature has done, on what the Government has done, on what the last utterance of the Kentucky Legislature acknowledges. And I insist that sound policy and justice to the commercial welfare of the Western States interested in the Ohio River require that we should pass this bill, assume the the management and control of this canal, and reduce the enormous tonnage charges that are piled upon our commerce, so that this enterprise shall no longer be made the means of oppressing the industries of the West and South.

The bill declares that the Government will now assume the control under the Kentucky acts of 1842 and 1844. These surrender the jurisdiction of that State.

Kentucky cannot object even now to an acceptance of those acts if they had not already been accepted by the acts of the Government and by the laws of the United States. Time does not run against the United States. Kentucky can interpose no such objection. But if time could run against the Government as to the right to accept the acts of 1842 and 1844 in case there had been no act of acceptance or performance, no such question can be made now. There has been not merely "part performance," but full performance long since of all conditions imposed by those acts.

The joint resolution of Congress of May 24, 1860, authorizing bonds to be issued by the canal company was an exercise of right and over the title of the corporation which was declaratory of the rights of the Government. The fact that from 1842 to 1872 Kentucky never asserted any claim of jurisdiction as against the United States is sufficient evidence that no right or jurisdiction existed in that State.

And now, let me ask, how will it improve the rights of the United States to continue the present order of affairs? Since Kentucky, by the act of 1872, has ventured to impose new conditions and assert a power to do so, her pretensions should be met at once and unequivocally, not by asking her to surrender a jurisdiction she has not but by asserting the rights which the United States have.

Let the South and West be relieved of exorbitant tolls. Let justice be done to their commerce. They demand it as a right; they do not ask it as a favor. And it may as well be understood now and henceforth that the agricultural interest of the South and West will demand their rights, will insist upon legislation to secure all their great interests and industries, and will accept of nothing less.

It was not my purpose to speak on this subject until a few moments since, but I could not remain silent without peril to great interests committed in part to my care.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I shall say but a few words bearing on the legal aspects of this case. I think it will be sufficient for my purpose if I call the attention of the House to the recent steps taken by Congress in this matter. First, let it be remembered that on the 3d of March, 1873, after a full understanding of the merits of the public interests involved, Congress agreed to appropriate whatever sum of money was found necessary to pay off all the old debts of the canal company and assume absolute and complete control of the property, for the purpose of making free the navigation of the Ohio River. This is the first legislative fact to which I wish to refer. By the almost unanimous voice of Congress it was conceived to be of the highest public importance that such a large appropriation should be made for the great object of making a thousand miles of river tributary to the Mississippi free for the commerce of so many States.

When the Secretary of the Treasury came to put this law in force he discovered that there were some technical difficulties in the way of using the million and a quarter of dollars appropriated; and in his letter of December 1, 1873, he laid before this House the facts, and stated that further legislation was necessary to enable him to make the payment and secure the freedom of the river. To that end the Senate took up the question. In that body there was introduced and passed by a nearly unanimous vote a bill which in their judgment was sufficient to clear up all the difficulties of the question raised by the Secretary of the Treasury—to enable the United States to occupy fully and completely this work, to own absolutely the franchises of the canal and open it to free navigation.

Coming to the House, that bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce, was there considered, and was brought back to the House upon a report made by that committee. In the House it was proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] to add a proviso which should make the rights of the United States more certainly secure. Some of us, who thought that this proviso would take too much time and delay the accomplishment of the great object desired, voted for another proviso offered by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] which would give the Government immediate possession of the work and still secure all the rights of other parties. That was voted down; and rather than pay the whole amount of money, with no security for the complete ownership of this great property—fearing there might be trouble in the view exhibited in the speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] the House voted to adopt his proviso. I was among those who voted for it; and I did so out of abundant caution, to protect the interests of the United States from any trouble in the future.

I did not feel sure that so stringent a proviso was necessary, but I did think that some security against after claims was needed. Those members of the House who had not carefully studied the subject did as I did, and voted for it as a matter of abundant caution. Since that time our bill has gone back to the Senate. It has been there referred to a committee—one of the ablest committees of that body—and they have made a report, (Senate report No. 270,) which I hold in my hand. Accompanied by this report the bill was reported to the Senate and acted on after several days of careful debate, and now comes back to us with a new section and an amendment, which the Senate committee and the Senate themselves believe protect the rights of all the parties concerned and opens the canal to immediate public use.

I have read the report of the Senate committee, and I am disposed to believe the Senate amendments adequately protect the interests of all concerned; and by passing the bill as it comes to us from the Senate, referring to the courts, as the new section of the Senate proposes, all questions that may arise on the subject, I am disposed to believe that the rights and interests of the United States as well as the rights of the State of Kentucky and of this corporation will be secured. In view of these facts I hope the House will concur in the amended bill as it comes from the Senate.

The motion of my friend from New York [Mr. WHEELER] to recommit to the Committee on Commerce is one which ought not to prevail, and for this reason: if it goes to the Committee on Commerce, it is next to impossible that it can be reported back this session. If it goes to the Committee on Commerce with the other bills and business of the House pressing upon us, we may almost consider the bill defeated. I am sure the gentleman from New York would not do the injustice of putting this bill in a situation where the House cannot act upon it soon; and I therefore hope he will withdraw that motion and let the bill take its fate in the House and now.

From the examination I have been able to give it, I shall vote against all measures which delay action on this bill. I shall vote for the amendments of the Senate, believing thereby the rights and interests of all parties may be secured, and that they will enable us to open the Ohio to freedom of navigation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield now, for five minutes of my time, to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER.]

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible, of course, in five minutes to discuss or meet at any length the legal argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.] I am very sorry I am not permitted in this discussion to have more time. But as it seems impossible, I must be content with what I can get. I propose, therefore, to confine my remarks to two or three points which seem to me to be the basis, and the entire basis, of the objections urged by the gentleman from New York to the passage of the bill in the form in which it has returned from the Senate.

It will be seen, sir, that the Senate committee have stricken out the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York requiring the House to have additional legislation at the hands of the State of Kentucky, and that they have added to the bill an additional section authorizing the district attorney of the United States to appear for the United States as terre tenant pro forma in case it ever becomes necessary for the holders of the bonds to foreclose their mortgage. This is a matter of abundant precaution so far as the rights of the bondholders are concerned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the great objection to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York which has been stricken out by the Senate and to the modified form of the amendment which I am informed by himself he proposes to introduce is, that it is entirely inconsistent with the substance of the bill; that it embarrasses the operation of the bill by placing us at the mercy of any lobby which the five directors in the city of Louisville may choose to send to the Legislature of Kentucky, and still further, that it recognizes what we utterly deny, that the State of Kentucky by its Legislature has any right whatever to impose conditions upon the cession which they have already made and under which the United States has expended its money and obtained possession in 1855 of the stock representing this canal property. It is inconsistent with the second section of the bill, which provides for taking possession of this property under the act of the Legislature of Kentucky in the year 1844 and this amendment in any form in which it is placed puts us at the mercy of further legislation on the part of the State of Kentucky.

Now, the only objection which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] has been able to urge with any kind of success to the interpretation which the Committee on Commerce, or a majority of them and the committee in the Senate, have given to the acts of 1842 and 1844, is that under these two acts the Legislature of the State of Kentucky still retains authority to determine what should be the amount levied upon the commerce passing through the canal. The gentleman has said that the matter is so plain that a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein; and I think he is right about that.

The act of 1842, in its fourth section, says:

> And further to protect and guard the interests of commerce, the superintendents or agents in charge of said canal shall ever hereafter, on the first Monday in January, annually report to the General Assembly of Kentucky the amount of tolls levied and received.

In the act of 1844 they expressly repealed that portion of the act. The only purpose of that report was, that by that report the Legislature of Kentucky should determine whether the tolls were in excess of what was proper or not. They expressly repealed it, and conceded the absolute and complete jurisdiction of the canal to the United States.

Sir, the gentleman has submitted another proposition to which I desire to call attention just for a moment. It is this: He said in his speech on that occasion that—

> The fallacy of this bill rests in this, that the United States have become the proprietor of all the shares except five shares; a fact, Mr. Speaker, which has never been conceded by the Legislature of Kentucky, and a fact which has been persistently, and I say legally, denied by the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

Mr. Speaker, if that is a fact I will agree to join with the gentleman in his proposition. I say, on the contrary, that I am prepared to prove, by the direct reports that have been made by this corporation and by the direct action of the State of Kentucky, that neither one of these propositions has the slightest foundation in fact. In 1855 the United States had acquired possession of this property; that is, they had acquired possession of all the stock; and in that year Mr. Secretary Guthrie states in his report:

> The canal is now ready to be transferred to the custody of the General Government so soon as the Department may be prepared to receive it.
>
> The canal, with the exception of the five shares, is now the property of the United States—

The property of the United States—> and may, as Congress shall direct, be enlarged to suit the trade of the Ohio, as suggested by Mr. Hulme, (in an accompanying letter,) from the tolls, or by surrendering the canal to the Commonwealth of Kentucky on such terms as will secure the same object and make it free.

And in April, 1856, the following year—I am talking as rapidly as I can, because I want to get in as much as possible—in April, 1856, we have this report, and I call the attention of the gentleman from New York to it because it has not yet been referred to at all. In the report the Treasury Department made in 1856, Mr. Guthrie says:

This latter provision was repealed in 1844—

Referring to the provision I have mentioned—and without any action of Congress upon the subject the net receipts of the canal were from time to time applied to the purchase of the private stock as provided in the act of 1842, and as purchased the stock was transferred on the books of the company to the United States.

That is the statement of Mr. Guthrie.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I hope my colleague will be allowed five minutes more. He represents the great city of Cincinnati, and ought to have a hearing on this question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection to the extension of the gentleman's time—on the understanding that the extension will not be deducted from the time allowed for the whole debate.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I am obliged to the House for its courtesy. Mr. Guthrie says further:

In January, 1855, the net receipts of the canal were sufficient to purchase the balance of the private stock, and all was purchased and transferred to the United States, except five shares left standing—one in the name of the president, and one in the name of each of the directors of the canal. This was done at the instance of the Treasury Department, for the purpose of keeping up the corporate organization of the canal for its management until Congress directed what disposition should be made of it.

But the gentleman may say that is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now I call his attention to the report made by the president of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, James Marshall, dated December 31, 1855, after these shares had been purchased. I read from the first volume Executive Documents, Thirty-fourth Congress, 1855 and 1856. The president says in his report to Mr. Guthrie:

In compliance with the request contained in your communication of the 24th ultimo, I would state that John Hulme, Charles H. Lewis, Charles W. Short, James Marshall, and J. H. Rhorer own each one share of the stock of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, making five shares; the remaining 9,995 shares are in the name of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that was in 1855 and in 1856, just after these events had occurred. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Guthrie, makes the positive, unqualified statement that this is now the property of the United States. The president of the company makes the same statement. They state directly that the stock has been transferred on the books of the company into the name of the United States. And it was not, sir, until 1867, when this same Mr. James Guthrie, who made that report when he was Secretary of the Treasury, had become the president of this canal company, that he found the quibble which he made and which has been used and quoted on the floor of the House by the gentleman from New York.

And now, sir, as to the Legislature of the State of Kentucky. In the act of the 28th day of March, 1872, what do they say? The gentleman from New York has said that the 9,995 shares had never been recognized by them as belonging to the United States. On the contrary, the entire legislation of the State of Kentucky has recognized it, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and the canal company itself recognized it, until the time came when it became very valuable property to them, and they determined to hold on to it by technicalities and quibbles as long as they could.

In this act of 1872 the Legislature say, at the very beginning of the bill, which the gentleman from New York omitted from his speech:

Whereas all the stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal belongs to the United States Government except five shares owned by the directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and said directors, under the authority of the legislation of Kentucky and the United States, executed a mortgage to Isaac Caldwell and Dean Richmond to secure bonds named in said mortgage, some of which are out and unpaid, and said canal company may owe other debts; and whereas it is right and proper that the Government of the United States should assume the control and management of said canal.

And, Mr. Speaker, since this legislation has been pending in Congress the Louisville and Portland Canal Company have held a meeting, at which they adopted the following preamble and resolution, among others:

Whereas the board have seen from reported proceedings in Congress that the members of this board have there been represented as opposing the effort now and heretofore made to have the General Government pay the debts of the canal and render it free: Therefore,

Resolved, That such statement is untrue and wholly without foundation. For many years this board has been anxious, and is now anxious, to surrender the canal to the Government, has repeatedly offered to do so, and is now willing and ready to do so, upon being acquitted of their liability to the creditors of the company.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say that I have given this matter considerable attention since it was considered here some time ago, and I have become entirely satisfied that the two objections then made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] are to a great extent merely technical, and one of them is now obviated by the Senate amendment to the bill now before us.

I believe that the State of Kentucky has intended to cede complete jurisdiction to the United States in the contingency that we are now about to consummate, and that no possible fear need be apprehended that she will act in any way different from the spirit of her legislation on this subject.

If any doubt exists (which I do not concede) that existing legislation does not give the United States full and complete jurisdiction, for one, I am willing to trust the State of Kentucky to give us the full measure of jurisdiction that even the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] may require.

This whole subject has been thoroughly and exhaustively examined and discussed in another place, and before a body of seventy-four men as intelligent as any body of men in the world. In this body of men but four were found to dissent from the proposition as now presented to us.

Mr. Speaker, imperfectly understanding this subject when it was up before, I voted against it. Now, after careful consideration, I shall give the bill before us my cordial support.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall scarcely want that time. Like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] who has just preceded me, I voted with the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] when this bill was before the House, and have made up my mind that duty requires me to vote the other way now. I have read a very able report upon the subject from a citizen of my own State in whose judgment I have great confidence, and whose report made to another body controls my own judgment.

I believe that the commerce of the country demands the earliest possible reduction of all charges upon water carriage. In the interim there has been made in the other branch of Congress a report on transportation which shows the overwhelming importance to all the industries of this country of reducing the charges in every direction upon the cheaper mode of carriage, a mode which, prorating with railroads, is often at the rate of five to one in favor of water carriage. I fear that to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce would delay action upon it at least until the next session of Congress. I do not believe that, with the best disposition on the part of that Committee on Commerce in the world to report it again during this session, it could be done; and for these reasons, or rather I may say for the reasons presented in the report to which I have alluded, I shall vote against any commitment, and for the Senate bill as it stands.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANDIFORD.]

Mr. STANDIFORD. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was before the House for consideration a short time since the gentleman from New York proposed an amendment by the operation of which the provisions of the bill for the relief of the commerce of the Ohio River were postponed in their execution until the next meeting of the Kentucky Legislature, which does not take place until nearly two years, which was, as I at the time on this floor alleged, an ingenious attempt to kill the bill. His amendment was defeated in the Senate by an almost unanimous vote, and he now comes and presents one of a similar character for our consideration again.

What was, I consider, an unprecedented accomplishment on the part of a member, the gentleman obtained the closing hour and refused to give any one a chance to reply to his assumptions of fact or to show to the House how utterly at variance with the true state of the case his arguments were. His objection to the immediate passage of the bill was based upon the failure of a full cession of jurisdiction by the State of Kentucky to the United States, and of her authority over and about the property of this canal. Of course he admitted, as he had to do, the solemn acts of the Legislature of 1842 and 1844, to which I have heretofore referred, and of course he admitted, as he had to do, that the earnings of the original stock of the United States had been devoted to purchasing the stock of private individuals in this canal company, until all the stock had been absorbed by the earnings of the stock of the United States, and yet out of this condition of affairs he attempted to show that the United States could not take anything except what she originally purchased by money appropriated for that purpose. I would like to ask the gentleman who is entitled to that stock if the United States is not; and if the United States is entitled to the stock, who has a right to interfere in her management of the property represented by that stock? The gentleman is a lawyer; I am not; but I would like to know what is to prevent the United States from assuming possession of this canal property at once.

By permission of Kentucky, the Government through its agents have become possessed of all the stock of the company, except five shares which they held once but returned to the five directors in order that they might keep up the company until it should suit the convenience of the Government to take permanent possession and control. But, says the gentleman, that permission was accompanied by certain provisions and conditions that the Government must fulfill and be subject to. Does the gentleman, who is a lawyer and represents the district of Silas Wright, wish to be understood as advocating the right of a State to tax or in any way control the property of the United States? If he does, and is correct, we would thank him to demonstrate it, because the custom-house and post-office building in my city would make a valuable addition to the tax returns, and the taxation of United States bonds would materially reduce the tariff upon other articles of personal property; and would the gentleman kindly suggest a court having jurisdiction to render judgment affecting the property, or competent to issue execution against it?

Mr. Speaker, these five directors of this canal company hold their rights, as has been well said by the gentleman from Ohio, only as trustees of a naked trust for the benefit of the United States, and which may be terminated at any time, and that is the object of this bill. But it is not my object to make a legal argument in reply to the gentleman from New York; there are other friends of the bill upon this floor who are learned in the law and can answer technicality by technicality, and to them I leave this branch of the subject.

The gentleman, with a magnanimity which is truly commendable, it being so very uncalled-for, assumed the championship of Kentucky, much to the astonishment of her delegation in this House, especially in finding a champion from so near to our Canadian border. It happened, however, that Kentucky's Representatives voted unanimously in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman, and they are still of the opinion that they are the representatives of the wishes of the people of that State. Kentucky does not need any champion, and especially such a champion as dares to impugn her good faith in giving up this property to the United States and who charges duplicity in the conduct of her public officers, as did the gentleman in respect to the attorney of Louisville in his opinion against the right of Louisville to tax this canal property.

The city of Louisville asks, and I submit it to this House if it is not a reasonable demand on her part, for police jurisdiction over the portion of the city occupied by the canal property. The canal company owns a large amount of real estate within the city limits, and, as in all cities of commercial importance bordering upon a navigable river, the population in the vicinity is infested with a wandering class who make their living off from steamboats and who require a large share of the attention of the guardians of the peace. Now, I ask is it the sense of this House that every time an arrest of this character is to be made a United States marshal must be sent for? Truly, if that is the case, the real estate of the Louisville and Portland Canal will be a paradise for thieves.

Again, Louisville desires to have the privilege of drainage into the canal. As this canal extends between her and her river front for two miles and as she has always used the canal as a means of drainage without injury to navigation, and if compelled to forego the privilege would be compelled to extend drains for two miles parallel with the canal, I do not think that it will be the sense of the House to compel her to do so. Another thing; Louisville desires the privilege of building bridges over the canal at such points as she may deem necessary, but as the privilege is asked only on condition that it shall not interfere with navigation it ought not to be considered an unreasonable request, and I do not think that the objection should come from gentlemen who voted in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York on the grounds of protecting and caring for navigation, since by their votes they said that they desired to maintain the burden of this toll indefinitely upon that very same commerce. None of the people who are interested in the trade of the Ohio River think that the demands of Louisville are unjust or even unreasonable, and if they do not protest I see no reason why gentlemen who are so utterly unaffected by whatever may be the results should protest for them.

The Ohio Valley is asking for the passage of this bill. Why should we longer delay or interpose quibbling objections and take up the time of the House in matters that are of no importance?

Mr. Speaker, one word more and I am done. As I said before in discussing this bill, Kentucky will do anything required for her to do to give validity to or quiet the title of this canal property in the United States. She has promised to do this, and when Kentucky promises she keeps her word. No one can show in her whole history any violated pledges or broken faith on her part. Her honor as a State is as faithfully guarded as her citizens guard their individual honor, and will be as bravely and fearlessly maintained. I am sorry that it has been suggested that Kentucky would enter into a quibbling contest over this property which she has pledged to the United States, and can only say to those who make such assertions, or to those who believe them, you do not know the people of Kentucky.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STANARD.]

Mr. FORT. Before the gentleman from Missouri proceeds, will he allow me to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question?

Mr. STANARD. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. FORT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether the drainage of the city of Louisville into the canal has heretofore in any manner obstructed the navigation of the canal?

Mr. STANDIFORD. Not at all; in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. STANARD. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to speak upon this question in the House when it came back from the Senate, and now I find that I have only five minutes in which to discuss it; but I believe that the matter has been discussed long enough in the Senate and in the House for us to understand how to vote intelligently upon it.

I believe that the only thing in the way of concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the House amendments to this bill is the question as to whether or not the State of Kentucky has ceded its jurisdiction over this canal. That, it seems to me, is the only thing that has been thought to be in the way from the beginning of this discussion. It is enough for me, sir, that the Senate of the United States came to the conclusion on the bill as it first came in here that the State of Kentucky had ceded its jurisdiction, and came to that conclusion by a very large majority. But, sir, when the bill came into the House it was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and a minority of that committee were of opinion that there should be further legislative action on the part of the State of Kentucky, and the House concurred in that view of the minority of the Committee on Commerce, and sent the bill back to the Senate. The Senate has heard the matter carefully again, and to meet the views of the minority of the House committee they made the amendments now before us by an almost unanimous vote—I am told that there were only four votes against the amendments. I say it is enough for me that this consideration has been had upon this subject, and that many of those who are much better able than I am to judge of the legal status of the matter have come to the conclusion that there are no legal barriers in the way of the passage of this bill.

As to the desirability of its passage there can be no question. The Ohio River has nearly one thousand miles of navigation, and for half a century or more those interested in the commerce of that river have been agitating the subject of having what obstructions there were in the river removed, so that they could have free and uninterrupted commerce. The Government of the United States, desiring that they should have this free commerce, has expended about one and a half million dollars in the improvement of the worst rapids in that river, and about the only obstruction there is in its navigation. But now, sir, it turns out that the one and a half million dollars or more which have been expended have resulted in an absolute obstruction of the navigation of the Ohio River, and that that sum might as well have been expended in placing the stones which have been used in constructing this canal across the river, so far as practical matters are concerned, as to have built this canal, from the simple fact that the tolls are so high upon the canal that they are a prohibition upon commerce. Those tolls amount to fifty cents per registered ton of the vessels passing each way.

When it is considered that the steamers running up the river are seldom loaded, and that steamers, barges, and other craft running down the river are not more than half loaded, this toll in the aggregate up and down the river will be found to amount to perhaps $1.50 per ton upon the commerce upon the river. Now, it is not strange that the people along the Ohio River are getting impatient, and that they send here their leading men—mayors of cities, presidents of chambers of commerce—loaded down with petitions asking that the people who have been taxed $1,500,000, and whose money has been expended for improving this river, shall now at this late day reap some of the benefits of that expenditure. I hope, therefore, that the House will pass the bill as it comes from the Senate and not recommit it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.]

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I ask my colleague to yield long enough to allow me to have read resolutions of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce upon this subject.

Mr. BANNING. I will do so.

The Clerk read as follows:

CINCINNATI CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Merchants' Exchange, March 28, 1874.

At a regular session of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce held this day the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas we learn from the dispatches from Washington that members of the Committee on Commerce are not favorable to the Government taking possession of the Louisville and Portland Canal until further legislation on the part of the State of Kentucky; and whereas the action of the Kentucky Legislature heretofore was intended and does cede the property to the United States upon the sole condition that the debts be provided for; and whereas we have good reason to believe that objection to immediate action on the part of Congress is inspired directly or indirectly by parties at Louisville who gain advantages by retaining control of the canal; and whereas the Kentucky Legislature will not meet again for two years, and the commerce of the Ohio River has already been too long oppressed by the heavy tolls collected on a canal owned virtually by the Government of the United States: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, That simple justice to the commerce of the Ohio Valley requires that the Government should take immediate possession of the canal and reduce the tolls.

"Resolved, That copies of these proceedings be transmitted to our Representatives in Congress from this county and also to Senators SHERMAN and THURMAN."

[SEAL.] S. F. COVINGTON,
President.

Mr. BANNING. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that the study and consideration given to this subject have enabled members of the House to better understand the rights of the Government of the United States in the matter of the property of the Louisville and Portland Canal. When the bill was defeated in this House a few days since I felt that it had been wrongfully defeated, that it was defeated by the votes of members who did not fully understand the rights of the Government in that property. The debate to-day shows that further consideration has convinced many members of the necessity of the passage of this bill.

After a careful study and consideration of the able speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] when this bill was under consideration before, to which we were not permitted to reply, I come to the conclusion that he is mistaken, and do not find in his speech a single reason why the Government of the United States should not take possession of and control this canal.

The argument of the honorable gentleman could not be answered when this bill was under consideration in the House before, because he then claimed the right, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, to close the debate against the bill, although a majority of his committee were in favor of the bill and recommended its passage to the House.

All his objections then made have, however, been more than answered to-day, and I will not detain the House by again answering his objections, which have all been fully answered both by my colleage, [Mr. SAYLER,] and by the two gentlemen from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR and Mr. STANDIFORD.] I will state, however, for the information of the House that the claim of the Campbell heirs that the title to this property was in them, and which was urged by the gentleman as one of the objections to the passage of this bill, is no longer an obstacle in our way, the court of Kentucky having decided against this claim on Thursday of last week.

Now, sir, as I have but a few minutes left, I wish to call the attention of the House to the management of the canal, which shows the five directors of the company, from whose reports the gentleman from New York quoted in his able speech, have strong pecuniary reasons for resisting the passage of this bill, and holding on to the control of the canal.

The owners of the five shares of stock are J. F. Speed, E. Lockhart, J. W. Henning, J. Caperton, and J. H. Rohrer.

The board of directors consists of the following-named gentlemen:

J. F. Speed is president, with a salary of $1,000 a year; John Caperton is vice-president, with a salary of $1,000 a year; J. W. Henning is treasurer, with a salary of $1,000 a year; E. Lockhart is superintendent, with a salary of $3,000 a year; and J. H. Rohrer is secretary, with a salary of $1,500 a year.

Each one of the owners of the five shares of stock is a director in the company; each one of these five directors is a salaried officer in the company; and the joint salary of these five directors is the snug sum of $7,500 per annum.

A further inquiry into the affairs of this company shows that J. Smith Speed is the assistant superintendent, at a salary of $3,000 a year; Hon. James Speed is counsel and attorney, at a retaining salary of $500 a year; showing that Hon. James Speed, J. F. Speed, and J. Smith Speed are three officers of this company, drawing $4,500 regular annual salary. The assistant superintendent receives $3,000 a year, and the collector receives $1,800 a year; making the sum of $12,300 paid annually to the officers of this company. All the other employés of the canal are put down at $31,212, and contingencies at $22,000.

A gentleman who has given much attention to this subject says:

All the other employés are put at $31,212, and contingencies at $22,000. I mention all these to show that $66,000, salaries and all, is the amount which they consider necessary to keep up the canal and all this work—a two-mile canal upon which the tolls for 1873 are estimated by General Weitzel at $350,000.

In addition to that, that I may do no injustice to anybody, I wish to state further who the directors are, and what I find in a letter, a copy of which I have before me, on file in the Treasury Department. The directors now are Joshua T. Speed, Jonas H. Rhorer, James W. Henning, Enos Lockhart and John Caperton, and in this letter on file in the Treasury Department this statement is made: that these five gentlemen who are the directors in the canal company are also directors in a savings-bank in Louisville where the tolls received by this canal are deposited, and the letter shows by reference to the report made by Mr. Gallagher, in 1867, that the cash balances that have been in the treasury of that company, beginning in 1841, were then $54,440, and in 1867 were $239,853, making an average of over $90,000 in the years intervening between 1854 and 1867; and as the tolls are being increased every year, the natural supposition is that the balance that they have to use in their savings-bank is over $200,000 of the Government money.

Taking these facts into consideration, Mr. Speaker, we discover the reason why these gentlemen, the five shareholders who hold their stock, being the directors, managers, and salaried officers, each and every one of them at the mere sufferance of the United States, are not only willing to hold on, but determined to remain if they can.

Mr. Speaker, the opponents to the passage of this bill have but one authority to sustain them, that is, the reports of the owners of the five shares in this canal.

These five shareholders are the only persons who are opposed to the Government taking possession of and controlling the canal. The State of Kentucky by repeated acts of her Legislature, the city of Louisville by ordinance of her common council, the two United States Senators from Kentucky by their arguments and votes, the entire Kentucky delegation in this House, the people of Kentucky in every way that it is possible for them to speak, ask the passage of this bill; while the people of the Ohio and the Mississippi Valleys, whose revenues go far toward the support of this Government, whose votes upon this floor are always given to every just and reasonable appropriation for the benefit of eastern commerce, demand the passage of this bill and the reduction of the unreasonable and unjust tolls levied upon their trade.

This bill should have been made a law long ago; and I hope that from the result of our vote I may announce to my constituents to-night that this Congress has performed an act of long-delayed justice in the interest of their commerce.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to consume the very few minutes I have left by having again read to the House some paragraphs which I fear were not fully heard. The first is an extract from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to this House on the 1st of April, 1856.

The Clerk read as follows:

In January, 1855, the net receipts of the canal were sufficient to purchase the balance of the private stock, and all who purchased and transferred to the United States except five shares left standing, one in the name of the president and one in the name of each of the directors of the canal. That was done at the instance of the Treasury Department for the purpose of keeping up the corporate organization of the canal for its management until Congress directed what disposition should be made of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the House will observe the fact that as far back as April, 1856, it was reported to Congress that all the shares of this stock except five not only had been purchased but had been transferred to the United States.

My friend from New York will perceive that the main argument on which the House acted in adopting his amendment is thus entirely overthrown. The shares were not held in trust by these five directors, but were transferred to the United States. Now I ask the Clerk to read another paragraph which I have marked—an extract from the report made on the 14th of April in the same year by the board of directors, showing that according to their judgment the Government had obtained the absolute ownership of these ninety-nine hundred and ninety-five shares of stock.

The Clerk read as follows:

In compliance with the request contained in your communication of the 24th ultimo, I would state that John Hulme, Charles H. Lewis, Charles W. Short, James Marshall, and J. H. Rohrer own each one share of the stock of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, making five shares; the remaining ninety-nine hundred and ninety-five shares are in the name of the United States. The individuals above named, making the board of president and directors as provided by the charter and by-laws, will cheerfully continue to manage the work as long as it may remain unaccepted by the Government. They have not received any advance or part of the share they each hold. The amended charter of the company fixes the price of the shares, according to which they are this day worth each $267.

Mr. HOLMAN. As a mere matter of convenience, and with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, these five shares were retained. The other shares, constituting the body of the capital stock, were transferred to the United States and are held by the General Government. Therefore the opinion expressed by Justice Miller in deciding the case referred to was unquestionably correct; the Government was in fact the owner of this work. The then Secretary of the Treasury, himself a distinguished citizen of Kentucky, says in the same report that his understanding, as well as the understanding of all the parties at the time, was that by the act of the State of Kentucky of 1844 the jurisdiction over this work had been ceded to the United States.

One word as to the position of this bill. My friend from New York knows well that if the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce it will be virtually a defeat of the measure. He also knows that the majority of that committee think the measure should pass in its present form. I think I am justified in saying that a majority of the committee regard the action of the Senate upon this subject as entirely proper and just. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the House will concur in the amendments of the Senate. If it be proper at the present time, I make a motion to concur in those amendments.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. MONROE.) The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has expired.

Mr. WHEELER obtained the floor.

Mr. STANDIFORD. I desire to present the report of the board of directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, dated April 22, 1874.

Mr. WHEELER. I have a copy of the same document.

Mr. STANDIFORD. If the House is willing, I would like to have this report read.

Mr. WHEELER. I have the same communication; but if the gentlemen prefers to offer it, I have no objection. I think, however, it is a little tardy.

Mr. STANDIFORD. I know well the gentlemen constituting this board; I know them to be gentlemen of honor and integrity, and entirely worthy of belief.

Mr. WHEELER. As those who make this report are constituents of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANDIFORD,] I think it due to the gentleman, as a matter of justice, that the communication be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from New York will also see the propriety of allowing at least a couple of minutes after the reading of that document to state one or two facts in connection with it.

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly. I have not sought to limit debate on this question, as the House will bear me witness. I always believe in a fair stand-up fight on both sides.

The Clerk read as follows:

At a meeting of the board of president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, held at their office in Louisville, April 22, 1874, the following preamble and resolutions were passed:

Whereas the board have seen from reported proceedings in Congress that the members of this board have there been represented as opposing the effort now and heretofore made to have the General Government pay the debts of the canal and render it free: Therefore,

Resolved, That such statement is untrue and wholly without foundation. For many years this board has been anxious and is now anxious to surrender the canal to the Government, has repeatedly offered to do so, and is now willing and ready to do so upon being acquitted of their liability to the creditors of the company. The board submitted to their legal adviser the question whether they could surrender the canal to the Government and have it made free upon the mere assumption by the Government of the debts of the canal, and received for answer that it could not be done. That opinion was promptly published, and, the board is informed, is sustained by the opinion of Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States.

It has also been stated that the receipts of the canal are $350,000 a year. For nine years past they have averaged only $169,075.49 a year.

It has also been stated that the board has reported to no one. This, too, is untrue. It has regularly reported to the State of Kentucky, as was its duty; to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States or any other Government officer, or committee of Congress, whenever called upon; and the books and accounts of the canal have ever been open to inspection by Government officials and have been several times most carefully and thoroughly examined by parties appointed by the Government. They are now open to such examination.

Further, it has been stated that no taxes have been paid to the State of Kentucky. The truth is the canal has always and regularly paid taxes to the State; for several years past $4,500 a year. This tax was demanded and paid upon the idea that it is a State corporation. Under advice the board refused to pay tax to the city of Louisville. During the continuance of the United States income tax this company was charged and paid said tax like all other State corporations, and was required to retain and pay over to the Government the tax on interest coupons falling due against the company.

It has also been stated that the Savings Bank of Louisville (the bank in which the treasurer has usually deposited the funds of the company) is doing business on said funds. The truth is the canal is now in debt to the bank and has been all this year, the receipts by reason of high water having been unusually small. The board as long ago as 1867 ordered that funds accumulating in the treasury beyond the requirements of the company for current expenses, interest, &c., should be used in buying up bonds of the first-maturing series at the market price for cancellation, and this policy has prevented the accumulation of idle funds.

It is also untrue that the last of the Kentucky resolutions of 1872 was manipulated by this board or any member of it. That resolution was drawn as it is because the attorney of the board thought the rights of creditors demanded it.

Those resolutions were prepared by the attorney of the city, the attorney of this company, and Mr. S. L. Ewing, who was understood as representing the interest of Cincinnati in the matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. In answer to one of the statements embraced in the report just read I desire to have read a portion of the report of General Weitzel, the Government engineer in charge of this work. In the report just read the gentlemen making it cautiously avoid saying what have been the revenues of the canal since the work was completed. They say that for nine years past the receipts have averaged $169,075.49 a year. Now, sir, the work was only completed in 1872, and during a long period preceding that time business had been suspended in consequence of the canal undergoing the enlargement which has been the subject of discussion. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the report of General Weitzel.

The Clerk read as follows:

The receipts of toll from the 1st of January, 1872, to that time were very light, as navigation was almost continually suspended by ice; yet from that date to August 23, 1872, (when the canal was closed for repairs,) that is, in a period of about six months, $207,025.19 were collected for tolls. This sum is $26,099.79 greater than the greatest amount of toll collected in any one year (1866) previous. It is perfectly safe, I think, to assume that during the next year, if the rate of toll were continued at fifty cents per ton, the tolls collected would reach $350,000. If this be true, the rate of tolls should be fixed at about seven cents, when the canal comes into the control of the Government, in order just to pay running expenses.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a fact worthy of observation that these gentlemen avoid stating what have been the tolls since the work was completed. They speak of the average receipts during the period of nine years; but the report of General Weitzel shows conclusively that the revenues of that canal cannot have fallen below $350,000 a year.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, writers on natural history tell us that the cuttle-fish has the faculty of ejecting an inky fluid by which it darkens the waters and conceals its purpose and object of attack. Its tactics seem to have been adopted by those who so bitterly denounce the amendment which I have proposed to this bill. In my whole experience as a public man, running at intervals over a period of twenty-five years, I have never known a public measure in connection with which there was so systematic an effort to shirk or conceal the real point at issue as there has been exhibited in this discussion, at its various stages, in both branches of Congress.

Most unwarrantable abuse has been heaped upon me by the press of the West for the simple reason that I have dared to advocate an amendment to this bill which at the outset had the approbation of every member of the Committee on Commerce, and which in the end was struck out by a solitary vote. Because I have not possessed the facility of maneuvering in line as rapidly as some other people, because I have dared to apply to this measure the legislation and policy of this Government for the last thirty-three years, the press of the West, week after week since the former discussion, has teemed with personal abuse of which I will give one sample:

No principle of charity is violated in charging that he was governed in this matter by other than honest motives. It is to be hoped that the dishonest purposes of Mr. WHEELER will yet be exposed, and that the bill, without his amendment, will be finally passed.

In short, sir, the discussion of this bill upon the part of many of its advocates has proceeded wholly upon invective, and where argument has been resorted to it has been upon every other point than the one really involved.

I know, sir, full well the odds which mass their forces against me to-day. This bill comes back from the Senate with the former amendment of the House stricken out by a large vote. I have noticed the changes which have been made in former views by the declarations of gentlemen just made upon this floor. But, sir, no disparity of odds ever deters me when I am conscious of the right.

Mr. Speaker, what has my character, past or present, to do with the merits of this measure? Is the legislation of this proceeding on my personal standing? What matters it the five gentlemen in charge of the Louisville and Portland Canal by the direction and by the request of the Government of the United States are knaves; that they are drawing large salaries; that they are interested in savings-banks; that one of their number went to the Legislature of Kentucky and procured the legislation of 1872—an imputation upon the Legislature of Kentucky which somebody ought to spurn; that the Legislature of Kentucky became clay in the hands of the potter; that one man went to the Legislature of Kentucky and molded it to his private purposes? What matters it, I say, if myself and if these gentlemen have cheated justice and are to-day cheating justice by being out of the walls of the penitentiary? What, sir, has that to do with the relation which this corporation of the State of Kentucky sustains to the United States?

I have high admiration for the manliness which intrenches itself in high official position, which barricades itself behind marble walls and assails private character and private motives, and grows bold and courageous as it remembers that the assailed has not the right or opportunity for defense—"and for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

That is the kind of manliness which has characterized the management of this bill in some quarters from first to last. I am gratified that as a matter of tardy justice the gentleman who represents the locality in which these directors live has at last allowed their response to be read here. I was losing my faith in what is styled Kentucky fair play until the gentleman, after the poison had fully done its work, came in at the last and gave them the benefit of a statement of their version of this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I never saw one of these five gentlemen connected with the management of this canal. I never had one word of correspondence of any nature whatever with any of them save this: During the former discussion in the House I telegraphed Mr. Speed, a former Attorney-General of the United States, knowing his standing as a lawyer, to know if under the laws of Kentucky the city of Louisville had the right to tax this canal, and after the discussion I wrote to the president of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company by his title, for I did not even then know who he was, asking him what was the condition of these stock certificates which had been absorbed under the act of 1842. That is the extent of my correspondence with these gentlemen.

I used here in the former discussion a volume of the canal reports, and it has been charged in the Senate—I beg pardon, Mr. Speaker; I remember the rule that we are not allowed to allude to the proceedings of the Senate. Notwithstanding, sir, it was done there, and notwithstanding base motives were imputed to the possession of this book, I say, in this respect at least, the House of Representatives shall show itself the superior of the Senate.

That book came to me through General Whittaker, of Louisville, a gentleman who came before the Committee on Commerce and argued the claim of the Campbell heirs to this canal property. I do not know, in view of what has transpired, but it might have been a criminal offense for me to have consulted gentlemen whom the United States have put in charge of their interests and property for the purpose of procuring accurate information to guide my action upon this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to confine the attention of this House simply to the issue presented by my former amendment to this bill and to no other. And I reiterate what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] a few minutes since commented on, that the point involved is so clear that a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein.

What, sir, is the proposition of this bill? It is to buy the Louisville and Portland Canal and to pay for bonds, for principal, $1,172,000; for interest to accrue before maturity of bonds, $500,340; making a total of $1,672,340. It is to pay in addition an indefinite and unlimited amount of its floating indebtedness, whatever it may be, without, as I say, definition and without limit. That is the purpose of the bill. I have insisted, and I still insist, that this purchase ought to conform to the statute which I will now read. I will not read the whole of it, for I do not desire to take up more of the time of the House unnecessarily. Gentlemen are familiar with it. It is a statute passed thirty-five years ago, which provides—

That no public money shall be expended on any land or site hereafter purchased by the United States for the purposes aforesaid—until the opinion of the Attorney-General shall be had in favor of the validity of the title, and, also, the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the land or site may be shall be given to said purchase.

That is, for light-houses, forts, arsenals, navy-yards, &c.—

It is on that last clause that I am making this issue, and you shall not divert me from it. I say the Legislature of Kentucky has never ceded jurisdiction of this canal to the United States. You may talk here by the hour about the conduct of these gentlemen now in charge of the property, what they have said and what they have done. I am talking about the State of Kentucky. I want to know what she has done. I shall judge Kentucky by her acts of legislation, and by her acts of jurisdiction asserted through her taxation laws.

Now, I ask the House to keep this in mind—it is my one sole inquiry—Has the Legislature of Kentucky ceded to the United States jurisdiction of this property? The advocates of this bill say that Kentucky has; and they produce as evidence this statute of Kentucky, which is alluded to in the bill, as a warrant for this proceeding. Those who have read the bill know that the taking, the right to take possession of the canal, is founded on the warrant of the legislation of Kentucky in 1842 and 1844. Is the Government under those statutes entitled to take this property? Gentlemen are familiar with the provisions of these acts, so that I will not read them at length. The act of 1842 provides in the fourth section—

That the shares so purchased by said board shall be held in trust by it for the purposes herein declared, and shall be voted on by them at all subsequent meetings and elections, until, by the operation of the provisions of this act, all the shares standing in the name of others than the Government of the United States shall have been purchased up; and when the said shares shall have all been purchased, the same shall be transferred to the Government of the United States—

Now, I ask the House to listen—for every advocate of this measure here and elsewhere has stopped here—I want the House to listen to the rest of this statute, which I suppose has some binding force on the people of the United States as well as what I have already read—shall be transferred to the Government of the United States on condition of said Government levying tolls for the use of said canal only sufficient to keep the same in repair and pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expenses—and make all necessary improvements so as fully to answer the purpose of its establishment; and, further to protect and guard the interests of commerce.

Now listen—

I do not desire to do anybody injustice in the allegations I made that everybody stopped short in this statute at the point I have indicated. One of the ablest advocates of this measure elsewhere said that purchasing the stock was the original condition, and that was all there was of it, and whenever the Government did that, the absolute control of the canal came to the Government, and every other condition is a nullity. Is it? Did the Legislature of Kentucky impose no other condition than that the United States Government should purchase the stock? What was the inducement offered to the Government of the United States to purchase this stock? It was to enlarge this canal, or, in the literal language of the statute, to—

Make all necessary improvements.

Has the Government of the United States ever complied with this condition?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield to any gentleman on the other side on this question advocating the passage of this measure to answer this inquiry. I do not want it answered by way of hypothesis or by way of argument. Tell me what single act the Government of the United States ever did toward making the necessary improvements on this canal from 1842 to 1855, when you allege the Government became the owner. I pause for a reply. Tell me what one act the Government of the United States ever did toward performing this trust toward the improvement of this canal, in the language of the statute, from 1842 to 1855. You are silent. Tell me what act it ever did from 1842 to 1860 in the line of keeping this trust. You are silent. Silence gives consent is the old maxim. You cannot answer it; for the Government of the United States made no sign in the way of performance of that trust created by the acts of 1842 and 1844.

Mr. FORT. I will say to the gentleman that the United States did not have possession of this canal, as I understand it.

Mr. WHEELER. No, sir; they did not.

Mr. FORT. And, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WHEELER. I do not yield for an argument. I interrupted no one on the other side in this discussion, and I am asking gentlemen merely for facts, not for sophistries or theories or speculations. I want to know what the Government did.

Mr. FORT. But the canal was in the hands of the company and the company improved it.

Mr. WHEELER. The company did improve it and the Government did not. That is precisely the line of my argument.

This proffer in the act of 1842, as I showed in the discussion the other day, on the part of Kentucky to the United States, was that the United States should improve the canal, or that the State of Kentucky might do it or the city of Louisville. It provided that either of the three might undertake this trust. You grant then, because you make no response, that from 1842 to 1860 the Government of the United States never performed one act toward carrying out that trust.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say to the gentleman that he overlooks the fact——

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; give me facts; I want facts, not arguments.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a fact I am going to mention. The reports of the Secretary of the Treasury show——

Mr. WHEELER. I do not care about the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. I want to know what substantial act the Government did toward the necessary improvement of this canal.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is what I am coming to, and we can only tell from reports. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that under the operations of the Government the revenues of this canal were being applied not simply to keeping the work in repair, but also to enlarging it.

Mr. WHEELER. The canal was taking care of itself with its own revenues as best it could without the aid of the Government of the United States, which was doing absolutely nothing for it, and has continued to do nothing down to this day, except by appropriations made since 1869 in a general way, as it has appropriated for the rivers of the country at large.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was the uniform policy up to that time.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not care about general policies, and the gentleman will please not interrupt me unless he has facts to state.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will not ask questions unless he is willing to allow an answer.

Mr. WHEELER. I have looked in vain and eagerly through the debate here and elsewhere to find an allegation of one act done by the United States toward fulfilling this trust, since it is alleged it undertook its performance in 1842. There has not been an allegation in the whole discussion that the Government ever spent a dollar in the necessary improvement of the canal in the periods I have specified. The whole conduct both of the Government and of the State of Kentucky shows that nothing of the kind was ever done.

Now a word as to the United States becoming the "sole owner" of this canal under the act of 1844. This bill is predicated on the fact that it has become the sole owner of this canal under the act of 1844.

Let us see what that act of 1844 provides:

That in the event of the United States becoming the sole owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal, the jurisdiction of this Commonwealth over said canal shall be yielded up to the Government of the United States, and no annual report, as mentioned in the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company shall be required to be made by the United States or the agent and superintendents of said canal to the General Assembly of this Commonwealth.

"The United States has become the sole owner" of this property! Nobody denies to-day that five shares are held by the five gentlemen who are operating the canal. Nobody denies that the Government of the United States has no earthly power to-day in that Kentucky corporation except to vote for directors. It cannot fix the tolls; it cannot regulate the management of the canal in any possible way; it is tied right down to the one act of voting for directors. And yet these gentlemen on the other side say that the United States is the sole owner of the canal, and has been so since 1844. That is a curious kind of ownership on the part of the Government in a piece of property. It cannot hold possession; it has not stock enough to-day standing on the books by two-thirds of the whole amount to elect the directors, and it is limited to doing one solitary thing. And yet gentlemen tell us that the United States has become under this act of 1844 the sole owner of the canal!

Now, Mr. Speaker, away with these fine theories, these nicely-drawn inferences and speculations. Throw aside, as you must do in the decision of this question if you are honest legislators; throw aside the value of the commerce of the Ohio River, and no man concedes more to it than I do; throw that aside and look at this as a simple, naked, legal proposition. How does Kentucky regard this matter, judging by what she has done since 1844, when you say she ceded jurisdiction over this canal? You must judge her by her action and by her legislation. Let us see. I read from the report of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] a report which presents this question as ably as it can be presented on that side. He certainly will not question its authority. I read from it to show how the State of Kentucky, two years after this property became as it is alleged the property of the United States, regarded this matter. We all admit that this stock was absorbed in 1855. And let me stop right here to say that the changes have been rung upon the allegation that the United States paid for that stock. Sir, it never did. It was the commerce of the Ohio River that absorbed it; and the Government never contributed toward paying for it, except so far as the income on its portion of the stock was thus applied.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. It was a part of the contract of 1842, to which the gentleman referred, that the Government of the United States should devote all the revenues of the canal to its improvement.

Mr. WHEELER. I cannot yield to interruptions. I will put it in a stronger form than the gentleman can. Now, bear in mind this allegation, that in 1855 the Government of the United States had become the sole owner of the Louisville and Portland Canal, and let us see what Kentucky thought of it. I read from the report of the gentleman from Indiana:

1857. By an act of the Legislature of Kentucky, approved December 19, 1857, it was declared: "That the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company be so amended as to authorize said company to construct, with the revenues and on the credit of the corporation, a branch canal sufficient to pass the largest class of steam-vessels navigating the Ohio River; and said company are hereby vested with all the power and authority to acquire and hold the necessary lands for such branch and to construct the same, vested by the charter and amendments for the construction of the original canal, and all the provisions of the original charter and amendments shall be, and are hereby, made as applicable to the branch as to the original canal."

Here, then, in 1857, two years after the United States Government had become the sole owner of this canal, you find the State of Kentucky taking this unwarrantable liberty with the revenues of the canal and going to work to enlarge it herself. That does not look very much as if Kentucky thought at that period that she had ceded jurisdiction of the canal under the act of 1844, for she took the work of enlargement into her own hands, and undertook, according to the argument of gentlemen on the other side, to use the property of the United States in an unwarrantable and unlawful manner, and at this time without the consent of the Government.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. She never acted under it.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not care about that; the reason she did not act was because she could not get her bonds taken until the United States came in and assented to the arrangement. That is the history of the matter, as the history of that period will show.

Now look at the attitude of the Government of the United States in 1860, where it expressly refuses to commit itself to the work of the improvement of this canal. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the 24th day of May, 1860, the President approved the following joint resolution, namely:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company be, and they are hereby, authorized, with the revenues and credits of the company, to enlarge the said canal, and to construct a branch canal, from a suitable point on the south side of the present canal to a point on the Ohio River opposite Sand Island, sufficient to pass the largest class of steam-vessels navigating the Ohio River: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize said president or directors, directly or indirectly, to use or pledge the faith or credit of the United States for the said enlargement or construction, it being hereby expressly declared that the Government of the United States shall not be in any manner liable for said enlargement or construction: Provided further, That when said canal is enlarged, and its branch canal is constructed, and the cost of said improvement paid for, no more tolls shall be collected than an amount sufficient to keep the canal in repair and pay for all necessary superintendence and management.

Mr. WHEELER. Was that not most unusual conduct on the part of the Government of the United States in relation to its own property? It permits that corporation to go on and enlarge the canal, and says expressly that it will not be liable for a dollar for that purpose; and yet it became "the property of the United States" in 1855! By that resolution the United States repelled the idea that it was then entitled to or had taken the jurisdiction of this canal from the State of Kentucky. It limits its liability, and says to the company, "You may take the tolls of your canal and go on; to be sure we are copartners; we have some of the stock; we consent to this arrangement; go on with your revenues and enlarge the canal, if you can, but with the express understanding that we will not contribute a dollar to the work of improvement." That is the way the United States have kept this trust under the act of the Legislature of Kentucky of 1842.

I have heard a great deal about the opinion of Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States. It has been made to do a great deal of service here and elsewhere. I am going now to enlist it into my service. I am going to show you that in 1872 the Government of the United States through its attorneys took precisely the position before the court that these gentlemen take now; and I am going to show you what Justice Miller said about it; and I will read it myself, so that it may be made sufficiently emphatic.

I want to state preliminary to this that the point involved was simply this: an appropriation had been made by Congress in 1872 for the improvement of this canal. In the same act there was a provision that the tolls on the canal should be reduced to five cents per ton. The officers of the canal declined to allow the United States to enter upon the work, saying that if the Government took possession of the canal that would be virtually an assent on the part of the officers of the canal to the provision reducing the tolls, which they had no right to do under the new trust created by the act of Kentucky of 1857. Justice Miller decided that the United States had such an interest there that its officers might go on and expend this money, but that the Government could not reduce the tolls or in any way control the management of this canal. Now let us see what he said in 1872 about this canal being the sole property of the United States. I read from the opinion of Justice Miller:

The proposition of the Government counsel is based upon the idea that when, under the act of 1842, all the private stock had been bought the Government became without further action the owner and entitled to the possession and control of the canal, and that both by operation of that statute and the necessity of the case the corporation ceased to have an existence, or at least to have any right or title to the canal; and this argument is made stronger, in the opinion of counsel, by the circumstance that at that time, to wit, on the 31st day of January, 1855, by a report to the Secretary of the Treasury, the directors advised him of the completion of the purchase of private stock and the readiness of the corporation to transfer the custody of the canal to the United States as soon as the Department was prepared to receive it.

You see that the counsel of the United States in 1872 were using the same argument before Justice Miller that has been from first to last used here. Now what did Justice Miller say?

This resolution beyond all controversy clearly recognizes three facts of important bearing on the matter in hand; first, the existence of the corporation called the Louisville and Portland Canal Company; second, that it had revenues and credits which might be sufficient to enable it to raise means for this large and expensive work. * * * * *

To me it seems that this is conclusive of existence of the corporation and of its right to use and control the canal and its revenues so far as was necessary for the purpose contemplated by the act of the Kentucky Legislature and the joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress.

And yet in 1855 it is said this became the property of the United States. If there is any weight to be attached to the opinion of Justice Miller, there you have it. Here is recognized the existence of the corporation with its right to use and control its revenues. And yet the Government had become the sole owner in 1855! Look at the taxation of this property in 1866 by the United States itself. It taxes a corporation of its own, and of which it is said it became the owner in 1855. Does anybody deny this taxation? Here is the proof, and you have it in the statement of these directors themselves, that during the war they continued to pay to the United States a tax on this property. Is there any other example in the history of this Government where the United States ever taxed for any purpose its own property?

Let us look a little further and see what Kentucky has done toward recognizing this cession of jurisdiction in 1842 and 1844.

Here are the resolutions of the State of Kentucky of March 28, 1872; and I acquit my friend on the other side who led off in this discussion—I acquit them both—of the fact that they did not read the conditions at all, because I know they were limited for time. They read simply this part of it:

Whereas all the stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal belongs to the United States Government—

Then follows this important exception—except five shares owned by the directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

And then these other conditions:

1. That the Government of the United States shall not levy tolls on said canal, except such as shall be necessary to keep the same in repair, pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expenses, and make all necessary improvements.
2. That the city of Louisville shall have the right to throw bridges over the canal at such points as said city may deem proper: Provided always, That said bridges shall be so located as not to interfere with the use of the canal, and so constructed as not to interfere with its navigation.
3. That the title and possession of the United States of said canal shall not interfere with the right of the State to serve criminal and civil processes, or with the State's general police power over the territory covered by the said canal and its appendages.
4. And further, that the city of Louisville shall at all times have the right of drainage into said canal: Provided, That the connections between the drains and the canal shall be made upon the plan to keep out all mud and garbage.
5. That the use of the water-power of the canal shall be guaranteed forever to the actual owners of the property contiguous to said canal, its branches and dams, subject to such restrictions and regulations as may be made by the Secretary of the Department of the United States Government which may have charge of the said canal.
6. That the Government of the United States shall, before such surrender, discharge all the debts due by said canal company, and purchase the stock of said directors.

I do not know why it is, but my friends on the other side seem to have so little regard in this discussion for conditions and exceptions. "Except five shares owned by the directors." Why, Mr. Speaker, that is all there is of it. These five directors control this canal to-day absolutely. I hope to see the time when it can be legally taken out of their hands. They fix the tolls; they regulate the running of boats; they do the whole business. This exception which gentlemen on the other side fail to note is most important; it might as well read "except the canal itself," for that is the legal import of it. It might as well read: "Whereas all the stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal belongs to the United States Government, except two-thirds of the shares owned by the directors;" for that is just where the matter stands in law and fact to-day.

Now, I am not going into a discussion of these conditions, which my friends left out because they had not time. No man stands up here to-day and says that this legislation of 1872 ought to be accepted. I appeal to my friend from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] whether I am not correct.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I will state for myself that I do not object to any of the conditions of the act of 1872 except the last.

Mr. WHEELER. Exactly. I am glad the gentleman attaches some weight to an exception somewhere.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The last condition was prepared by the attorney of the company, Mr. Speed, and was evidently intended to accomplish the very purpose which the amendment of the gentleman from New York would accomplish—delay in the taking possession of the property of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. I will show the House before I get through that I have no purpose of delay in this matter. I do not like these wholesale imputations upon the Legislature of Kentucky. I do not believe that body is composed of such men that Mr. Speed can go to Frankfort and manipulate it to his selfish purposes. I do not believe Kentucky sends such men to represent her in her State councils. But I say you are not prepared to accept this legislation of 1872. You say you are.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. On the contrary, I am unwilling to accept any condition from the State of Kentucky, because she has made a full cession long ago.

Mr. WHEELER. But my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who has championed this bill, is loud in reprobation of this legislation of Kentucky in 1872. Gentlemen say they will not accept it. Do you know that the Government by its solemn act has already accepted it? You are tender on this question. But you should remember that by a solemn act of Congress (I do not know how many of you gentlemen voted for it) the Government has accepted this legislation of Kentucky in 1872 in all its length and breadth. Just look at this act of Congress passed in March, 1873. You all scout this proffer of Kentucky in 1872. The gentleman from Indiana said on a former occasion that it is not to be tolerated for a moment. Let us see what you have done. In the appropriation bill passed in March, 1873, there is this provision:

For completing the Louisville and Portland Canal, $100,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to assume on behalf of the United States the control and management of the said canal in conformity with the terms of the joint resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky, approved March 28, 1872.

Gentlemen should not be so very tender-footed in regard to this legislation. There is your solemn acceptance of this proffer on the part of Kentucky which you now so strenuously repudiate.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The Secretary of the Treasury did not accept under that provision.

Mr. WHEELER. The Secretary of the Treasury has nothing to do with it. I am talking about the relation between the two governments. He did not accept for other reasons. Now I want you to recall the attitude of Kentucky. In 1857 she took the enlargement of this canal into her own hands. In 1872 she made a new proffer to the United States—one that we cannot accept, as all gentlemen agree; and yet we have accepted it, and we are asked to craw-fish out of it, which I take it we must do, as the signs are abundant in that direction.

I say again here is the declaration of Kentucky in the form of solemn legislation as late as March 1872, in which she wholly ignores, as I say she had a right to do, the offer she made thirty-two years ago. I was a little curious to look into the history of that legislation, for I have tried to examine this matter thoroughly; and Mr. Speaker, what do you think I found? I found "an amendment proposed to be offered by Mr. HOLMAN by authority of the Committee on Commerce," and here it is literally word for word enacted into law.

There is another point which I wish this House to observe. I say that Kentucky has asserted her jurisdiction over this property down to this very hour by taxing it; and I will give you the auditor's telegram, which shows that the State of Kentucky taxed this property during the last year to the amount of $4,500, and that the canal paid the tax. I thought I would not trust to the officers of this canal, because it might be said that they were interested in the matter. I telegraphed to the auditor of the State of Kentucky and got this response in relation to the matter of taxation:

FRANKFORT, KENTUCKY, April 28, 1874.

Hon. W. A. WHEELER:
Your telegram received. The Louisville and Portland Canal for last year paid $4,500 taxes to this State. It has paid the same amount for several years previous.
D. HOWARD SMITH,
Auditor.

I should like to know how the State of Kentucky could better illustrate its jurisdiction over this canal than by taxing it. And yet it is the sole property of the United States!

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly; I always yield to the gentleman for anything.

Mr. NIBLACK. I was not present when this bill passed the House some weeks ago, and did not have an opportunity to take part in that debate or to vote for the measure. I felt, however, a great interest in the measure itself. I have always been curious to know—I was curious from what I saw in the newspaper telegraphic dispatches while I was away during the debate and vote on the bill, and I am curious to know even now—how it comes that the gentleman from New York gets charge of this bill and assumes to control it, when he is opposed to it and is doing all he can to kill it?

Mr. WHEELER. I will tell my friend from Indiana how it is. I am chairman by the appointment of the Speaker of this House of the Committee on Commerce. I recognize the fact that the people of the United States living off the Ohio River have some rights here. I recognize, as I said in the beginning, the principle the Committee on Commerce adopted in the outset, and I am not to be driven from it by any intimidation or any insinuation. I speak for the people of the United States and not for the people of the Ohio River solely.

Mr. NIBLACK. I mean no disrespect to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WHEELER. It is a part of the general innuendo, assault, and attack which have characterized this whole transaction.

Mr. NIBLACK. I understand a large majority of the Committee on Commerce to be in favor of this bill.

Mr. WHEELER. They are in favor of it in the manner explained before. My amendment in the outset had the approbation of the entire committee and was afterward struck out by a single vote.

Mr. NIBLACK. How does the gentleman from New York then get control of it? That is what I do not understand.

Mr. WHEELER. I say to the gentleman from Indiana that I reserved the right in the Committee on Commerce to offer an amendment on the floor. I never believed a committee of the House of Representatives was a caucus, and that I went into it to be bound by its deliberations. When it comes to that, I will never be a member of any committee. I will entertain my own convictions and assert them on my own responsibility, and when I cannot do it otherwise——

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him to make a word of explanation? I understand the usual practice is, when a bill is reported from a committee, to hand it in charge of some gentleman on the committee who is friendly to the bill, and not to place it in the hands of its enemy.

Mr. WHEELER. I turned over the management of this bill in the former discussion to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] He took the entire control of it to do as he liked, reserving, as I had the right to do under the rules of the House, the last hour to close the debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that occasion as on this the gentleman from New York insisted upon his right to close the debate; he closed the debate then as he is doing now.

Mr. WHEELER. It is my right under the rules. If your rules are wrong alter them. I ask nothing more than the rules accord me, and that I will take and maintain on all occasions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are the acts of the State of Kentucky, and they carry their own commentary. They are entirely at war with the idea that there was a cession of jurisdiction of this property in 1842 and 1844.

It was under these circumstances and possessing these views that I felt bound to differ with my committee. The Senate differs with me now. I am not a man to oppose my opinions against majorities and claim for them infallibility. If I cannot have my own way I am always ready to get as near to it as I may. I have no purpose to refer this bill to the Committee on Commerce. I made the motion for the purpose of protecting the bill during discussion. There in no member from any State (if I do not get the credit for it) who would go further to press this measure to successful completion than I will; and gentlemen who differ from me on all this matter and members of the Committee on Commerce know, and will do me the justice to say, that I placed no stress on the claim of the Campbell heirs; that I placed no stress on the suit of the Louisville and Portland Canal for taxes; that I said the Government had those taxes to pay, and I was willing to pay them. But on this point of jurisdiction I must stand, and do stand, and it is immaterial to me personally whether my proposition gets a solitary vote or not. It matters not to me. It is not a private matter with me.

You said in the former discussion that Kentucky was all right in this matter; she wanted no trouble; give her an opportunity and she would cede jurisdiction at once. Her Legislature was not in session; it would meet in two years. Now here is my plan of adjustment. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment I now propose.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of the first section of the Senate amendment as follows:
Provided, however, None of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1876, or for any subsequent year, unless the State of Kentucky shall cede to the United States jurisdiction over the said canal, with all its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, and relinquish to the United States the right to tax or in any way to assess said canal, its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, or the property of the United States that may be thereon during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof, and unless said State shall pay into the Treasury of the United States the amount of any taxes which may be assessed and collected under its laws, upon and from said canal and its property before such cession.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend ought to remember that the bill itself prohibits the payment of a dollar of tax.

Mr. WHEELER. That is just what I do not want it to do. I should like this House to avoid a conflict with the State of Kentucky. It is not the way to deal with a sovereign State, that the United States should assert its power over it. I should like this difficulty to be accommodated by mutual arrangement and agreements. In the former discussion the gentlemen on the other side said they were ready for this.

What is this proposition? The Government goes at once into possession, as originally provided. You make payments for the first two fiscal years. The Legislature of Kentucky meets in December, 1875, and has six months in which to cede jurisdiction of this property to the United States. If she does it before the 1st of July, 1876, it is all right. If she taxes it in the mean time, she ought to refund to the Government, because her commerce is going to have the benefit of the reduction of the toll. Is this right? What was said on that occasion? Why, sir, the gentleman who represents the Louisville district [Mr. STANDIFORD] said this in the former discussion:

To hint that Kentucky, after what she has already done, would refuse to put any seal necessary upon this transfer is an insult to that State.

Give her the opportunity instead of undertaking in this way to force her to do it. Is not this reasonable? You go into possession of this canal at once. You reduce your tolls at once. You remain there for two years. You give Kentucky the right peaceably and quietly, without any intimidation or seeming force, to cede this property to the United States. And in the mean time, if she assesses any tax, you require her to pay the amount back because she is to reap the benefit of this reduction of toll. Is this right? Where is the wrong in it?

These gentlemen who have been so anxious to do what is right refuse this amendment. I gave it to them several days ago. They had it in their possession for days, and brought it back and declined it. I will not repeat the reason they urged for declining it. I will not assist in casting reflections on the Legislature of Kentucky. I believe the State of Kentucky will do what she undertook to do, and I am for giving her an opportunity.

But I have been told repeatedly in the course of this discussion that opposition to this project was simply futile. I understand that very fully. Let it be so. Let it go forth that if a man dares in the conscientious discharge of his duty to apply to this canal the law and policy of the Government, which have controlled every contract for the last thirty-three years for the site of even the pettiest light-house in the land; let it go forth that if a man dare stand up here to advocate that this policy which controls every other section of the country shall be applied to this canal, he shall be struck down and branded as a knave. The commerce of the Ohio River demands it.

You have once solemnly accepted the proffer of Kentucky by the act of 1872. You have asserted that this property was the property of somebody else than yourselves by taxing it during the war. Do not say to the people of Kentucky, "There has been a mutual mistake in this matter; let us regulate it by mutual arrangement and legislation." Do not say that. It is not what is due to a sovereign State. But ignoring all considerations of mutuality, refer the State of Kentucky to the Secretary of War, as your bill does.

The laws of Kentucky, Mr. Speaker, compel its assessing officers to tax this property; and there is nobody that can absolve them except the Legislature of that State. Do not give her an opportunity to do this. But take the matter into your own hand and issue the edict that might is right! Assert it by power. The commerce of the Ohio River demands it.

Mr. HOLMAN. But my friend did not object to that amendment of the bill. Inasmuch as the engineers had control of the improvements of the Ohio River——

Mr. WHEELER. I ask the gentleman not to interrupt me. I did not interrupt any gentleman on the other side while speaking.

It is not enough that this bill calls for $1,672,340 of known indebtedness, and an unknown and indefinite amount of floating indebtedness; that $1,278,200 have since 1869 been appropriated to this work; that $200,000 were appropriated by the last Congress to the Ohio River generally; that the river and harbor bill reported yesterday appropriates $150,000. This unparalleled liberality to a commerce whose tolls amount on an average to $169,000 for the last nine years must be supplemented by such legislation as this Congress never enacted.

But the commerce of the Ohio River demands it. Such are the demands of that commerce, and I am told that a man that undertakes to resist them shall pay the penalty of his reputation.

Mr. Speaker, my responsibility in this matter now ceases. I have never sought to influence the action of any member upon this question, except by speaking in my place here, and I leave the matter with the House, withdrawing the motion to commit, and asking for a vote on the amendment which I have indicated, and which I now send to the Clerk's desk.

I withdraw the motion to refer, and offer an amendment, which I will ask the Clerk to read:

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the first section strike out the amendment of the Senate, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, however, That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1876, and for any subsequent year, unless the State of Kentucky shall cede to the United States jurisdiction over the said canal with all its property, hereditaments, and appurtenances, and relinquish to the United States the right to tax or in any way to assess said canal, its hereditaments and appurtenances, or the property of the United States that may be thereon, during the time that the United States shall remain the owner thereof, and unless said State shall pay into the Treasury of the United States the amount of any taxes which may be assessed and collected, under its laws, upon and from said canal and its property before such cession.

Mr. WHEELER. It is understood, I suppose, that that amendment takes the place of the first amendment of the Senate. My motion is to concur in the amendment of the Senate with an amendment striking it out and substituting for it what has been read.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to agree to the amendment of the Senate with an amendment striking it out and inserting what has been read in lieu of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the House does not agree to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, will not the question then recur on concurring in the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. The next question, and the only one that can arise if the House agrees to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, will be on concurring in the Senate amendment as thus amended. If the House should not agree to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, the question then will be on concurring in the Senate amendments as they come from that body.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be reported as it came from the Senate. This amendment is in direct conflict with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I think the question is not fully understood. What would be the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BECK. To kill the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to know if it will take the place of the proviso to the first section of the bill which was put in by the House on motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill as it stands as amended by the Senate, and gentlemen can see what would be the precise effect of the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read the bill as it stands as amended by the Senate, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the appropriations made by the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," for the payment of the debts of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, are hereby continued in full force, and are made permanently applicable to the payment of the debts of the said Louisville and Portland Canal Company; and so much as may be necessary shall be applied to the payment of the interest as it accrues, and the principal of the outstanding bonds of said company as they mature: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase and pay for any of said bonds, at the market price, not above par, whenever he deems it for the interest of the United States.

SEC. 2. That after thirty days from the passage of this act the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to take possession of the said Louisville and Portland Canal, and all the property, real and personal, of said company, as the property of the United States, as provided for by the act of the General Assembly of the State of Kentucky, approved February 22, 1844, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company,' approved January 21, 1842," conceding jurisdiction over said canal to the United States, subject, however, to the mortgage lien on said property in favor of the trustees under said mortgage and the holders of the bonds issued under it; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay the directors of said company for the stock held by them, which payment shall be made forthwith by the Secretary of the Treasury, being the sum of $100 to each director, with interest thereon at 6 per cent. per annum since the 9th day of February, 1864; and he is authorized and directed to cause a careful and full examination of all the receipts and disbursements of the said company to be made, and to collect, and, if necessary, to sue for any money due to or held for the said company by the directors of said company, or the trustees under said mortgage, or by any person whatever; and said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed and empowered, immediately upon the passage of this act, to give public notice in such manner as in his judgment will best effect the purpose to all persons and corporations having debts of any nature against said Louisville and Portland Canal Company, except the bonded debt thereof, to present them to him on or before the 1st day of July, 1875; and any such debt not presented on or before said day shall be forever barred; and said Secretary is hereby directed and authorized to examine, audit, and in his discretion allow such debts, or any of them, being hereby vested with any power necessary to that end; and he shall embrace his action in the premises in his succeeding annual report: Provided, however, That no sum of money shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury on account of any claim for either city or State taxes assessed, or to be hereafter assessed, against said company, or against the said canal property, or any of its appendages.

SEC. 3. That the said canal and property appertaining thereto shall be held for the common use and benefit of the people of the United States, free of all tolls and charges, except such as are necessary to pay the current expenses of said canal and to keep the same in repair; and for the present year they shall be at the rate of ten cents per ton capacity on vessels propelled by steam, and five cents per ton on other vessels; and to ascertain what rates will pay current expenses after the present year, the Secretary of War shall, on the first Monday of January of each year, ascertain from the expenses of the previous year what tolls will probably pay the expenses of the current year; and he shall fix and declare the rate of tolls thus ascertained to be charged for the current year; and, until otherwise provided by law, the Secretary of War shall provide for the superintendence, management, and repair of said canal, and may apply the tolls so received, as far as may be necessary, to pay the current expenses of said canal; and he shall, in his next annual report, set forth such receipts and expenditures, and the condition of said canal, with a view to such legislation as may be necessary for the superintendence and management thereof; but no expenditure, nor contract for expenditure, of money shall be made under the authority of this section in any one year to an amount greater than the amount which may be received during such year from tolls on said canal.

SEC. 4. That if at any time it become necessary to enforce the lien of the mortgage upon said canal property for the benefit of the bondholders, it shall be lawful for the trustees named in said mortgage, or any other trustees who may be appointed in pursuance of the laws of Kentucky, to commence proceedings therein in any court having jurisdiction thereof, with notice to the United States as terre tenant pro forma, and serve process upon any officer of the United States who shall have the superintendence of said canal, whose duty it shall be to notify the Attorney-General of the United States of such service; whereupon said Attorney-General shall enter an appearance in said case, and take all necessary steps to represent and defend the interests of the United States in such proceedings, so that the same may be conducted in the same manner and with the like effect as if the said Louisville and Portland Canal Company were still in existence as a corporation.

The question was taken on Mr. WHEELER's amendment; and there were—yeas 73, nays 143, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Bradley, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Cain, Amos Clark, jr., Stephen A. Cobb, Conger, Crooke, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Eames, Elliott, Freeman, Frye, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Benjamin W. Harris, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hynes, Lawson, Lynch, McCrary, MacDougall, Merriam, Niles, Page, Pendleton, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Randall, Rapier, Ray, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, Ross, Sawyer, John G. Schumaker, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, Smart, George L. Smith, Speer, Starkweather, Strawbridge, Taylor, Tremain, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, and William B. Williams—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Coburn, Comingo, Cook, Corwin, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Davis, DeWitt, Dunnell, Durham, Field, Fort, Foster, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Hagans, Hancock, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hereford, Holman, Hunter, Hyde, Kelley, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Lawrence, Leach, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Marshall, Martin, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McJunkin, McKee, McLean, McNulta, Milliken, Mills, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Perry, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Read, Richmond, Robbins, James W. Robinson, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, Sener, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Sloan, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Sprague, Stanard, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Strait, Christopher Y. Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Vance, Waddell, Wells, White, Whitehead, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—143.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Barnum, Barry, Bass, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Cessna, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Hamilton, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hooper, Hubbell, Hunton, Hurlbut, Jewett, Kasson, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lansing, Lewis, Lofland, Luttrell, Magee, Maynard, Mellish, Mitchell, Nunn, O'Neill, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Phelps, Pierce, Potter, Ransier, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sloss, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Stephens, St. John, Stowell, Swann, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Whitehouse, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, Willie, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—74.

So the amendment of Mr. WHEELER to the amendment of the Senate was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. KASSON. Upon this question I am paired with Mr. CLYMER, of Pennsylvania; if present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. MELLISH. I am paired on this question with Mr. KELLOGG, of Connecticut, who if present would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. SMART. I am paired with Mr. WILSON, of Indiana; if present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. HOSKINS. I have been requested to state for Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan, that if present he would vote "ay" on this question.

Mr. ORTH. My colleague, Mr. TYNER, is absent on account of sickness; if here he would vote "no."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Upon this question I am paired with my colleague Mr. RUSK; if present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. LAMISON. My colleague, Mr. JEWETT, is absent on account of the sickness of his wife. If present he would vote "no."

The question was upon concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. There is an error in this bill which I ask may be corrected by the engrossing clerk. As the bill now reads, the expression "there tenants" is used for the expression "terre tenants." I ask unanimous consent of the House that the engrossing clerk be authorized to make the correction.

Mr. GARFIELD. In that connection I desire to say that this is but another proof of the bad policy of having our bills enrolled at all. I believe we should have them printed, for every enrollment gives a new opportunity for an error.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted.

ELECTION CONTEST—MAXWELL vs. CANNON.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the contested-election case from Utah of George W. Maxwell against George Q. Cannon, accompanied by the following resolutions:

Resolved, That George R. Maxwell was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress as Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

Resolved, That George Q. Cannon was elected and returned as Delegate from the Territory of Utah to a seat in the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I also send up a preamble and resolution which I propose to offer in place of the second resolution reported from the Committee on Elections, when the case is acted on by the House. I ask that it be read and printed for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas George R. Maxwell has prosecuted a contest against the sitting member, George Q. Cannon, now occupying a seat in the Forty-third Congress as Delegate for the Territory of Utah, charging, among other things, that the said Cannon is disqualified from holding and is unworthy of a seat on the floor of this House for the reason that he was at the date of his election, to wit, the 5th day of August, 1872, and prior thereto had been, and still is, openly living and cohabiting with four women as his wives, under the pretended sanction of a system of polygamy, which system he notoriously indorses and upholds, against the statute of the United States approved July 1, 1862, which declares the same to be a felony, to the great scandal and disgrace of the people and Government of the United States, and in abuse of the privilege of representation accorded to the said Territory of Utah, and that he has taken and has never renounced an oath which is inconsistent with his duties and allegiance to the said Government of the United States; and whereas the evidence in support of such charge has been brought to the official notice of the Committee on Elections: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed of the same number as the standing committees of this House to inquire into the said charge and report to the House as to the truthfulness thereof, and to recommend such action on the part of the House in the premises as shall seem meet and proper.

Mr. SPEER. As a member of the Committee on Elections I express no opinion in favor of or against the resolution just read. But I raise the point that it is not a privileged resolution; therefore it is not strictly admissible at this time. I understand it is not offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] as a member of the Committee on Elections, but simply upon his individual responsibility as a member of the House.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. It is not offered as coming from the committee; but I desire to have it printed.

The SPEAKER. How does the gentleman disassociate himself from the committee of which he is a member? It is the practice of the House to receive a report from a minority of a committee, which minority may consist of one member. Does the gentleman desire to be considered as expressing his views as a member of the Committee on Elections, or as an outside member of the House?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I offer it on behalf of myself as a minority of the committee.

Mr. SPEER. I do not wish to do the gentleman injustice. But the report which he has just presented with two resolutions attached was the unanimous report of the committee. It was understood that any gentleman might offer the other resolution upon his own individual responsibility, but not as a member of the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand how a gentleman as a member of the Committee on Elections could assent to one resolution, and reserve to himself the right as a member of the House to submit a diametrically opposite resolution.

Mr. SPEER. They are not opposite.

The SPEAKER. They are not in harmony.

Mr. SPEER. The motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] is not in itself inconsistent with the resolution reported from the committee. The resolution of the committee declares the election and due return of the sitting Delegate. The other resolution looks to the investigation of a separate and distinct question not referred to the Committee on Elections at all.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. My resolution is not necessarily inconsistent with the resolution of the committee. But I stated in committee, and it is proper for me to state it on the floor, that I desire to offer this resolution in order that when the case is reached I may bring the proposition to the attention of the House and obtain a vote upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the point which is involved. A minority report from any other committee than the Committee on Elections has no rights at all except by unanimous consent, but there has grown to be a habit that the minority of the committee in all election cases shall present their views; and this the Chair would not feel at liberty to have excluded by a vote sustaining the previous question. The Chair does not see, however, that any misunderstanding need arise upon this point. Has the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] charge of this case himself?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I have. I was instructed by the majority of the committee to make the report as it has been made, and to report the two resolutions which have been read.

The SPEAKER. Then no conflict can arise, because of course the gentleman will not call the previous question on himself. If the report were in the hands of another member of the committee, the Chair would in that event be compelled to rule whether this was a question of privilege.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. All I desire is that the matter shall be brought to the attention of the House, and that I may have an opportunity to obtain a vote on the resolution.

Mr. SPEER. Did I understand the Chair to state that the supplementary resolution presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin on his individual responsibility is now pending with the report of the committee as he has made it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so state. The gentleman from Wisconsin asked consent to have it printed. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. SPEER. No, sir; I do not.

The SPEAKER. Then there is no question before the House. The Chair stated that if the regular report was in the hands of another member of the committee, he might call the previous question and thus exclude the gentleman from Wisconsin; but as that gentleman has the report under his own control, of course he can admit his own amendment.

Mr. SPEER. But, Mr. Speaker, allow me one question. How does this last resolution get before the House if it is not privileged?

The SPEAKER. It would be legitimate as an amendment.

Mr. SPEER. But an amendment to the report of the committee is not admissible at this stage.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman can give notice of an amendment.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. That is all there is of it. It is simply a notice to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can give notice of his amendment. The question is whether it is a minority report, not whether it is germane or not.

Mr. SPEER. It cannot be a minority report, because the gentleman himself reports the other resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already observed that if the majority report were presented by another gentleman, the gentleman from Wisconsin might be precluded from offering this by the operation of the previous question; but as he himself has control of the previous question, he will hardly rule himself out.

Mr. SPEER. In justice to myself, I do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the third resolution which the gentleman from Wisconsin has offered. I am simply raising the point whether the gentleman has the right to report it as coming from the committee.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, the gentleman from Wisconsin gives notice that when this case is called up he will offer the resolution last read as an amendment.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. That is it exactly.

Mr. SPEER. I do not object to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not in any event desire to enlarge the number of privileged questions, but rather to restrict them. The ruling should be not in favor of, but rather against, the enlargement of privileged questions.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to give notice that I shall ask to present a minority report in this case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, as he understood, was advised by two gentlemen that the report was unanimous. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRISON] now gives notice, however, that he will present a minority report.

Mr. SPEER. The report was unanimous except as to the supplementary resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HARRISON. When the report was read in the committee I stated that I could not agree to the conclusion of the committee that this man was elected and that still a resolution such as has been presented with the majority report should be reported. I was of the opinion that if the committee decided the sitting Delegate to have been elected, all we could do under the reference of the subject to us was to present a resolution declaring him entitled to the seat, leaving it to the House to take whatever course might be deemed proper hereafter.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. That is precisely what is contemplated by the resolution submitted by me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair now understands that to be the substantial position of the case. The report of the committee, and also the resolution presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin, will be ordered to be printed.

MARITIME LIENS.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce for immediate action a bill to create stevedores' and other maritime liens on sea-going vessels.

The bill was read.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I object.

BUSINESS ON SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BECK. Is it in order at any time, Mr. Speaker, to ask the Chair to lay before the House executive communications which are on his table? I do not know how the rule is, but if it be in order I would like to make such request.

Mr. RANDALL. Immediately after the morning hour is the right time.

Mr. BECK. I made the remark the other day that a certain communication was not before the House. I am advised by Mr. Conant that it is before the House, but lies upon the Speaker's table.

BALANCE OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of April 11, 1874, transmitting a statement showing the balance of appropriations July 1, 1873, made for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, and prior years limited by law to payment of indebtedness incurred during the year for which they were made, and the amount expended for that purpose to April 1, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to say in this connection that I announced the other day that communication was not before the House, although it had been lying upon the Speaker's table for some days and had been overlooked.

The SPEAKER. These communications as they accumulate upon the Speaker's table are laid before the House on the first opportunity.

Mr. BECK. I only wish to say that it was a mistake on my part.

BARRACKS AT ALCATRAZ ISLAND.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation to build permanent barracks at Alcatraz Island; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

KICKAPOO INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, also by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to an appropriation to subsist certain Kickapoo Indians during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES M. WAIDE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of James M. Waide for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A. G. REED.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of A. G. Reed for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LINCOLN W. TIBBITTS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Lincoln W. Tibbitts, owner of the brig Tornado, claiming compensation for damages sustained by the seizure by the United States Government authorities at New York of a cargo of powder; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

FRANCISCO SAIZ.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of Francisco Saiz for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CREEK ORPHAN FUND.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill authorizing the transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury of the stock and evidence of indebtedness which may be due and held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior on account of the Creek orphan fund; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MRS. ELLA P. MURPHY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of Mrs. Ella P. Murphy for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CHEROKEE STRIP IN KANSAS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the treasurer of the Cherokee Nation certain funds, proceeds of land known as the Cherokee strip, in Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AUGUST SIEGENFUHR.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of August Siegenfuhr for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

DR. ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of Dr. Alexander Hamilton for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

NAVAJO INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to an agreement concluded March 27, 1874, with the Navajo Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

JAMES A. SANCHEZ AND P. NUTO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March 29, 1872, the claim of James A. Sanchez and P. Nuto; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

H. M. TEACHOUT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the claim of H. M. Teachout, for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

IRON-SHIP BUILDING-YARDS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to the resolution of the House of April 11, 1874, in relation to the iron-ship building-yards of Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED ELECTION—GIBSON vs. SHELDON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House testimony in the contested election of the second district of Louisiana, Gibson vs. Sheldon; which was referred to the Committee on Elections, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 1135) be reprinted with the accompanying papers.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was given to Mr. POTTER for one week from to-day; to Mr. WOODFORD from May 2 to May 16; to Mr. SCUDDER, of New York, for one week from to-day; to Mr. HOLMAN for ten days; to Mr. STANDIFORD for ten days; and to Mr. KILLINGER for ten days.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 368) for the relief of James Long;

An act (H. R. No. 1331) for the relief of Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, for supplies furnished the Kansas tribe of Indians;

An act (H. R. No. 1772) for the relief of William N. Williams, late a second lieutenant of volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 1933) to amend the thirty-first section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national militia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; and

An act (H. R. No. 3093) to relieve David A. Telfair from political disability.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask that, by unanimous consent, there be a session of the House this evening for debate only.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was about to make a motion that we have a session to-night for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill by paragraphs.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desired to make the motion which I indicated, because some gentlemen have speeches prepared which they wish to deliver. I am willing, however, to yield to the gentleman from Ohio for the purpose he has stated.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House take a recess until half-past seven o'clock this evening, for the purpose of considering the Indian appropriation bill by paragraphs for amendment. There are two or three gentlemen who still wish to speak on the bill in general debate; but we can go on with the bill this evening by paragraphs, without interfering with the rights of those gentlemen to speak when we meet to-morrow. By meeting to-night I hope we may be able to do a large share of work on the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. As I understood the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, the three gentlemen who still desire to speak on the bill in general debate will have the privilege of doing so to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. They will, when general debate is resumed for the benefit of gentlemen who desire to speak at large on the bill. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I object.

Mr. NIBLACK. That being objected to, I ask that by unanimous consent there be a session of the House this evening for general debate.

Mr. BURCHARD. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House take a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. And pending that motion I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask that by unanimous consent we have a session of the House to-morrow night for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot agree to that until I know what we can do with the appropriation bill.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 73, noes 61.

Mr. KASSON. Pending the announcement of the result of the vote on the motion to adjourn I ask that there may be unanimous consent for a session for debate to-morrow evening.

Mr. RANDALL. To-night.

Mr. KASSON. Well, to-night.

Objection was made.

The result of the vote on the motion to adjourn was then announced; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 1, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of Hon. William B. Washburn, chosen by the Legislature of Massachusetts Senator from that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Charles Sumner.

The credentials were read; and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. WASHBURN, he took his seat in the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. BOREMAN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a memorial of ship-masters, ship-owners, and merchants of Machias, Maine, praying the abolition of the present system of compulsory pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALCORN presented resolutions of the Legislature of Mississippi, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to vote for a bill containing the provisions of "Sumner's supplementary civil-rights bill," so called; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Mississippi, in favor of an appropriation of money by Congress for cleaning out the Tombigbee River from Fulton, Itawamba County, to Columbus, Mississippi; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of Frank Kendrick, of Dryden, Michigan, praying that a pension may be granted to him; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition of William L. Randolph, administrator of Robert L. Randolph, deceased, of Virginia, asking compensation for property taken from him by the United States Army and appropriated to its use during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Abraham Sellers, administrator de bonis non of Frederick Vincent, deceased, who was administrator of the estate of James Le Caze, surviving partner of the firm of Le Caze & Mallet, praying payment of a balance due for advances made by them during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a petition of citizens of Beaufort and Port Royal, South Carolina, asking the establishment of a fortification and light-house at Port Royal, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented the petition of Colonel W. W. Lowe and other field officers of the late Fifth Iowa Cavalry, citizens of Nebraska, asking that a pension be granted to Jesse Ireland, of Sarpy County, Nebraska, in consideration of services rendered by his children during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of the pilots of the port of New York, remonstrating against the passage of a bill now pending repealing the pilot laws of New York and New Jersey. This memorial sets forth that the pilotage system is one of great value and mature growth, and that to destroy it would be very detrimental to the interest of commerce. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the memorial and other papers of Robert Spaugh be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 524) to protect timber lands of the United States Government reservations and lands purchased for the United States, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 728) to define a gross of matches, to provide for uniform packages, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2787) to provide for the sale of the present United States marine hospital and site, and the purchase of a new site and erection thereon of a new marine hospital, in the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of War, in relation to Providence Hospital, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Committee on the District of Columbia have had under consideration several petitions of citizens of the District in reference to the sewerage tax. The committee have instructed me to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of these petitions and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as important legal questions are involved.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why is not the Committee on the District of Columbia the appropriate one? I do not see any reason for referring that matter to the Committee on the Judiciary unless there is some law question about it.

Mr. BOREMAN. I understand that these petitions involve the constitutionality of this tax, or a question of law in connection with it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do the citizens of Washington hold that this tax is illegal? Is that the claim?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then why do they not resist it in the courts?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is not for me to say.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1764) to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain fractional townships in the State of Missouri, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3090) to authorize the issue of duplicate agricultural-land scrip where the original has been lost or destroyed, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 654) to extend the time for the completion of the railroad from the Saint Croix River or Lake, between sections 25 and 31, to the west end of Lake Superior and to Bayfield, in the State of Wisconsin, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 664) amendatory of an act to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1851; and the bill (S. No. 427) to extend the provisions and limitations of the act entitled "An act to limit the liability of ship-owners, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851, reported adversely thereon; and the bills were postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 368) to provide for the establishment of an international commission of the maritime powers to lay down ocean courses for steam-vessels and otherwise provide for increased safety of sea travel, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of the school-officers of the township of Sault Sainte Marie, Michigan, praying Congress to grant them for school purposes a certain portion of the military reserve containing 1.26 acres, reported a bill (S. No. 757) to donate a certain portion of the military reservation of Fort Brady to school district No. 1, in township of Sault Sainte Marie, and State of Michigan, for school purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS FROM MISSISSIPPI OVERFLOW.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River," to report it back without amendment and ask for its immediate consideration, as there is pressing necessity.

The bill was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like the chairman to explain the necessity for the present passage of this bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. By the act referred to the Secretary of War was directed to issue rations and clothing to these people on the Lower Mississippi. That has been done, according to the detailed report made by the Secretary of War, to the extent provided for in this bill, and this appropriation is made to supply the deficiency created by that supply, and it is needed for the current service. That is a brief statement of the entire case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Reserving my right to object, do I understand the chairman to say that the Secretary of War is now enabled to perform this act of charity out of the stores he has?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He has done it already, and this is to supply the deficiency created by that act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And this to supply the Army again for the current year?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why is it not kept for the deficiency bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Simply because the deficiency bill is so far behind that the Secretary of War made application to the House of Representatives saying that it was necessary that he should have this money at once.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As this grows out of an act of charity I shall not object to its present consideration; but I think that it ought to go into the deficiency bill; and I think more especially that we ought to have the Calendar take its course and not take up bills on their being reported except under very special circumstances; but I am content to let this go.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is undoubtedly true. The same question arose in the committee; but on the whole we were disposed to regard this as entirely exceptional.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

To enable the Secretary of War to carry out the provisions of the act approved April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Lower Mississippi River," the sum of $90,000 is appropriated by the bill for the purpose of purchasing supplies of food, to be issued under his direction to any and all classes of destitute or helpless persons living on or near the Lower Mississippi River who have been rendered so by reason of the recent overflow.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LEWIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 758) to authorize and provide for the construction of a substantial iron and masonry bridge and of a causeway across the Anacostia or Eastern Branch of the Potomac River, at or near the site of the present navy-yard bridge; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 759) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law," approved May 5, 1870; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 760) reviving a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Vicksburgh, Mississippi, to the Texas State line; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 761) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to pay $100,000, out of the proceeds of the sale of lands known as the Cherokee strip, to the Cherokee Nation; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 762) for the relief of Robert Spaugh; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 763) explaining the intent and meaning of the fourth section of an act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 764) to remove the political disabilities of Henry Heth, of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 765) for the relief of Amos B. Ferguson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Claims, and that the President of the Senate fill the vacancy.

There being no objection, Mr. BOUTWELL was excused; and the President pro tempore, being authorized to fill the vacancy by unanimous consent, Mr. WASHBURN was appointed.

MARGARET A. HOFFNER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Calendar is in order.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 609) granting a pension to Margaret A. Hoffner; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary of the Interior is directed by the bill to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret A. Hoffner, widow of Richard J. Hoffner, who was an acting master in the United States Navy.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES ROACH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2096) granting a pension to James Roach; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Roach, late a gunner on the ship Plymouth.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JACOB PARMERTER.

Mr. CONKLING. The other day, during my absence momentarily from the Senate, there was regularly reached on the Calendar No. 178 in the order of business, being House bill No. 1562, for the relief of Jacob Parmerter, reimbursing him for defending a suit brought against him for an official act. It was reported from the Committee on Commerce, and now a note from one of my colleagues in the House induces me to ask the Senate to take up the bill, to which I think there is no objection. I think that it is one of those bills to which there can be no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1562) for the relief of Jacob Parmerter, reimbursing him for defending a suit brought against him for an official act. By the bill the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay to Jacob Parmerter, of Plattsburgh, New York, $1,237.19, in full for costs and expenses incurred by him as collector of customs for the district of Champlain, New York, in a suit brought against him for an official act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any report in that case? I should be very glad to hear it if there is.

Mr. CONKLING. There is a careful report from the House committee, and a briefer one from the Senate committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear it read. The proposition seems possibly to stand in conflict with our general rule; but the report may make it clear.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives:

In April, 1867, a team of horses and harness was seized by a deputy of said collection district in Franklin County, New York, for alleged violation of the revenue laws of the United States, and such seizure was duly reported to the then United States district attorney for the northern district of New York, and an information was duly filed by him in the United States district court for the same district. The seizure was made upon affidavits showing facts rendering the property liable to seizure and forfeiture. At the November term, 1868, said cause being at issue, the same was noticed for trial by the claimant, and no evidence was given on the part of the United States to sustain the said information, and a verdict and judgment were therefore rendered in favor of the claimant by default, dismissing the information and adjudging restitution of said property, without any certificate of probable cost of seizure. Such default of the United States was in consequence of the failure of the district attorney to notify said collector that said cause was to be tried. Said collector had no information that said cause was to be tried at said term, which was held several hundred miles from his residence; and if said collector had had notice of said trial he would have been able to produce proofs establishing probable cause of seizure, if not sufficient for the condemnation of the property. Such default was in no respect chargeable to said collector. In January, 1871, an action was brought against the said collector in the supreme court of the State of New York for damages for the alleged wrongful taking and detention of said property, which action was subsequently transferred on the petition of the collector to the United States circuit court, and in which the collector was defended by the United States district attorney. In said action judgment passed against said Parmerter for $250 damages besides costs. Said Parmerter was compelled to expend and did expend the sum of $1,237.29 in and about the defense of said suits and in payment of said judgment, which payment was caused by no default of said Parmerter or his deputies, and which ought to be reimbursed to him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want to object to the consideration of the bill, but I should like the Senator from New York to tell the Senate, if he can, in the first place how it happened that this collector, being interested himself in the seizure, did not pay some attention to the terms of the court which he must have known by the law, and have some inquiry made whether this cause was to go on.

In the next place I should like to be informed who the district attorney was who neglected his business to that extent.

In the third place, if my friend will tell me, (and I see he smiles, and he can always speak when he smiles,) I should like to know how it happens that out of a $250 suit in the State of New York where law expenses are so cheap, $1,200 in costs, when the district attorney defended, were paid by this man.

Those are three topics on which I am sure the Senator from New York will be glad to enlighten me and others.

Mr. CONKLING. Reversing the order of the catechism of my friend, I beg to answer first that the $1,200 grew in part out of the fact that a gentleman upon the frontiers of Vermont was the counsel who defended the case, and I have no doubt he earned his money. Had he lived further from Vermont it is possible that a less sum would have suitably rewarded him for his services.

Answering the other question, the district attorney to whom this default is attributable—and I am glad the Senator from Vermont gives me the opportunity to say it—is not the present district attorney, nor was he the district attorney appointed during the present administration or the former term of the present Executive; he was district attorney appointed by President Andrew Johnson.

As to the collector taking notice officially or judicially of the times when courts were held, I may say that being not a lawyer but a collector, being up in the county of Clinton, a somewhat remote portion of the State, being in a district in which courts are held five hundred miles apart, and it being known to laymen as well as lawyers that a cause is liable to be noticed as much for a term not the first as for the first term, and this cause having, I believe, gone over two or three terms, he had no mode of ascertaining the time when it was to be tried until a notice of trial had been given on one side or the other, and it happened that the then district attorney resided in the city of Buffalo, Mr. Parmerter being at Plattsburgh, which according to the lines of travel are about five hundred miles apart. I think my friend from Vermont will hardly say that he was guilty of laches because he did not periodically interrogate the district attorney by letter to know when that case was to be reached. He being one of the witnesses of course was to be summoned by a subpœna, I take it, like every other witness, whether interested or not, and he had a right to rely upon that to inform him of the time when the trial was to take place.

It is undeniable upon the papers that, for some unexplained reason, the district attorney did not give that heed to the cause which its successful termination required; and in that way it is that this man was originally cast in costs and damages, and being sued afterward in the State court and being defended in form by the district attorney, he was in truth, as I have already said, defended by private counsel, a gentleman whose ability and integrity are well known to the Senator from Vermont. I mentioned to him a moment ago who he is. But in spite of all that could be done, these damages and these costs were visited upon the collector.

Had his act been a judicial one, there is authority in the Senate for saying that there would be doubt about the propriety of paying him. Being a ministerial act which he was obliged to do officially, by the plain mandate of the law, it falls, I suppose, expressly within the admitted domain of official responsibilities incurred in such circumstances that the Government behind the officer makes him good.

The case was investigated in the Committee on Commerce with care, and I think I may say, speaking at least for one member of the committee, with a sharp disposition to see whether there was any ground on which a refusal could be based to pay this sum; and after examining the case and after conferring with members of the House and with the gentleman who made the report there, we were driven to the conclusion—I was, and I think I was quite sincere in the quest of material with which to criticise the claim—that there was nothing we could do in good faith except to make the collector whole for the misfortune which fell upon him by a fault, as far as there was a fault, not his own.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not disposed to criticise the opinion of the Senator from New York, and of course I have nothing to say touching the nearness to Vermont of this seizure or the counsel who defended the collector. But I believe there is a law—and if the Senator will inform me whether I am mistaken, as he can, it may illustrate this subject—I believe there is a statute providing, when a collector makes a seizure that is lawful at the time it is made, that he shall be defended by the district attorney in any suit that may be brought about it, and that the current appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenues of the United States is the fund out of which the administration of the Treasury Department pays for defending collectors in cases of that character. Am I not correct?

Mr. CONKLING. I think my honorable friend is entirely correct, unless it may be that he commits a literal error in the latter part of his statement, which is not important. I say to him, however, and so the papers show, that the collector in this instance complied with the law fully and promptly. He gave notice to the district attorney; he applied to him; he tendered to him the information, the proof, and the witness by whom it could be made, and, as far as we were able to discover, was guilty of no laches or want of diligence in that regard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question that I desired to have answered by the Senator, and he can readily answer it, is, what are the legal difficulties of this gentleman getting his reimbursement from the Treasury Department? For, if I understand the law, the Treasury Department is authorized to defend the customs officers of the United States in anything that they lawfully do, or do in good faith, where they get cast in a suit.

Mr. CONKLING. I think what my friend is now saying rests upon a certificate of probable cause. He will observe that the report shows that no such certificate was made, and explains the reason why. When the cause came up in court, there was an utter default on the part of the Government. Therefore the court did not know and could not know whether there was probable cause or not, and could not grant that certificate which, without any legislation from us, would have protected the collector. It is to supply that very deficiency that the bill is here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, Mr. President, I think the Senator from New York cannot be quite correct in his statement of the law, although I am not familiar with the customs laws or any others very largely; but certainly there are dozens of suits every year brought against collectors to recover back money that has been paid under protest for duties, and it is not then resting upon any certificate of probable cause that the Treasury indemnifies the officers. It rests upon the fact, as I understand, that by the general customs-collection laws of the United States—I do not go into any other department, and it is not necessary in this case as this was a customs officer—for the honest and faithful administration of the ministerial duties of the customs officers the Treasury Department is authorized to provide and furnish defense and indemnity, and it is authorized out of the appropriation that we make every year for the expense of collecting the customs to repay any sum that may be recovered. If that be true, of course there is no need of passing this bill, because the Department itself can inquire into the circumstances under which this transaction took place, and can judge for themselves whether this gentleman was acting in good faith, which I certainly have no right to question or dispute.

Mr. CONKLING. The section to which my friend now appeals is in my recollection a wholly different section, and I feel so sure of it that I venture to state it. When a suit is brought to recover back duties paid, a protest is the ground without which the party cannot proceed. If he protests, he may sue and recover moneys paid under that protest. That is one class of cases.

Here is another: the seizure of goods; and there in order to bring the collector within the departmental protection or protection of the general law without special act, he must have a certificate of probable cause which in the circumstances of this case he did not have nor was it possible for him to have.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then how did it happen that the district attorney of the United States, having no authority to interfere for the defense of this man, did appear, acting for the Government and charging his pay to the Government for doing it?

Mr. CONKLING. He had authority to appear for him, I will show to my honorable friend, and it was his duty to appear. If he had appeared and appeared successfully, tried the cause upon the merits, the collector, even though he may not have won a verdict, would have won a certificate of probable cause, for the court would thus have looked into the case, probable cause would have been deduced from it, the certificate would have been given, and my honorable friend would have been spared and so should I have been spared the trouble of attending to the case. But unfortunately it falls on neither one side nor the other of the line which he has been stating. It is not a case where a suit was brought to recover back duties paid under protest; nor is it a case where a certificate of probable cause enables the collector to pursue the remedy the Senator now speaks of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The honorable Senator from New York did not, I am afraid, do me the honor to listen to me, for my inquiry of him was how it happened that in this cause in the State court where, as my friend states the law to be, though I think he is in error, this man stood not only without a defense but without any right to call on the United States, legally speaking, to do anything whatever for his redress or protection, this report states, if such be the law, that the United States did intervene and defend the cause, although in point of fact other counsel were engaged personally, which has run up the costs in this extraordinary way. That is the difficulty, although it does not touch the merits of the question except as showing what the law is on the other point.

Mr. CONKLING. Now if my friend will let me answer, I beg his pardon for misunderstanding him. I supposed he referred to the cause in the Federal, not in the State courts. The fact on the point to which he now brings attention I understand to be this: that the collector did notify the district attorney, that owing to his non-action he found himself in this plight and was sued, and thereupon the district attorney, in what I have sometimes heard called a perfunctory manner, undertook to extend some protection over him. The collector, however, soon had wit enough and necessity enough to discover that he was to stand entirely naked to his enemies or was to provide himself with counsel. Thereupon he applied to the gentleman to whom reference has been before made, and by him he was in fact defended, although not in form to some extent the district attorney, either as a volunteer or otherwise, had, as I understand, undertaken to repair the harm which had come from his non-action in the case where he was called upon to appear and to act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, as I understand it, Mr. District Attorney Dorsheimer, after having allowed this man, who had a good case, to be defaulted five hundred miles off, had the official condescension to allow the collector at Plattsburgh to employ somebody else to defend him and to pay him $1,200 for it. That was certainly a large act of condescension on the part of the district attorney, who was very vigilant indeed! But that perhaps is not material to the purpose of this case.

If I am not wearying the patience of the Senate, for this involves a very important principle as to what we ought to do, I should be glad to know another thing that no doubt the Senator can tell me; and that is on what ground it was that the action in the State of New York against the collector was defended, and upon what ground it was that the defense seems to have failed after a long litigation which, judging from the bill of costs, must have implied a trial by jury upon some issue of fact. Very likely the Senator can tell us the history of the course of procedure in the State court, what the points were, and why this man did not win.

Mr. CONKLING. I think I may with prudence tell the Senator this much, although I would not venture to speak of the exact particulars without referring to the papers: When the collector was sued in the State court, an application was made, he being a Federal officer and having executed Federal authority, to transfer the cause into the national courts, which transfer I believe took place. A trial, a litigation, as the Senator has conjectured, followed. Upon that trial the merits, in so far as they were still accessible, were litigated, and the finding was that the collector was liable. Now, whether every question that could have been made in the original action for the seizure was there accessible and was there made, I cannot tell the Senator; but I judge from the papers and from the character of the counsel who conducted the case that in so far as the merits were still open they were litigated, and in spite of all the defense that could be made the collector was cast in damages for the act which he had originally done, which he had done for probable cause, and for which the customary certificate would have protected him had he not lost the opportunity of obtaining that certificate owing to the non-action of the officer whose duty it was to take care of the case and over whom he had no control.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The result of it, then, seems to be that this seizure was an illegal seizure, one that, as the facts turned out, was not justified by the law. Now, the collector having made an illegal seizure where he had not the facts to support it, that is to say, the property not having been brought into the country in violation of the statutes of the United States, the citizen called upon him to respond, and he was obliged to do so after a defense. Then the question is, whether the Treasury of the United States ought to bear the burden of defending every collector who makes such a mistake, acting upon his own discretion at the moment, although a ministerial officer, but not bound as a marshal or a sheriff is to execute a particular mandate which commands him to take the property of the citizen, and which he would be liable to criminal punishment if he should fail to obey, and where we can see there is a good ground for holding that the party should be indemnified; but here it is left to the sound discretion, of course, of the collectors of customs to make seizures in cases where they have good reason to believe that a violation of the law has occurred. It appears, as I understand the result, although we have not the precise papers here to know exactly, but the substance appears to be that it turned out on the trial on the merits of the question of seizure that this gentleman had made a seizure that the law did not authorize him to make, and accordingly had to pay the value of the property, for I see he was mulcted in $250 damages. He kept the horses, I suppose, and paid his counsel, and of course he is out of pocket a thousand dollars; and now we propose to pay him not only the money which he had to pay for the horses, but the costs also; and whether he, or the Treasury, or some other department of the Government has the horses may be a question.

Mr. CONKLING. Without detaining the Senate more than a moment further, I beg to make a remark. The Senator says this would relieve an illegal seizure. I answer him illegal only in that sense in which every seizure is illegal when a collector is protected by a certificate of probable cause. There never was a case on earth where a court gave a collector a certificate of probable cause except a case where the merits had gone against him. No other case admits of it. Therefore the criticism made by the Senator would apply not only to every such case as this, but to every case confessedly within that departmental protection to which he has referred.

I understand the Senator to comment upon, if he does not criticise, the fact that the collector applied to private counsel to defend him in the State court. Now see, if the Senator will pardon me, the injustice of that comment. Suppose this man that the Senator has already criticised because he did not look at the schedule of terms and assume every time a term occurred, although no subpœna was served on him or no letter written him, that he must be there armed and equipped—suppose that this collector having seen this cause go by default once, the district attorney not appearing or serving a subpœna on him, when he was sued in person had folded his arms and sat down and allowed judgment to go against him, how my friend would thunder at him then, and with what justice!

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does he not know perfectly well that this collector had a quarter's interest in the seizure himself, and that if he had succeeded in the condemnation he would have got a quarter of the value of the property, and that he could not be a witness if summoned by the district attorney; but so far as a fourth went he in person was interested as prosecutor?

Mr. CONKLING. Why could he not be summoned as a witness?

Mr. EDMUNDS. For the reason that he could not be a witness when he had an interest——

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The seizing officer cannot be a witness.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask my honorable friend to revise his law a little on that point. In the Sate of New York every party to the record may be a witness, save only plaintiff and defendant in an action for divorce; and in civil cases, as we have provided several times over, the rules of evidence obtaining in the State obtain in the national courts sitting in the State. Therefore Mr. Parmerter was a competent witness.

But my friend asks had he not an interest of a quarter in this seizure, had he not an interest of a quarter of two hundred dollars—fifty dollars' interest? I presume he had; but with what view does the Senator cite that? To show that this was a hungry, snatching man pursuing his fifty dollars? Not at all; his criticism is that he had fifty dollars' interest "to prick the sides of his intent," and he did not get through. Well, I answer the Senator that he then stands more blameless than he would have done had he had no self-interest to prompt him. The fact of this self-interest, although small, shows that he did not intend to turn his back upon this case and purposely allow the Government to suffer. So the fact to which the Senator brings attention is, I submit, a fact in favor of the collector, and not a fact against him.

No, Mr. President, the whole case, although it is not pleasant to state it, results in this: that the only officer whose business it was to care for the interests of the United States, and who could have protected them, failed to do so, and this blameless man was in consequence of that cast in damages; and upon every principle that I know of applicable to such cases we cannot avoid paying him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot leave this to go quite yet. According to my recollection the statutes of the United States provide (unless they have been altered very recently) that the seizing officer, the collector of customs, anybody who is entitled to a share of the forfeiture, cannot be a witness in the courts of the United States upon the question of condemnation. The object of that law was to prevent grasping and unjust men in the revenue service from making seizure of the property of the citizens and then swearing them through themselves as to some technical violation of the law that they had invented or pretended in order to get their share of the plunder. That I believe to be the law of the United States, unless it has been changed within a very recent period. I will not take the trouble to keep the Senate waiting now while I look it up, because it perhaps does not largely affect the question. I will only say, as my friend seems to have rather ridiculed the idea that this man only had a fifty-dollar interest, that if he only had a fifty-dollar interest the United States had only a one hundred and fifty-dollar interest, and in proportion to their respective duties and responsibilities it would seem, I think, to most men that they had no greater obligation in defending their interest than he had in defending his. The forty million people in the United States being interested to the extent of one hundred and fifty dollars and he to the extent of fifty dollars, a very simple arithmetic would show that his interest was as large in proportion to the amount of the seizure as that of the people of the United States.

I will promise not to say anything more on this bill when I add a word to what I have said. With all respect, I cannot help thinking that the Committee on Commerce of the Senate—I of course cannot allude to the committee of the House of Representatives—have committed an error in reporting this case for our favorable consideration because however hard it may be to apply a rigid rule in this particular instance—and I make no question about that, for certainly all that I know of this gentleman and have heard of him is in his favor—yet to set a precedent which is to be followed hereafter, by which we agree that we will indemnify every collector of the customs who fails through the fault of the district attorney, the collector of customs being interested himself in the suit and being in substance a party to it and entitled to a fourth of the proceeds of the condemnation, if he can satisfy some committee of either body, years afterward, that he intended to act in good faith, and that although he may have had an interest in the seizure which prompted him somewhat, yet after all it was partly for the interest of the Government, he did not intend to violate the man's rights, leaving it upon his statement of what his intentions were, is very dangerous legislation indeed. That is all I wish to say. I of course cannot expect to overrule this committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in obedience to law, a copy of the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on private land claim reported as No. 88, and known as the Santa Fé City land claim; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3098) to amend the act entitled "An act to reorganize the courts in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3169) changing the time of holding circuit and district courts in Vermont.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 368) for the relief of James Long;

A bill (H. R. No. 1331) for the relief of Joab Spencer and James R. Mead, for supplies furnished the Kansas tribe of Indians;

A bill (H. R. No. 1772) for the relief of William N. Williams, late a second lieutenant of volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1933) to amend the thirty-first section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national militia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3093) to relieve David A. Telfair from political disability.

THE CUSTOMS SERVICE.

Mr. FENTON. As the morning hour is about expiring, I desire to give notice that I will, at the close of the morning hour on Monday next, or as soon thereafter as I can have the floor for the purpose, move to discharge the Committee on Commerce from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 13) to regulate the service in the collection of customs at the various ports of entry in the United States, and the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to customs, and for other purposes; and upon this motion I shall venture, with the indulgence of the Senate, to submit some remarks.

SUPPLEMENTARY CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the second section, on which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. President, I deem it my duty to say that having spoken yesterday, my throat to-day is in such a condition that I am unable to go on. I can hardly articulate. I will, therefore, ask of the Senate the indulgence to have the matter postponed for the present.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, letting this bill be laid aside informally with the consent of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps somebody else may wish to go on.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think perhaps some one else would be prepared to go on, and by letting him do so we save time.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. If there is no one prepared to speak, I think we had better proceed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to laying aside Senate bill No. 1 informally and proceeding with the Calendar?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Instead of that, I move to take up the Geneva award bill. That is an important bill, and it ought to be disposed of early, for nothing was done at the last session, as will be remembered, which I think is somewhat to the reproach of both Houses of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to lay aside the pending order informally and proceed to the consideration of the bill reported by him from the Committee on the Judiciary in regard to the Geneva award.

Mr. ANTHONY. We shall be having the appropriation bills come here very soon; and then we shall have no opportunity whatever to take up the Calendar. There are a great many unobjected cases, cases which require merely the forms of legislation, and I think that we had better to-day proceed with the unobjected cases on the Calendar, at least for a couple of hours, and then take up the bill of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; I have no objection to that, for two hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes to lay aside the pending order informally and that the Senate proceed with the Calendar of unobjected cases. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is with the understanding that any case to which objection is made and insisted upon shall be laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the understanding. The Senate is to proceed under the Anthony rule, so called.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont, who made some objection the other day to Senate bill No. 459, whether he will not allow that bill to be called up this morning and disposed of?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What bill is that?

Mr. CLAYTON. The bill (S. No. 459) for the relief of William J. Patton, collector of internal revenue in Arkansas, reported by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will lead to long discussion.

Mr. CLAYTON. It may lead to discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

JOSEPH F. DOAK'S MINOR CHILDREN.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1230) granting a pension to Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minors of Joseph F. Doak, deceased; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minor children of Joseph F. Doak, late sergeant of Company D, Fifth Ohio Volunteers, and pay her a pension for those minors.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZA A. MAXHAM.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Eliza A. Maxham; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza A. Maxham, mother of Samuel W. Maxham, late a private in Company E, Second Regiment United States Sharp-shooters, and to pay her at the rate of eight dollars per month from the death of Samuel W. Maxham on the 6th of May, 1864.

The Committee on Pensions propose to amend the bill by striking out in the eighth, ninth, and tenth lines the words "to date from the death of said Samuel W. Maxham, on the 6th day of May, 1864," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JEFFERSON A. FRENCH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 613) granting a pension to Jefferson A. French; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jefferson A. French, late volunteer lieutenant and first-class pilot in the United States naval service, Mississippi squadron, for total disability, at the rate of $31.25 a month.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WRECK OF SHIP PATRICIAN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 614) to provide for the removal of the wreck of the ship Patrician, near the entrance to the harbor of San Francisco, California; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary of War is by the bill directed to cause the wreck of the ship Patrician to be removed as early as practicable from the channel to the harbor of San Francisco, California; and it appropriates for the purpose $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TERRITORY OF PEMBINA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 44) to establish the Territory of Pembina, and to provide a temporary government therefor.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let that bill be laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think there is no objection to the bill.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. BOREMAN. I should like to appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire to allow me to make a statement before he insists on his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside. The objection can be waived, however.

LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO, COLORADO, AND ARIZONA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 441) enabling claimants to lands within the limits of the Territory of New Mexico to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims.

The Committee on Private Land Claims reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons, or their legal representatives, claiming lands within the limits of the Territory of New Mexico, Colorado, or Arizona, by virtue of any Spanish or Mexican grant, concession, warrant, or survey, which, at the date of the passage of this act, have not been confirmed by act of Congress, or, having been confirmed by act of Congress, have not been surveyed, or, having been confirmed and surveyed, patents have not been issued for the same, in every such case to present a petition in writing to the judge of the district court of the United States for the judicial district in which such lands may be situate, setting forth fully the nature of their claims to the lands, and particularly stating the date of the grant, concession, warrant, or order of survey under which they claim, by whom made, the name or names of any person or persons in possession of or claiming the same, or any part thereof, otherwise than by the lease or permission of the petitioner; and also the quantity of land claimed and the boundaries thereof, where situate, with a map showing the same as near as may be; and whether the said claim has heretofore been confirmed by Congress, or been heretofore submitted to any authorities constituted by law for the adjustment of land titles within the limits of the said Territories respectively, and by them reported on unfavorably, or recommended for confirmation, or authorized to be surveyed or not, praying in such petition that the validity of such title or claim may be inquired into and decided. And the said courts are hereby authorized and required to take and exercise jurisdiction of all cases or claims presented by petition in conformity with the provisions of this act, and to hear and determine, as hereinafter provided, the same on the petition and proofs in case no answer or answers be filed after due notice, or on the petition and the answer or answers of any person or persons interested in preventing any claim from being established, and the answer of the district attorney where he may have filed an answer, and such testimony and proofs as may be taken; and a copy of such petition, with a citation to any adverse possessor or claimant, shall, immediately after the filing of the same, be served on such possessor or claimant in the ordinary legal manner of serving such process in the proper Territory, and in like manner on the district attorney of the United States; and it shall be the duty of the United States attorney for the proper district, as also any adverse possessor or claimant, after service of petition and citation, as hereinbefore provided, within thirty days, unless further time shall, for good cause shown, be granted by the judge or court to whom said petition is presented, to enter an appearance, and plead, answer, or demur to said petition; and in default of such plea, answer, or demurrer being made within said thirty days, or within the further time which may have been granted as aforesaid, the court shall proceed to hear the cause on the petition and proofs, and render a final decree according to the provisions of this act; and in no case shall a decree pro confesso be entered; and in every case the court shall require the petition to be sustained by satisfactory proofs, whether an answer or plea shall have been filed or not: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prevent action on, and confirmation by Congress of, private land claims now pending before Congress heretofore examined and recommended for confirmation by the surveyor-general of either of said Territories.

SEC. 2. That all proceedings subsequent to the filing of said petition shall be conducted as near as may be according to the rules of the courts of equity in the proper Territory, except that the answer of the attorney of the United States shall not be required to be verified by his oath, and no continuance shall be granted unless for good cause shown; and the said courts shall have full power and authority to hear and determine all questions arising on said petition relative to the title of the claimants, the extent, locality, and boundaries of said claim, or other matters connected therewith, fit and proper to be heard and determined, and by a final decree to settle and determine the question of the validity of the title and the boundaries of the grant or claim presented for adjudication according to the law of nations, the stipulations of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the treaty known as the Gadsden purchase, the acts of Congress in relation thereto, and the laws and ordinances of the government from which it is alleged to have been derived, and all other questions properly arising between the claimants of the United States, or other parties to the suit, which decree shall in all cases refer to the treaty, law, or ordinance under which such claim is confirmed or rejected; and the court may, at its discretion, order disputed facts to be found by a jury, according to the regulation and practice of the said courts when directing issues in chancery before the same court; and in all cases the party against whom the judgment or decree of said district court may be finally rendered shall be entitled to an appeal to the supreme court of the proper Territory, which shall be taken and allowed in the manner now prescribed by law for taking appeals from the district courts of such Territory to the supreme court thereof; which supreme court shall retry the cause, as well the issues or questions of fact as of law, and may hear testimony in addition to that given in the court below; and either party shall be allowed one year in which to appeal from the decision of the supreme court of such Territory to the Supreme Court of the United States, whose decision shall be final and conclusive between the parties; and should no appeal be taken, the judgment or the decree of the said district court shall in like manner be final and conclusive, as also the decision of the supreme court of the Territory unless appealed from.

SEC. 3. That the testimony which has been heretofore received by the surveyor-general of the proper Territory, or by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon all claims presented to them respectively, shall be admitted in evidence in all trials under this act when the person testifying is dead, so far as the subject-matter thereof is competent testimony; and the court or jury shall give it such weight as, in their judgment, under all the circumstances it ought to have.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States, the surveyors-general of such Territories, or the keeper of any public records who may have possession of the records and testimony pertaining to any land grants or claims for land within said Territories, whose claim for lands has been rejected by them, or on the application of any person interested, or by the attorney of the United States for either of said Territories, to furnish copies of such records and testimony, certified under his official signature, with the seal of office thereto annexed, if there be a seal of office; which copies, if the originals are not within the jurisdiction of the court, shall have the same effect as testimony that the originals would have if produced. The legal fees shall be paid for such copies by the parties applying for the same, except the attorney of the United States.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall extend only to such claims as may be presented and filed within two years from the date of its approval; and all petitions under this act may be presented in vacation or term-time, but the final hearing on the same shall be had and the final decree rendered only at the regular terms of the district courts for the counties where the lands described in such petition may be situate; and the judges of the district and supreme courts in the Territory are hereby authorized, in vacation, in all cases arising under this act, to grant all orders for taking testimony, or otherwise to hear and dispose of all motions, and do all other things necessary to be done to bring the same on to a final hearing.

SEC. 6. That upon the final decision of any claim prosecuted under this act, in favor of the claimant or claimants, it shall and may be lawful for such claimant to demand and receive from the clerk of the court in which such final decree is had a duly certified copy of the decree in his, her, or their favor, and deliver the same to the surveyor-general of the proper Territory, who shall thereupon cause the lands specified in said decree to be surveyed at the expense of the United States; triplicate plats and certificates of the survey so made to be returned into his office, one of which shall remain in his office, and one, duly authenticated, shall be delivered, on demand, to the party interested therein, and one shall be sent to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on receipt of which the President of the United States shall issue a patent to said claimant.

SEC. 7. That the clerk of the court in which such petition may be filed shall, and he is hereby directed, when any petition or claim is filed under the provisions of this act, before any proceedings thereon, to require good and sufficient security for all costs and charges which may accrue thereon in prosecuting the same to a final decree; and the district attorney, clerk, marshal, and witnesses shall severally be allowed such fees for their services and attendance as may be allowed by law for the like services and attendance in the United States courts for the proper Territory.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the attorney of the United States for the proper Territory in every case, when the decision or decree of the district court is against the United States, to appeal the cause to the supreme court of the Territory; and if the decision of the latter court be against the United States, a copy of the decree, with a statement of the legal questions involved, shall be transmitted by the district attorney to the Attorney-General; and unless the Attorney-General shall otherwise direct, the district attorney shall appeal the cause to the Supreme Court of the United States. In every cause decided under this act by the supreme court of a Territory it shall be the duty of such court to specially find the facts of the cause; which special finding shall be inserted in the decree, and, upon an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, shall be taken in the latter court to be the facts of the cause.

SEC. 9. That if in any case it shall so happen that the lands decreed to any claimant under the provisions of this act shall have been sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States, it shall be lawful for such claimants, or their legal representatives, at any time within one year after the rendition of the final decree in his favor, to execute and file in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office a release to the United States of all right, title, or claim to the land so sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States; and thereupon there shall be issued by the said Commissioner (under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior) to such claimant or his legal representatives scrip for an equal amount of acres so released in quantities not exceeding six hundred and forty acres each, which scrip shall be assignable in such form as may be prescribed by said Secretary, and shall be receivable in payment for any public lands in either of said Territories that may be subject to private entry.

SEC. 10. That the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court of the Territories aforesaid shall, from and after the passage of this act and until the final adjudication of all claims presented under the provisions of the same, receive, in addition to the salary now provided by law, the sum of $2,000 each; but such increase shall not continue more than five years.

SEC. 11. That all claims which are capable of being prosecuted under the provisions of this act shall, after three years from the taking effect of this act, if no petition in respect to the same shall have been filed as hereinbefore provided, be deemed and taken, in all courts and elsewhere, to be abandoned, and shall be forever barred.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the following words in the thirty-third line of section 2, "and may hear testimony in addition to that given in the court below."

Mr. CONKLING. This is a very elaborate bill. I do not venture to make any suggestion against it; but it seems to me that it ought not to pass, with or without amendment, among the unobjected bills, no statement in regard to it being made. I know there are Senators ready and willing to explain it; and I venture to suggest that some Senator who is intimate with its provisions should give the Senate a better understanding than we can have from a cursory reading of so many complicated provisions.

Mr. THURMAN. I am perfectly willing to explain it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The amendment reported by the committee provides for the examination and trial of these land cases in the district courts of these Territories; it also provides for an appeal to the supreme court of the Territory; it also provides that on the appeal the supreme court may try the issues or questions of fact and of law, and may hear testimony in addition to that given in the court below. My amendment proposes to amend the amendment of the committee so that the supreme court in the trial of the cause shall be limited to the evidence taken in the court below, and shall have no power to hear new testimony.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this bill has for its object to settle a class of land claims, almost all of which arise out of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, made in 1847, and the subsequent treaty known by the name of the Gadsden purchase. I may say, in general terms, that it is a disgrace to the legislation of the United States that these claims have not been adjudicated and settled long ago. It is now twenty-seven years since we acquired title to New Mexico, Colorado, and part of Arizona. By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo we became bound to respect the titles which had lawfully been granted by the republic of Mexico. That is one of the stipulations in that treaty which we are bound to execute. But owing to the land system of Mexico it was impossible to say at once what claims to land had lawfully vested in individuals under the laws of Mexico, for the treaty bound us to recognize and acknowledge the claims that had accrued under the laws of Mexico, although they had not been carried into actual grant by the issue of letters-patent. Owing to their peculiar land system nothing could be much more uncertain than the question of boundaries and often the amount of the grant or claim.

In order to ascertain what lands were thus embraced in the claims of individuals, Congress first provided that the surveyor-general of the Territory should open a docket and receive proof of claims, and report in favor or against the recognition of claims, according to his own judgment and the testimony before him, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and then the Commissioner of the General Land Office should lay those reports before the Congress of the United States, so that Congress should act in each particular case. That has been found to be impossible of execution. The fact is that at the end of twenty-seven years a very small proportion of the claims have been reported upon, for the surveyors-general have had no time to execute that law, and owing to defects in the law itself it has been one that has utterly failed to do justice either to the Government or to the individual. The lack of power to take testimony, to enforce the attendance of witnesses, and the fact that the surveyor-general himself is not usually a man learned in the law, and that he has so much business in the ordinary and regular routine of his office, has had the effect to delay, and I may say utterly prevent, the adjudication of these titles. When some few of them have been confirmed by Congress, it has been found that the proceedings were so irregular, so ambiguous, that it has been impossible for the General Land Office to know for what amount of land or for what boundaries to issue patents.

Mr. SARGENT. And Congress has been unwilling to submit to the record in these cases.

Mr. THURMAN. I will mention one single case as an illustration. Congress confirmed two grants at the same session and upon the same report of the then Committee on Private Land Claims. In that report it was stated that under the laws of Mexico no individual could receive a grant for more than eleven leagues, and therefore certain claims that were made for a larger amount were by that committee cut down to eleven leagues to the individual. They laid that down as the law, and yet so carelessly did that committee act—I will not say carelessly, but it so happened that they overlooked it and Congress overlooked it—that another grant reported by them at the very same instant of time, by that very same report, was confirmed for twenty-two times twenty-two leagues, for it was to two individuals, making a confirmation of over two million acres of land. That question has been before the Land Office. The Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior refused to issue patents for any such enormous grant, and you cannot tell—I do not say it is impossible but it is certainly very difficult to tell—from the papers in that case what was the meaning of the Committee on Private Land Claims in regard to that grant and what was the meaning and is the true construction of the act of Congress in reference to it.

These grants are for very large amounts, and even if it were possible for the surveyor-general to examine them and make his report, it would be unwise that one man, holding no court, a mere ministerial officer, should settle claims to such an immense amount as are these claims. But it is not necessary to go into that further. The General Land Office has called the attention of Congress to the matter again and again. The system is found to be utterly futile, it is a perfect failure; and at every session of Congress for many years past the committees, both in this body and in the other House, having charge of the subject, have endeavored to arrive at some mode by which these claims could be settled. At length, at this session, after bestowing very great care on this bill, giving it a long and patient consideration, hearing all the suggestions from the Commissioner of the General Land Office and from the Delegates from these Territories, who have urged us to pass some measure, because the uncertain state of the land titles in their Territories, as they tell us, is materially retarding settlement and population there and involving the people of the Territories in interminable lawsuits, the committee came to the conclusion to report the bill which is now before the Senate as an amendment to the original bill which was introduced by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

This bill in general terms provides that these claims shall be adjudicated in the courts of the respective Territories. Those courts consist of a district court and a supreme court. The district court is held in every county in a Territory; the supreme court is held at two or three or more places in the Territory, and consists of all the judges. In order to dispose of them, and it being most material both for the interest of individuals and of the Government that the question should be settled soon, and this bill contemplating that they may all be settled in a short time, it is provided that any claimant to land shall file his petition in the district court. Then provision is made for making the United States a party defendant, and not the United States alone, but every adverse claimant to the land, so as to bring before the court every party having any interest whatsoever to contest the claim. That being done, provision is made for further progress in the cause, the most material of which is that the court shall in no case decree in favor of the claimant upon the overruling of a demurrer or without proof, that there shall be no such thing known as taking a petition pro confesso, or giving judgment in favor of the claimant upon the overruling of a demurrer, but in every case the claimant shall be bound to make proof, and satisfactory proof, of his claim by evidence whether his petition be contested or not. That is the general provision on that subject, and the Senate will see at once that that is a wise provision for the protection of the Government, and also for the protection of any one having adverse claims to the land.

Then the bill provides that either party may appeal from the decision of the district court to the supreme court of the Territory; and so far as the United States is concerned the bill provides that the district attorney shall, in every case in which a decision is rendered adverse to the United States, take an appeal to the supreme court of the Territory, which court shall retry the cause upon the evidence that was heard in the court below, and upon such further testimony as may be offered in that supreme court; and that brings me to the motion made by the Senator from Oregon to strike out the words which authorize the supreme court upon the trial of this cause to hear further testimony in addition to that given in the court below.

I really cannot see what reason can exist for striking out those words. The district courts are held by a single judge. Some of these claims to land amount to millions of acres, none of them perhaps to less than eleven square leagues, many of them to twice eleven square leagues, and where the claims are what is known as colonization claims they may amount to much larger areas than even that. The committee did not think it right that the decision of one judge upon the facts of the case should be conclusive. They did not like to put in the power of one man, however upright and intelligent he might be, the conclusive decision of the facts in a case where such immense interests were involved; and therefore they provide for an appeal to the supreme court of the Territory, both upon the issues of fact and the issues of law.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there to be a trial by jury in the supreme court?

Mr. THURMAN. That is left to the territorial law.

Mr. SARGENT. It is left to the discretion of the court.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir; according to the practice of the local court. Now is this second trial in an appellate court of questions of fact a strange thing? In the State from which the Senator who makes this amendment came, he knows that it was the law and may be the law yet—it was for more than half a century the law—that you might appeal and have a second trial of issues of fact in the supreme court. In the State of Ohio, with the exception of a few years, it has always been the law, from the very organization of the State government in 1802 down to this day, that there might be an appeal from the common-pleas court, which answers to the district court in the Territories, to a higher tribunal, and there a second trial be had of the questions of fact as well as of law. I never have been, in ordinary civil causes, much in favor of that mode; but where such immense amounts are involved as there are in these land claims, it does seem to me that it would be very wrong indeed to allow the district judge to settle conclusively the facts of the case, leaving nothing for the supreme court to do but to sit as a court of errors to determine whether there had been error in point of law. I do not think that would be wise at all.

Besides, it may well be that between the time that a case is tried in the district court and retried in the supreme court important evidence may have been discovered, and there is no reason why upon the discovery of this new and important evidence the party, whether the United States or the claimant, should be driven to file a bill in equity to have a new trial upon the ground of the newly discovered evidence, when the trial can take place without any new suit and without any delay in the supreme court of the Territory.

There is another reason why this clause ought not to be stricken out. The bill provides for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in every case, unless the Attorney-General shall forbid the appeal. We know that the Supreme Court of the United States cannot find the time to settle the questions of fact in all these cases. Already is that court so burdened, and burdened by the decisions of questions of fact, that it is three years, I believe, behind the docket, as the familiar phrase is. Therefore this bill provides, and wisely provides, that the facts of the case shall be found by the supreme court of the Territory, consisting of three or five judges, as the case may be; I believe three judges in some of these Territories and five in one. This bill provides that those judges shall find the facts of the case as a jury would find a special verdict, and then the Supreme Court of the United States will take those facts as thus found as the real verity of the case, the real facts of the case, and will be relieved from deciding upon questions of fact and its decisions be limited to questions of law. But if you strike out the words which the Senator from Oregon moves to strike out, then the Supreme Court of the United States must do one of two things: it must either retry the facts, or it must take the facts as they were found in the inferior court of the Territory, the district court. I hope the Senator will see that that would not be right, and that his amendment, if it were to prevail, would entirely destroy the symmetry of the system provided by this bill. No possible injury can result from allowing the supreme court of the Territory to hear additional testimony to that which was heard in the court below; and when we come to consider that this court, which is a high court composed of all the judges, three at least, or five where there are five in a Territory, is charged with the grave and responsible duty of finding definitely the facts of the case, so that the Supreme Court of the United States may rely upon its finding, it is easy to see that these words ought not to be stricken out of the bill.

After a finding by the court, and after a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States, if the case is appealed there, in favor of a claimant, and the necessary provisions in regard to surveys so as to definitely fix the boundaries, for they are to be found by the decree, then there is a provision for patents to be granted; and that is necessary because, by some inadvertence or other, the law providing for the issue of patents upon these claims has been repealed by Congress, and no patent can now issue, no matter how clear and indisputable may be the goodness of a claim or its validity.

Then, finally, comes another provision which is to be borne in mind. It is for the protection of the United States; and it is that the testimony may be taken and these claims settled before it is too late, before the witnesses die by whom the facts may be proved. The bill requires that every petition shall be filed within two years from the taking effect of this act, and the last section of the bill provides that every claim in which a petition is not thus filed within two years shall, after the lapse of three years from the taking effect of this act, be deemed to be abandoned and shall be forever debarred. The object in making that three years instead of two years, which is the limit for the filing of petitions, is to interpose a bar against any application to Congress or to one of the Departments if the party has let the three years elapse without preferring his claim.

The bill is one very highly in the interest of the Government, because until these claims are ascertained and are segregated from the rest of the land in these Territories, it is impossible for the Government to tell what are public lands and have them surveyed and brought into market, and the Territories themselves, as I have said before, are injured in two ways by this uncertain state of land titles: first injured by preventing migration to those Territories, and secondly, by the litigation to which these conflicting titles give rise.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I hope that the Senator from Oregon will not press his amendment, or if he should that it will be voted down. The Committee on Private Land Claims have given to this subject the most patient consideration. I think we had it under consideration for more than two months at this session, and we had it at the session before and at the session prior to that, and I am quite sure that I have never had anything to do in my life with a bill that I have bestowed more painful attention upon than I have upon this; and what I can say of myself I can say of every other member of that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to the amendment of the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no doubt that this is a meritorious bill, and that it has received the very careful consideration of the committee who made the report, and I have nothing to say in answer to the general remarks of the Senator from Ohio in support of the measure; but I think his argument would lead the Senate to conclude that my amendment goes further than it really does.

The Senator from Ohio says that it was not the intention of the committee to permit a single judge to find, without regard to appeal, the facts in these cases. Certainly not; and if my amendment were adopted that matter would not be left to the judgment of one judge; the bill would still provide for an appeal to the supreme court of the Territory. The only effect of the amendment that I have submitted is to prohibit the taking of new testimony on the retrial of the case before the supreme court. It does not prevent the supreme court of the Territory from retrying the case as to the questions of fact, but it limits them on the trial of those questions to the testimony taken in the court below.

In these cases, each claimant will have the privilege of coming into the court below and making out his case on the pleadings and on the testimony; he will there have his trial; he will there have a full hearing of the case upon the merits; he will have all the time that he desires to have, because the law of the Territory gives him all the time that is necessary; he will take all the testimony that is desired in order to support his allegations in the court below. Now, upon what principle or by what rule of practice heretofore prevailing in the courts should he, if the case is decided adversely to him there, be permitted to come in before the supreme court and take further testimony? I say that the bill as reported by the committee, so far from being in accordance with the practice of courts in that respect, is directly in opposition to the practice in all courts. Take the trial of chancery cases generally under the codes of the different States. An appeal is provided for generally from the decision of the inferior to the superior court, and the law as a general thing in most of the States provides for a trial de novo in the superior court both as to questions of fact and of law, but in no case does the supreme court hear new testimony. It is confined in its trial to the case as made by the parties in the court below.

Mr. THURMAN. To what supreme court does the Senator allude?

Mr. MITCHELL. I refer to several; to my own State among the rest.

Mr. THURMAN. Let me tell the Senator that the Supreme Court of the United States often receives evidence. Hats have been made right here in the presence of the Supreme Court by machinery; the wool and fur put into a machine and a hat made by machinery as evidence in the presence of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I would ask the Senator from Ohio why he did not provide in this bill that on an appeal from the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico to the Supreme Court of the United States the party should be at liberty to take new testimony?

Mr. THURMAN. I would have provided it if it would not have broken down the Supreme Court of the United States, who are already too much burdened with business.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is just as much reason for the parties having the privilege of taking new testimony in the Supreme Court of the United States as in the supreme court of the Territories. I repeat, it is in opposition to the general practice.

Mr. BAYARD. May I suggest to the Senator that the common practice in the circuit courts of the United States on appeal from the district courts is to take testimony anew in extenso beyond what was taken below? In cases of admiralty it is always done, and in all cases that I know of the depositions used below are used above, and additional testimony is taken in nine cases out of ten.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would inquire of the Senator from Delaware if that is not in cases where application is made to the appellate court, and the court has upon a showing made allowed additional testimony?

Mr. BAYARD. Not at all. I merely mention this as an analogy to show the Senator that the present bill contains this feature as a matter of excess of caution in favor of the Government, lest while testimony has been taken below there may have been omissions, which can be rectified in the court above to throw more light on the subject.

Mr. MITCHELL. I inquire of the Senator from Delaware if he thinks that a good practice?

Mr. SARGENT. I think the committee are entitled to the thanks of the Senate for the care with which they have examined this matter and the careful bill which they have reported. The Commissioner of the General Land Office for several years past has called the attention of Congress over and over again to the evils both to the Government and to the people of the Territories which this legislation is designed to remove. As there seems to be no question on the part of any Senator that the object of the bill is good, and being very fully satisfied of that myself, I will simply remark upon the point raised by the Senator from Oregon by his amendment.

It is chiefly to the advantage of the Government, in the supreme court of the Territory, when there is a trial de novo of law and facts provided for by the bill, the propriety of which is not questioned, that the Government should have the opportunity to introduce new evidence. The claimant will come before the district court thoroughly prepared with his case. He has had the documents, mostly matters of record, upon which his case relies, in his safe or in his possession for years, and has been waiting for an opportunity to present them. He brings them forward, carefully marshaled, for the first time. In that tribunal the Government is not aware of the pretension that he makes and of the evidence which he brings forward to establish it. The trial proceeds, and the Government will suffer from any want of an opportunity to review that testimony and supplement it by that which it may be in the power of the Government to supply on further opportunity. This bill does not provide, and it would not be wise to provide for motions for new trial before the court below. There must be some substitute for that power, or else that power must be given. There must be, either where there is newly discovered evidence or where there has been an excusable failure to introduce the best evidence, some opportunity before some tribunal to receive that further evidence. It is given by this bill, and I think in the very best form by the power which is granted to the appellate court in trying the case de novo on the law and the facts to receive such further evidence as either party may desire to present.

There is another advantage which will suggest itself to the mind of every lawyer for both parties. If this case is to be tried de novo on the facts, it is very necessary that the court which is to ascertain and determine finally the facts for the use of the Supreme Court of the United States should have that valuable opportunity of testing the accuracy, the credibility of witnesses, by observing the manner in which they testify, by bringing those witnesses to that test of which every lawyer knows the value, of their appearance in court which speaks frequently more strongly as to their credibility than any other circumstance, and which it is impossible to determine from simple record evidence. I think that the bill would be seriously crippled, that the Government itself would be placed at great disadvantage in disposing of these important interests, unless the power were given, for a tribunal higher than the district court, where these proceedings must originate, to finally settle the facts on which these great property rights both of the Government and of the claimants are to be determined; and for that reason I shall vote against the amendment of my friend from Oregon.

Mr. HAGER. Mr. President, we have had some experience in settling land claims in California under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and therefore I should like to say a few words on this question.

As I understand it, this bill provides that a suit may be instituted in the district court of the Territory, where a trial is to be had and issues of fact are to be settled by a jury. It then provides for an appeal to the supreme court of the Territory where there is a trial de novo without the intervention of a jury, opening the whole case upon all the issues, as I understand, even upon the issues that were settled by a jury. That is to say, the supreme court of the Territory may go into a new trial in regard to the very matters that were settled upon issues being formed and submitted to a jury. In that respect I think that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon might with some propriety be made. But I am inclined myself to favor the section as it now stands, that is that there should be a new trial in the supreme court of the Territory; but I am in doubt as to what effect that new trial should have on the issues of fact which have already been submitted to a jury and found by them, either for or against the claimant, as the case may be. I should like to have the Senator from Ohio, as chairman of the committee who reported this measure, explain whether it is the intention in the trial de novo before the supreme court that their judgment shall override the issues that were submitted to a jury and the findings that may have been made by the jury. In that case we had better dispense with the jury entirely. There is no necessity for submitting issues to a jury in the district court below and then having the whole case sent up for a retrial without any regard to the finding of the jury in the supreme court.

Mr. THURMAN. I can answer the Senator right now if he prefers.

Mr. HAGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator will turn to the second section of the bill—I call the amendment of the committee the bill—he will find that it reads as follows:

That all proceedings subsequent to the filing of said petition shall be conducted as near as may be according to the rules of the courts of equity in the proper Territory, except that the answer of the attorney of the United States shall not be required to be verified by his oath, and no continuance shall be granted unless for good cause shown; and the said courts shall have full power and authority to hear and determine all questions arising on said petition relative to the title of the claimants, the extent, locality, and boundaries of said claim, or other matters connected therewith, fit and proper to be heard and determined, and by a final decree to settle and determine the question of the validity of the title and the boundaries of the grant or claim presented for adjudication.

And further down it is provided:

And the court may, at its discretion, order disputed facts to be found by a jury, according to the regulation and practice of the said courts when directing issues in chancery before the same court.

The Senate will see then that this is a proceeding in equity, and the Senator knows that it is within the discretion of a court of equity whether to send out an issue of fact to be tried by a jury, or not, and the Senator is also aware that if twenty juries have decided in favor of a fact in a court of equity, the chancellor is not bound by their decision; on the contrary the cases are, I was going to say, innumerable, but certainly they are by the hundred, in which the issue of fact has been found by a jury one way and both in England and in this country the court have said, "that is wrong and we will not be bound by it." But when the appeal is taken from the district court to the supreme court, of course that vacates all findings below, and the matter comes up res nova into the supreme court as a court of equity, and if that court in the exercise of its equity powers, for it has equity powers, shall see fit to order the trial of a fact by a jury, I suppose it could do so without any express provision; but there is no necessity for it; and as to the particular question that the Senator puts, whether it is to disregard the finding of a jury, the district court itself may disregard that finding as any court of equity may.

Mr. HAGER. In that case I would recommend that that provision be stricken out, "and the court may, at its discretion, order disputed facts to be found by a jury." If the court has the power to make an order of that kind, why is it necessary that we should put a clause in the bill authorizing it to do so? I am aware of the fact that a court of equity may, to inform its conscience, submit a matter to a jury; and if it has that power, there is no necessity of putting it in this bill. On the contrary, by our making it an enactment, it appears to me the effect might be to require a finding by a jury, which would give it more force than the ordinary submission of an issue by a court of equity to inform the conscience of the court. I am not sure but that, if we embody this language in this bill, the court would be bound to follow the verdict of the jury. Why should we have this provision in the bill at all if the court may submit an issue of this kind?

As the United States commission for the purpose of settling land claims in California was originally formed, it was merely a commission to take testimony and make a finding in regard to the case without the intervention of a jury, and from that commission appeal was taken to the United States district court where a trial de novo was had, and from there to the Supreme Court of the United States. Now this proceeding assimilates to that which did exist in California under the same treaty of Gaudalupe Hidalgo. In the first instance here, the case is entered in the district of the Territory where a trial is had. I would say, let it be a trial before the district court, an investigation, which if the parties submit to, all right. But then an appeal may be taken to the supreme court of the Territory, where there is to be a trial de novo upon the hearing of testimony as fully perhaps or more so than in the court below. A judgment is there pronounced. Then an appeal upon the law matters that may arise in the action may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. While I am opposed to striking out that portion of the bill which the Senator from Oregon proposes to strike out, I am inclined to think that we had better strike out that which authorizes issues of facts to be submitted to a jury.

I am aware of the fact that in California a great many frauds have been perpetrated in regard to these old Mexican grants by forgeries and by perjury; and the sooner these cases shall be determined in New Mexico the better it would be.

I find in the third section a very dangerous provision which I am inclined to think had better be stricken out, and on which I will make some remarks perhaps when we reach it.

I understood the Senator from Ohio to allude to cases where grants have been confirmed for much larger quantities than the parties had originally asked for. I would refer in confirmation of that to a fact which is well understood with us. Formerly the survey was a judicial question; the court made a decree giving the exterior boundaries of a grant, and then the survey was to be made within those exterior boundaries, and the court could then review the survey and ascertain whether it was in accordance with the decree. So the law originally stood; but Congress saw fit to change it, to take away from the courts the power to settle these boundaries under the survey and throw it into the Department of the Interior so that the surveyor-general in the State of California first passes upon it, and then an appeal was taken to the Secretary of the Interior here and the matter finally settled as to the survey; and in some cases, as we all understand, grants have been extended far beyond what were the exterior boundaries mentioned in the decree made by the court. In that way ranch claims have been extended far beyond what I think they ought to have been and far beyond what the original grants specified.

Mr. THURMAN. The remark just made by the Senator from California is very true and was considered by us, and we have completely remedied it by the provisions of this bill, so that there cannot be any such thing done again. I have but a word more to add to what has been said upon this amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

In the first place it is most perfectly true, as was said by the Senator from California on my left, [Mr. SARGENT,] that in nine cases out of ten, perhaps ninety-nine out of a hundred, this provision will inure to the benefit of the United States. But there is still another reason which I ought to have mentioned before why this provision should remain. Much of the testimony in the district court will be oral testimony delivered on the stand; and if the supreme court is to be limited to the same testimony that was given below, then there must be a bill of exceptions or some mode of embodying all that testimony, and then the supreme court will have mere paper testimony instead of that best of all possible tests of a witness, his examination before the triers of the cause. Then, if the supreme court of the Territory is to be allowed to have the presence of these witnesses and to have the best test of the truth, an oral examination in open court, that is wholly inconsistent with the idea of limiting that court to the testimony that was given below, for it would raise in every case fifty side issues as to whether that same testimony was given below or not. I hope that this amendment will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAGER. I move to strike out on line 22, of section 2, all after the word "rejected" to and including the word "court" on the twenty-fifth line. The words I propose to strike out are:

And the court may, at its discretion, order disputed facts to be found by a jury, according to the regulation and practice of the said courts when directing issues in chancery before the same court.

If there is to be a trial de novo in the supreme court above, I do not see any necessity for putting the parties to the expense of a jury trial in the district court below. If there is a trial by jury at all, it should be in the supreme court, where is intended to be the last and final and great hearing of the case, and an additional trial will only add to the expense and to the embarrassment. In California there were no juries in any of these cases. The land commission first heard the case, as I stated; it then went to the United States district court, and from thence to the Supreme Court of the United States. Now here are two hearings on the facts of the case. The verdict of a jury will only embarrass the action of the supreme court in my opinion; they are not bound by it. There is a trial de novo. If the judgment below is satisfactory to the parties, there will be no appeal to the supreme court; if there should be an appeal to the supreme court, the verdict of the jury below can have no force or effect upon that court whatever. Therefore I move to strike out this clause.

Mr. BOGY. I merely rise to explain the necessity of keeping the bill as it is. The testimony given in all these cases will mostly be documentary. There will be very little oral testimony in relation to these claims in New Mexico, and the only questions of fact about which there may be some complication, will grow out of the matter of boundaries.

Mr. THURMAN. And the question of forgery now and then.

Mr. BOGY. I am not aware that there can be many cases of that kind. I do not think there possibly will be any in New Mexico. The number of claims in New Mexico is limited; the number in Colorado and in Arizona is limited. The amount or quantity of land granted by these claims may be very large, but the number of claims is now well ascertained. Every claim that has any existence is known. Every claim has heretofore been filed under some law of the United States; and it is hardly possible that there can be any forgery at all. I say from great experience in matters of this kind as a lawyer in my State attending to land cases, that the only contested facts will grow out of the question of boundaries; the testimony with regard to the origin of a claim, the extent of a claim, the validity of a claim, will all be documentary. Boundaries are very loosely expressed, necessarily, in a new country, going from one branch of one stream running in a certain direction to another stream running in another direction, or from the foot of a certain hill or over a certain mountain or down a certain valley. These are the general descriptions which are given, and no other descriptions could well be given. Therefore there may be some difficulty in regard to questions of boundary; but there will be difficulty in regard to nothing else. It is important for the protection of the Government, not for the protection of the claimants, that a jury shall pass upon the extent of the claims, because the question of boundary involves the question of extent. If you did not do this, one of these judges might construe a claim to be ten times as large as it ought to be, on account of these loose descriptions as to boundary. It is therefore for the protection of the Government that the question should be submitted to a jury. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The matter was well considered in committee, and I hope the bill will remain as it is.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say a word before this vote is taken. We all agree that the court would have this power, even if these words were stricken out of the bill, in an ordinary equity case. The reason why we put them in the bill was because, this being a statutory provision, there might be some question whether or not the ordinary powers of a court of equity to send out an issue to be tried at law by a jury would apply in such a case; and as we intended it should apply, we thought it best expressly to declare it. Upon a bill in equity, as I say, this district court has, as a matter of course, a right to have an issue tried by jury; but this being a statutory provision, entirely so, it was thought there might be some doubt whether or not there could be a jury trial unless we expressly put it in, and therefore out of abundant caution we put it in the bill.

It is said by the Senator from California on my right [Mr. HAGER] that perhaps putting it in the bill may be construed to make the verdict of the jury obligatory upon the chancellor. I do not think so. We had in Ohio from 1824 up to 1853 what was called our chancery practice act, an act that was drawn by Mr. Thomas Ewing, whose great reputation we all know, by Judge Dunleary, and by a former chief justice of the State, Judge Scott. That chancery practice act contained precisely such a provision as this, and no court in that State ever considered that that compelled the court to forego its own judgment and be bound by the finding of a jury. That chancery practice act of ours is commended in very high terms by Chancellor Kent in his commentaries as being the most admirable summary of the practice of the highest courts of equity, and I say that in that there was just such a provision as this, and it was never construed to mean that the court cannot set aside or disregard the finding of a jury, for, as was well expressed by the Senator from California, the verdict of a jury in such cases is simply to aid the conscience of the chancellor.

I think on the whole that we had better preserve the bill as it is, and I do not see any necessity for repeating this provision in regard to the trial in the supreme court. In fact, so far as I am concerned personally, I would as soon let everything in these cases be tried by a judge alone without the intervention of any jury, but it perhaps will be more satisfactory to have a jury sometimes. There are certain cases in which courts of equity have been disposed to try questions by a jury, and there they do it in their discretion, where there is a single naked question at issue, as for instance whether a deed was a forgery—a question that has arisen very often in cases of these grants; whether or not the title papers were forgeries. That has been from time to time settled in that way. So on a question of heirship, on a question of identity of the person, or, as was suggested by my friend from Missouri, a question of boundary. I think that this bill will work well if it is kept in this particular just as it is.

Mr. HAGER. I do not think the Senator from Ohio answered the objection that I made to this provision. I moved to strike it out for the reason that it could have no force and effect in the trial de novo in the supreme court. If it is necessary or if it is advisable to have a trial by jury upon a special issue of any kind in the district court to inform the conscience of that court, the same provision ought to be made in the case of the trial de novo before the supreme court, as the finding of the jury in the district court would have no force or effect in the supreme court when the case was to be heard there. That is the criticism which I made upon it. Now if the clause be stricken out there and put at the end of the section, so as to provide that in a trial before the district or supreme court either court may at its discretion order disputed facts to be found by a jury, I should have no objection to it. I do not object to a trial by jury. I would not advise it in these land cases, because I think there is more safety in a trial before the court than there is before a jury in regard to these land matters. That is my judgment; but I do not object to a jury trial for any purpose where the court wishes to inform itself upon a disputed question of fact; but the point is that if the jury find in the district court, their verdict is of no force or effect in the supreme court where the trial de novo is had. For that reason I think the provision is out of place. The supreme court ought to have the same power, or both courts ought to have the power.

Mr. BOGY. One word in answer. I did not hear everything that was said by the Senator from California; but I understood him to say that if this is necessary in the district court, it should also be necessary in the supreme court. The answer to that is that the district court is composed of one judge, and to protect the Government it is important that the facts should be tried by a jury; but the supreme court is composed of a number of judges, and it is believed that the protection is sufficient there without the necessity of a jury trial. I therefore hope the amendment will be voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. HAGER] to the amendment of the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOGY. I wish to move an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which is conformable to the wish of the committee and of the Delegate from New Mexico, and I believe the Delegate from the Territory of Arizona. It is as to the additional compensation provided for the judges in section 10. I move that the entire section 10 be stricken out. It provides for an additional compensation of $2,000 a year to the judges of the district court for this service. The Delegates from these Territories request that the section be stricken out. They know what they want. It is a matter in which we have no interest except to concur with them. The salary now I think is $3,000. We provide in section 10 an additional salary of $2,000. The Delegates of the Territories, I repeat, request that this amendment be made so as not to endanger the bill in the other House. I therefore move that the tenth section be stricken out.

Mr. THURMAN. I will not resist the motion, because it is the wish, as stated by the Senator from Missouri, of the Delegates from these Territories; but my own individual opinion is that it ought to be in the bill and that it ought to be the law. I do think that when this large amount of duty is imposed on these judges, which does not rest on their shoulders now, and which, if discharged in any other mode, would cost the Government three or four times as much as this additional salary, the Government ought to be willing to pay them a fair compensation for their labor. But as the Delegates think that the section ought to be stricken out, and that its retention will endanger the passage of the bill, I make no objection.

Mr. BOGY. I concur with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I perceive that this bill contains more judicial proceedings than it does private land claims. Although it starts out with lands it ends in the law, as perhaps it is perfectly natural that it should. I should like to inquire of the Senator having the bill in charge——

Mr. THURMAN. Let this motion be voted on first.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose the Senator lets me make the inquiry first.

Mr. THURMAN. Well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire, as it relates to this question of striking out, upon whose shoulders rests this enormous amount of duty at present which is to be imposed on these judges?

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator had been in when I stated what the bill was, he would have understood——

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I was not in.

Mr. THURMAN. This duty now rests on a man who cannot perform it, and because he cannot perform it in each of these Territories nothing has been done worth mentioning for twenty-seven years. A mere executive officer, the surveyor-general of the Territory, decides in the first instance. He reports his proceedings to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and he decides, not upon any sufficient testimony, as there is no examination of witnesses, and then he refers the matter to Congress, and then Congress sends it to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and as best they can they decide, and then they report to Congress, and then Congress decides; and the consequence is that nobody decides.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is logical, certainly, that where three distinct tribunals decide nobody decides!

Mr. THURMAN. They call it a decision, but it is not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is like what I remember somebody to have said, perhaps the Senator himself, about one of the tremendous struggles for kingly supremacy in Europe, that was summed up I believe in these words:

> Now Europe's balanced; neither side prevails,
> For nothing's left in either of the scales.

It would seem to be so here with these private land claims. It does not appear for these twenty-seven years, I take it, that the Committee on Private Land Claims has been overburdened with work in respect to these Mexican claims. Certainly we have not had a great number of reports from them; certainly all that we have had, almost without exception, have been satisfactory, and Congress has acted in accordance with the recommendations of the committee, and certainly it would almost always do so now, for reasons which are obvious to the Senator and which I need not repeat.

Now, if this section is to be stricken out, as I think it ought to be, and if the bill is to pass and the burden is to be put upon the judges of attending to these private land claims, the question naturally recurs how far it is necessary to legislate at all if the rights of the United States and those holding patents in the regular way under the United States are to be assailed upon ancient grants of twenty, thirty, or one hundred years' duration, because the Senator says that for twenty-seven years nothing has been done practically. If possessions are to be overturned after that length of time and trials are to be had as ab origine, so to speak, de novo of these ancient grants, so many of which we know have been forged and altered and fabricated and picked up which never had any bottom, for which no consideration was ever given, and the grantees of which could not even in the time of them be found, it is certainly open to very grave question whether it is right to relieve the Committee on Private Land Claims, who, in fact, are now the final arbitrators of questions of this kind, of their duty and to turn it over to judges of the territorial courts, of course with the right of appeal, &c., but we all know the rights of appeal are really determined in the end mainly upon the shape and complexion that the testimony takes in the court below. Although the Supreme Court of the United States may have the power which this bill may give—I do not know whether it does or not—to take further testimony, as it might in admiralty in some cases, and to correct difficulties that exist below so as to get at the real truth, yet in substance and in practice it would turn out, as it always has done in admiralty causes and other cases, speaking largely, that the final validity of these ancient claims would be cast one way or the other by what should take place in the territorial court and before the territorial judge and with the territorial district attorney. Now the question is whether the rights of the United States as the lord dominant, so to speak, as the original proprietor by political succession from Spain and from Mexico, ought to be determined in this way; whether it is not safer for the United States, whether it is not safer for those who hold grants, that the thing should be left where it stands now; that is, in such a condition (to take the Senator's statement, which I do with entire fidelity) that really no progress is made—in other words, that these ancient myths are not galvanized into life by furnishing any readier or easier means of ascertaining these ancient and perfunctory titles than now exist. To be sure, in some instances you may do injustice to somebody. You cannot do anything largely in the progress of government without in some instances imposing hardships on somebody; but every citizen must bear such incidental hardships for the general good.

Therefore it is that I submit it for the consideration of the committee whether, after all, it is not better for them, as it is for us, to hold the reins of power in their own hands, so that here they can review the evidence to the bottom, they can apply the test to every grant that is produced, to every location, to every one of the various methods that in the Mexican and in the Spanish times existed for getting a color of title to land of which the grantee or his heirs may not for fifty years have taken and kept a possession, and which, as we know from the cases that have been determined by the old commissions and by the Supreme Court, are—I was going to say more often than otherwise, but that would be too much—but are often supported by documents and maintained by testimony which at last turn out to be in the one case fabrications and in the other case falsehoods.

Where is our security? Is it not found chiefly and best here in the conscientious discharge of his duty by my honorable friend the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims and his learned associates? Is it not safer for our rights, is it not better for public justice, than it is to create this machine, however perfect it may be as a machine, and I certainly have no disposition to criticise it? I do not see any very good ground for criticising it as a theory; but why adopt it? Certainly if it is to be adopted, this increase of the salaries of these judges ought to be left out.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator's duty had compelled him to become as well acquainted with this subject as he is with most others, I do not think he would have interposed his objection. In the first place, no claim can be lawfully confirmed unless the land was private property at the time the treaties with Mexico were made. These claims are such as are expressly recognized by two treaties—the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden purchase. The United States by solemn treaty stipulations guaranteed to the owners of this property their rights. What, then, became the duty of the United States? Certainly it was to provide some mode by which these rights could be tried so that their existence could be verified and the boundaries of the various claims could be established. That was a solemn duty to the claimants themselves, and it was absolutely necessary also for the interest of the United States, so that these claims might be segregated from the rest of the land so as to leave the public lands which the Government might wish to survey and sell perfectly ascertained and well defined.

Has the Government of the United States performed that duty? No, sir; it has not performed it at all. It has left these people without any sufficiently accurate mode by which their claims can be ascertained, and it has left the people in those Territories without any certainty whatever as to what is public land and what is not. The consequence is that the existence of this state of things in these Territories is almost a complete annihilation of the homestead law there, because no man knows when he settles and attempts to obtain a homestead under the homestead laws whether he is not upon some one of these claims. The duty, therefore, which Congress owes to our own people and to our own Government, as well as the duty that it owes to these claimants, requires that some efficient and accurate mode should be determined upon to settle first the validity and second the extent of these claims.

Now let me call the attention of my friend from Vermont to the actual question. He seems to think that this bill is for the ease and comfort of the Committee on Private Land Claims. He never was more mistaken in his life. There are now before that committee thirty-four of these claims reported. I have looked into almost if not quite every one of them; and what do I find? What kind of evidence do I find on which that committee can adjudicate the question of the validity and the extent of these claims? In the first place, not one single particle of original testimony. Everything that pertained to the grant of the lands by the Mexican government—the license, the expediente—all are simply in copies. Are those copies true copies? We suppose them to be; but were the originals genuine, or were they forged? We have no evidence at all to show. A single man, and he surveyor-general of the Territory, has certified it up as the evidence that was offered before him, but without one particle of testimony to show whether the validity or genuineness of the documents was admitted or was contested. Every one of these claims has a paper foundation, besides being founded upon certain cases in pais, as the lawyers would say. There must be a paper foundation—the paper muniments of title granted by the republic of Mexico. They lie at the foundation of them all, and, as I said before, we have no testimony before us, nothing upon which we can determine whether these muniments are forged muniments or whether they are genuine.

But that is not all. I wish the Senator from Vermont could go with me and look over those thirty-four claims that are reported here for confirmation. I defy him or any surveyor or engineer within the limits of this District of Columbia to tell in one single case what are the boundaries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I could furnish the Senator with a District engineer that would do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; I defy the Senator to find an engineer or surveyor—and I had some experience in both those capacities in years long gone by—who can tell from the papers in a single one of those thirty-four cases what are the actual boundaries of the grants?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are they not, then, void for uncertainty?

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; they are not void for uncertainty, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a matter of proof to be taken, and that proof can only be well taken where the witnesses are examined face to face with the triers.

Mr. President, we have had various modes of ascertaining land claims in the history of the United States. First, under the Louisiana purchase there was precisely the same stipulation in effect, that private rights should be respected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator refer to article 9 of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo as the basis of these claims?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not remember at this moment what is the number of the article.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the article for the preservation of private rights.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator read it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Article 9 reads:

Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union, &c.—

And be entitled—to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the mean time shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, &c.

Is that it?

Mr. THURMAN. That may be it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the third clause of article 8 reads:

In the said territories property of every kind, now belonging to Mexicans not established there, shall be inviolably respected. The present owners, the heirs of these, and all Mexicans who may hereafter acquire said property by contract, shall enjoy with respect to it guarantees equally ample as if the same belonged to citizens of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. What volume of the Statutes is that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Volume 9, page 929.

Mr. BOGY. The treaty in that respect is only a reiteration of the law of nations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be, but I want to know upon what article of the treaty this bill stands.

Mr. BOGY. This is the point: This treaty, like the treaty for the acquisition of Louisiana and of Florida, is only a reiteration of the well-known law of nations in that respect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that may be, if the Senator will pardon me; but I ask him to tell me upon which article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo this bill is to rest, independent of the law of nations?

Mr. BOGY. It is the ninth article, I think.

Mr. THURMAN. The treaty provides that Mexicans remaining in the ceded territory may, if they see fit, become citizens of the United States, or they may go into Mexico, leaving the territory ceded. And now in respect to those who prefer to remain in the United States, that is in the ceded territory, it is provided, first, by article 8:

Mexicans now established in territories previously belonging to Mexico and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove at any time to the Mexican Republic, retaining the property which they possess in the said territories, or disposing thereof, and removing the proceeds wherever they please, without their being subjected on this account to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever.

Those who shall prefer to remain in the said territories—

That is, in those territories which are ceded to the United States—may either retain the title and rights of Mexican citizens, or acquire those of citizens of the United States. But they shall be under the obligation to make their election within one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty; and those who shall remain in the said territories after the expiration of that year, without having declared their intention to retain the character of Mexicans, shall be considered to have elected to become citizens of the United States.

In the said territories property of every kind—

This is the eighth article—

now belonging to Mexicans not established there shall be inviolably respected. The present owners, the heirs of these, and all Mexicans who may hereafter acquire said property by contract, shall enjoy with respect to it guarantees equally ample as if the same belonged to citizens of the United States.

Then comes article 9:

Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time, (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States,) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the mean time shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

The Senate will see by this that private property, whether of Mexicans residing within the ceded territory or of Mexicans who did not reside there, is absolutely guaranteed by the treaty; and it would be so without that reservation, because it could not be supposed that the cession of the territory was a destruction of private rights. And now I say to the Senate that this mode of confirmation affords no guarantee at all against fraud upon the United States nor any guarantee that justice will be done. I was going to show that there had been various modes of settling these titles. When Louisiana was ceded the Government established a commission which did the same thing. When Florida was ceded commissions were established to ascertain the boundaries of these titles.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Florida affair came nearer to this idea.

Mr. THURMAN. Florida first had a commission.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then they went into the courts afterward.

Mr. THURMAN. Exactly; and that is what we have done in Louisiana. We passed an act here in 1870, within the last four years, explaining the law, giving jurisdiction to the courts, because wherever the commission system has been tried it has been found to be a failure, and we have been compelled in the end, both in the case of the Florida purchase and in the case of the Louisiana purchase, to devolve this duty upon the courts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How about California?

Mr. HAGER. California had a commission.

Mr. THURMAN. But with an appeal to the courts.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes; certainly. A claim simply started in the commission, the same as it starts here in the district court, and went thence to the United States courts.

Mr. THURMAN. That is it; the commission was simply to gather together the testimony; the courts ultimately decided.

Mr. President, not to take up more time about this matter, I appeal to the Senate not to let this state of uncertainty last any longer. What is of more importance to the United States and to the people of these Territories is that this question shall be speedily decided. That is of more importance even than that the various claims shall be correctly decided, and we take the only mode by which anything like a correct decision can be arrived at, and this bill, to the best of our ability, provides a mode both for their speedy and for their correct decision.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if I shall not be thought intrusive I want to suggest to the Senator from Ohio and to the Senator from Missouri that I did not rise to make these inquiries because of any doubt I had that the right of a Mexican or Spaniard ought to have been protected by this treaty, whether there was a special provision for it or not. The Senators are wasting their strength, if they have not a superabundance of it, in undertaking to affirm that which nobody denies. The question is whether—after a lapse as to the Spanish grants of nearly seventy years, and as to the Mexican grants of what may be the same length of time almost, or, at any rate, of nearly thirty years of uninterrupted possession, either by the people who may claim these lands, or their grantees or descendants, or by somebody who is holding adverse to them, or a totally vacant possession and therefore a possession in the sovereignty of the United States—whether after this length of time there is any duty imposed upon us of opening up a bid of this kind to all comers, a revival of all questions by everybody who can bring forward a Spanish, going back to the beginning of this century, or a Mexican, going back to 1840 and before that, land grant, the right of which is to be asserted under these treaties. That is the question.

The question is not whether these people had rights. Undoubtedly some people had; but the question is whether the good of the Republic and private justice require that citizens of the United States who may have located upon these lands shall be turned out of their homesteads where they may have lived, planted their orchards, and built their houses, and the purchaser of some ancient Mexican or Spanish grant be put in; and then we indemnify this man who settled under us. I ask whether it is the policy, I do not mean the selfish policy, but the just policy of any government to reopen such old and stale claims any further than in a case that applies itself directly to the sovereign power here? If it can be made clear to us that it is a case for equitable and conscientious indemnification of some individual, if the land be vacant give it to the man, or if the land be occupied make him indemnity.

Mr. THURMAN. What does my friend mean by saying "reopening" claims?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I mean exactly what I say, that after a period of seventy years, since which a Spanish land grant may have been made, or after a period of almost thirty years, since the treaty with Mexico upon which you stand with respect to Mexican grants, the proposition is to open the door to people who during all this period of time have either lain by and have not entered into the possession of their grants or done anything to show their right to them. The question is, whether you ought to do that, or whether you ought not rather to say, in such cases, wherever the citizens of the United States have occupied these lands, we are not going to provide any except the ordinary tribunals of justice for the maintenance of these ancient and foreign claims.

We only guaranteed, Mr. President, by this treaty that these citizens of Mexico should have the equal rights that citizens of America have to the protection and defense of their property. Now, if a citizen of America claims that he has title to a piece of land that another man is in possession of, the law points out to him the means of bringing an action in the ordinary way, in his own right, in the ordinary tribunal, and taking the ordinary chances and consequences of victory or defeat. Why, under any obligation of this treaty, should we be called upon to stimulate the activity of people who may have come into possession of these ancient grants, both fraudulent and real—if there were any real ones, which some people almost have doubted—why should we stimulate this activity by providing special means, after this great lapse of time and without any limitation back of it, without any provision that I have discovered that no claim shall be received where there has been an adverse possession or otherwise, but opening everything back of that, and for three years in the future, to bring in these claims? That is the thing that puzzles me. I do not say it may not be right; I only say that I yet fail to see the ground upon which such legislation can be provided. It would look more, Mr. President, to me, if it had not come from a committee for which I have so great respect, as if some committee had been imposed upon by the adroit contrivances of land-jobbers and land speculators wishing to get a fresh opportunity to lay down their ancient Mexican and Spanish grants, the authenticity of which there would be now no means of contradicting, it may be, and thus to get a valuable location upon the best portions of the territories of the United States.

Of course with all sincerity I excuse the committee of not only not being a party—it would be an insult to suggest such a thing as their being a party—but of their being willing in any way to encourage that species of practice, which we all know, as a matter of general history—though it may be that we cannot prove it—does exist about the capital of this nation, that there are some people, (I must assume they cannot be citizens of the United States, because every citizen is presumed to be virtuous,) but there are some people of some country or nation who make it a part of their daily business to hunt up ancient claims or appearances of claims, ancient grants where old fabricated parchments can be brought forward, in order that they may gain some portion of the public property or the public domain. I do not want to encourage that class of people. I do wish to do justice; but when the treaty with Mexico which is brought forward as the example only binds us to give to each Mexican the equal right of a citizen of the United States to demand and enforce his rights to property, whatever they may be, why should we be called upon twenty-five years afterward to establish special tribunals and to furnish special facilities to that class of persons? Certainly the treaty does not require it; and if it is only to get rid of clouds upon the title and to protect citizens of the United States, why do we not pass a simple statute of limitations and declare that an adverse possession or a vacant possession, if we can use such a term, which is perhaps slightly inaccurate, should after a certain lapse of time be a bar to any claim? Certainly it is not much stretch of the principles of law as they have been administered in all civilized countries that even a perfect title, any claim to which has lain dormant for any great length of time, is presumed to have been surrendered either to the government that originally granted it or to its grantee, or to the party or his descendants from whom the original grant was obtained, or to the adverse occupant, if there be one, or his grantee or descendants who have occupied the land.

How often is it—the Senator from Ohio is certainly more familiar with that than I am—in land cases in the courts of the United States, that the fairest documentary testimony, that which is absolutely conclusive and beyond all suspicion of wrong or fraud in its origin, is overturned by a jury, and justly, upon a presumption which has no fact to found itself upon except the non-claim, that in some deed which is not produced that ancient title has been extinguished or has been passed over to the present occupant or to the country? Of course every lawyer knows in his common practice that in all cases of such ancient writings, produced either against the Government or against the occupant of land, the jury are authorized to presume, and are authorized to presume even in cases where the statute of limitations does not apply, that there has been a grant of that ancient title which has fallen into harmony and conformity with the present possession, and so the old claim is extinct. Why should we not—I put it by way of interrogatory and not by way of hostility—why should we not leave this to the ordinary principles and the ordinary tribunals of the law, fortified if necessary by a statute of limitations which shall cut off all suits after a suitable period of time?

Mr. THURMAN. The reason why we ought not to do so is because our own interest forbids our doing so, because our own interest requires that these claims shall be ascertained without any further delay, and that people shall not be prevented from acquiring homestead settlements, that the Government shall not be prevented from surveying and selling the lands and making a good title by claims that may be asserted in the ordinary course of the law, according to the ordinary custom of the law, twenty or thirty or forty years hence. The reason why they ought to be settled is precisely the same reason that prevailed in the case of the Louisiana purchase and the Florida purchase. Why did not the Government in those cases say, "We leave these parties to their common-law remedy to sue in the courts of common law for their land against anybody who trespasses upon them?" Why did not the Government do that in the case of Louisiana, in the case of Florida, in the case of California? Because the public interest required that there should be no such tedious procedure as that, but that the boundaries of the claims should be ascertained definitely and they be segregated from the rest of the domain, so that what is public land should be known to be public land. That is a sufficient reason for settling this matter and not leaving it in that way.

But, sir, there is another thing. The Senator says why should we open up these claims? We are opening up no claim at all, sir. He speaks of these people as having "lain by." They have not lain by. I believe it will turn out that perhaps ninety-nine out of one hundred, if not the entire body of these claims, are now on file before the surveyer-general of these Territories.

Mr. SARGENT. In substantiation of what the Senator says I call attention to the fact that under the law Congress passed more than twenty years ago providing for a tribunal for these parties to go before, the surveyors-general, the surveyor-general of New Mexico alone, in 1860, reported that he had over a thousand of these claims to be examined and decided on as soon as they could be taken up, and justice to the claimants demanded, as he reported, that the claims be acted upon at the earliest moment, but that a vigorous prosecution of this part of his duties would prevent the progress of public and private surveys anywhere with dispatch. He reported that up to this time he had been able to pass upon only fifty-five of these claims, and there were a thousand pending before him. That was fourteen years ago, and very little progress has been made since that time.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the truth of it. These people did make their claim. They made it in the way Congress told them to make it, in the way Congress prescribed that they should make it. But we have had no decision, and that is the trouble.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If these people really have title to the land by grants which were not void for uncertainty, what was the obstacle to entering into possession of their lands in the time of the grants? After the adoption of this treaty and at the time to which the Senator from California refers, what was the matter which prevented these grantees from taking possession of the land that was granted to them? Had we already granted these lands to somebody else? If not, and they were vacant, what obstacle prevented the owner from taking possession of his own?

Mr. THURMAN. Because, as I said, of the uncertainty of the boundaries, the United States will not recognize the claim that every claimant sets up, but insists that it shall be heard both in regard to the extent of the claim and to the definite boundaries of the claim. I do not know any law either that requires a man to go and take pedis possessio of his property on penalty that the United States will deprive him of his rights if he does not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you know of any law that requires him to file a claim in the office of any Secretary or surveyor if he has a good title to land?

Mr. THURMAN. I know that your law will not recognize his claim until it is confirmed by the United States. That is what I know.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; there may be that law or there may not; but certainly the Senator does not intend to say that if a man has a good title under Mexico by deed or grant, call it whatever you will, to a certain township or parish or pueblo or ranche in California or in Arizona, anything that the United States could do, short of an act of absolute tyranny, could compel him to do anything in the way of defending that grant except to take possession of it within a certain time?

Mr. THURMAN. I do know that the United States have never from the cession of Louisiana to this day agreed to recognize any one of these grants until it was confirmed by authority of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is nothing in the treaty which makes the title of these foreigners who become transferred to our jurisdiction depend upon the recognition of the United States. The treaty declares, as the Senator from Missouri has so well stated, simply a rule of public law; and that is, that when the allegiance of a citizen is transferred from one sovereignty to another, his rights of property are transferred securely and firmly with it. If, therefore, the Mexican, finding himself transferred to the other side of the line or the line transferred the other side of him, which would be easier, becomes a citizen of the United States in possession of his farm or ranche, to which he has a good title by grant or otherwise, he has nothing whatever to do to protect himself in that right. He does not require any confirmation by the United States either by public law or by treaty, any more than he requires a confirmation of his right to his wife and his children or to his liberty, because they all fall under the same head, as this treaty states it, which is a simple statement of the public law, that his life, liberty, and property are as sacred under one jurisdiction as they were under the other.

Mr. SARGENT. I beg to make a suggestion to the Senator from Vermont. The policy of the United States law, that which is clearly deducible from it and its practice, is, that the presumption is in all these Territories and in the State of California that the land is public land, and the Government in its ordinary process proceeds and sectionizes the land and either sells it or grants it by way of homestead; and the only right that it gives to a person who holds a grant for from five to ten leagues, as they may be, is to go before some commission or some court, or in the case of these Territories the more inadequate right of going before the surveyor-general and there establishing his claim, and in the latter case finding its way through the Commissioner of the General Land Office and coming to Congress, and Congress then affirms or makes good his claim to that boundary. When that is done, the United States will not enter upon it and will not sell it to its own citizens. If we delay the effectual segregation of these lands, we change the presumption as to public land into a real fact to the disadvantage of these persons; that is to say, we change into a practical fact, because our people under the license we give them go over all these pieces of land which were granted by the Mexican government, and we do not give them the remedy which the policy of our law in justice intends that they should have; that is, that we will adjudicate these matters and set them off by themselves. That is the only protection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from California founds himself, as he states, upon a presumption, and that is the presumption that where territory is acquired from a foreign power, although it may be settled and occupied, or there may be private ownerships existing by record where there is not an actual occupation, all that territory is unappropriated public land and belongs to the public domain. I respectfully dispute the existence of any such legal presumption.

Mr. SARGENT. I was not speaking of a mere presumption; I meant to say that that is the actual effect of our legislation on the subject, and it is the practice of the Government. I do not say it is just, but it is so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that practically the Government has ever turned anybody out of possession on the presumption that it is public land, and if so whether that citizen or Mexican, whatever he may be, would not have had an adequate cause of action against the officer who ejected him, provided he had a good title?

Mr. SARGENT. I do say he has no standing in court. I say that is our practice every day in these Territories, and that has been the practice to a certain extent in California; but not to so great an extent there, because we early provided a remedy there which to a certain degree was sufficient.

Mr. THURMAN. I can give the Senator one instance in my committee-room now, where the head of the General Land Office has ordered a tract of land, upon which there are more than a hundred settlers under a Mexican grant, to be surveyed into sections and put up for sale as public land.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good; let us test that. Suppose that those hundred settlers have the means of proving in a district court of the United States, or in a circuit court of the United States, or in a court of a State, the fact that they are the private owners of that land, does the Senator mean to say that the laws of the United States authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office or anybody else to expel those people from that land except by due process of law, by judicial procedure? If they were expelled by force, does the Senator mean to say that having a good title they could not defend it, as he or I could defend our titles, by an action at law in our own behalf? Is there any such statute in America? I think not.

Mr. CRAGIN. I do not wish to interrupt this discussion or to delay action on this bill; but I think it is desirable to have an executive session this afternoon. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to have one now I will submit the motion, but if not I have nothing to say.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us have a vote on the bill. I do not want to say a word more.

Mr. SARGENT. Nor I either.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] to the amendment of the Committee on Private Land Claims to strike out the tenth section.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate; I apologize for what I have said; but in order to put on record my opposition to this bill without a further consideration of it, and to save calling for the yeas and nays as far as I am concerned, I move to postpone the bill until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Boreman, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Ogleaby, Patterson, Pease, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, and Washburn—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Edmunds, Hamlin, Morrill of Vermont, Pratt, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, and Stewart—26.

So the bill was passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read:

A bill enabling claimants to lands within the limits of the Territories of New Mexico, Colorado, and Arizona to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3098) to amend the act entitled "An act to reorganize the courts in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and the bill (H. R. No. 3169) changing the time of holding circuit and district courts in Vermont, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PURCHASE OF LAND BY WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I beg the indulgence of the Senate to take up a bill a little in advance of its being reached on the Calendar. It will probably be reached on Monday, and I am fearful I shall not be present on that occasion, and there may be a necessity for an explanation. It is the bill (S. No. 313) to confirm the purchase, by the executive department, of three acres of land, more or less, in the vicinity of Nashville, Tennessee, known as the site of Fort Houston, and to donate and convey the same to the Fisk University for educational purposes.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was read; which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu the following:

That the purchase by the United States, on the 21st day of August, 1865, from Russell Houston, of certain land, consisting of about three and one-fourth acres, situate in the city of Nashville, Tennessee, with the buildings thereon standing, and being the same premises described in a deed of said date from said Houston to the Chief Engineer of the Army, in trust for the United States, recorded in book 35, page 241, in the register's office of Davidson County, Tennessee, be, and the same hereby is, ratified, sanctioned, and confirmed, so that the said purchase, and the said deed thereupon executed, shall have the same legal validity and effect as if the same had been by a previous act of Congress specifically authorized.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to grant and convey to the Fisk University of Nashville, Tennessee, all the right, title, interest, and estate of the United States in and to said tract of land for educational purposes: Provided, That no further expense relative thereto shall be incurred by the United States: And provided further, That the trustees of the said Fisk University be, and they are hereby, authorized to sell and dispose of the above-described property at their discretion, and to use the proceeds elsewhere for educational purposes in connection with the said Fisk University.

SEC. 3. That the purchase, by order of the executive department, under an authority supposed to be conferred by the act of February 20, 1862, making appropriations for the construction, &c., of certain fortifications, &c., of certain land at Fort Hamilton, New York, consisting of about twenty-one acres, as a site for additional batteries, and conveyed to the United States by deed of Julia Delaplaine, of September 9, 1862, which said deed has been pronounced by the Attorney-General, by opinion of November 22, 1862, to vest a good and valid title in the United States, and upon which said land the said batteries have been duly constructed, be, and the same hereby is, confirmed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The last section is recommended by the Secretary of War, and was drawn up by the Judge Advocate General. There is no question about that. The point in the first and second sections is this: During the war it became necessary for the defense of Nashville that there should be certain lands upon a hill, three or four miles from the city, occupied for defensive purposes, and they were so occupied. An award to the owner was through a commission of the War Department, and it included a grant of the land to the United States; and it was taken in accordance therewith by the United States, the Chief Engineer of the Army receiving the title without any authority of Congress. The amount that was paid by the United States was $37,500. That included houses, improvements, and so on, as well as the land. The purpose now is to grant the land to the Fisk University, a colored institution which has occupied a certain portion of the land with its buildings. The land is of no use to the United States, and by obtaining a title by this act the United States can make this grant, and nobody will be injured by it and the institution will get a small amount.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much is the land worth?

Mr. SPRAGUE. The Secretary of War in his report states that he is not able to determine the value of the land. It is not worth very much. It is three or four miles from the city on a hill, and it was included in the award. This university occupies a portion of the ground.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Senator to say that it cost us $37,000.

Mr. SPRAGUE. No; the award for occupying this property included a house, barn, and so on, and from a careful reading of the report I find that the land was not considered of very great value, but the improvements thereon were of more or less value.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is an old acquaintance of mine, or I should not force myself on the attention of the Senate again to-day; but this has been here since the memory of man almost. It comes in a little different shape every time. I begin to believe now, from the phraseology of this bill, that the United States has no title at all to this land, and that it belongs to the original owner, unless we use it for military purposes; and we propose now to take the land by force of an act of Congress, and then not merely to release whatever right we may have, but to grant it to this university with authority to sell it and raise money, and then leave ourselves liable to an action by both parties for having disposed of property in one case that did not belong to us to the injury of the individual to whom it would revert, and in the second place to make good to this university all the money they may have obtained from the sale of it or its value, with, as in the case we had from New York a while ago, a few thousand dollars for costs and expenses. I think we ought to know what the state of the title is before we undertake to act on it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask the Chair whether this bill is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is a little doubtful on the point; but, on the whole, thinks it is not. The question is will the Senate proceed to consider the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Arkansas for thinking of that just when I was replying to the Senator from Rhode Island, who made a long speech on it.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is no disposition to cut you off.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit to the ruling of the Chair. If it is not before the Senate, the merits are not subject to discussion.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I asked the indulgence of the Senate to take up the bill, and I understood it was before the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON. I merely rose for the purpose of objecting, as I see it is going to lead to debate. I want to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to postpone the Calendar and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 313) to confirm the purchase by the executive department of three acres of land, more or less, in the vicinity of Nashville, Tennessee, known as the site of Fort Houston, and to donate and convey the same to the Fisk University for educational purposes.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not rise to say anything about the merits of the bill, but rather to call the attention of the Senator who has it in charge to two or three provisions, chiefly found in section 3, which I think he will agree with me would be rather odd if carried into a statute.

Section 3 provides—

That the purchase by order of the executive department, under an authority supposed to be conferred by the act of February 22, 1862, making appropriations for the construction, &c., of certain fortifications, &c., of certain land at Fort Hamilton, New York—

Consisting of so many acres, and conveyed by a deed which—has been pronounced by the Attorney-General, by opinion of November 22, 1862, to vest a good and valid title in the United States.

I suggest merely that this language would be rather extraordinary to be found in a statute, and doubtless it can be stricken out without impairing the efficiency of the section. I merely call attention to it, not making any motion about it. I do not know enough about the measure, taken up thus unexpectedly, to say anything about it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That section was prepared by the Judge Advocate General when the matter was referred to him. It became necessary to purchase certain lands; these lands were purchased by the Engineer Department, and they were conveyed to the engineer officers. The title by act of Congress is not perfected in the United States. The general formula is correct undoubtedly; but the United States have never accepted this title by formal act, and the report of the Secretary of War recommends the section as drawn up by the Judge Advocate General to meet that case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator tell us upon what ground it is that, supposing these lands to be worth $5,000, to that extent the Treasury of the United States is to be impoverished for the sake of giving $5,000 to a particular institution in the State of Tennessee?

Mr. SPRAGUE. That is another question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is one question.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The question of the Senator from New York was in relation to certain lands in New York harbor necessary for the defense of that harbor which had been purchased by the executive department, and which purchase it is necessary should be authorized by act of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator misapprehends the point of my criticism. I avoided saying anything about the merits of the section; I am not prepared to say anything about them. I called his attention to the fact that the proposed statute recites that a thing was done for such and such a purpose "and so forth," and that other things occurred "and so forth," and that this deed was considered in an opinion of the Attorney-General at such a time, saying certain things. I call attention to these matters as being unusual, and, I suggest to the Senator, unnecessary at least, to be found upon the face of a statute, and no part of them affects the merits of the case, nor would it impair at all the force of the section if they were omitted. I never happened to see such words in a statute before; and I merely suggest to the Senator that they do not appropriately belong as matters of form in a statute, assuming the end to be a good one. I understand him to say he did not draw the section.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It was officially sent to our committee and I supposed it would cover the case. It came from the Judge Advocate General and was recommended by the Secretary of War. I did not examine it further. It seemed to me it covered the point; but I leave the language to the Senate. But in reference to the Fisk University, the award, as I said before, was $37,500 for the claim the owner had on the Government for the land and for his buildings and for a variety of things.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How could we pay him damages for using the land if we had already bought it?

Mr. SPRAGUE. We had not bought it, but it was part of the compensation. We used this outlying land on the hill adjacent to Nashville as a matter of defense, on which an individual had a farm. He asked for damages, and damages were awarded; but to get damages he was required to give title to the United States. He gave title to an officer of the United States. The purpose now is to authorize the acceptance of the land on the part of the United States awarded by this commission.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senat proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I hope this bill will be disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator from California to withdraw his motion to go into executive session long enough to enable me to move to take up and put back in its place the civil-rights bill that it may be in order to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The understanding was that the civil-rights bill was informally displaced and that it would be the unfinished business.

Mr. SARGENT. That being so, I renew my motion.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I hope the Senator from California will waive his motion.

Mr. SARGENT. If I thought there was any hope of disposing of the bill immediately, I would do so; but I think the necessity for amendment has been pointed out, and it had better be considered further.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Permit me to read a communication from the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California withdraw his motion?

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir, I do not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 21, noes 20; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 1, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COURTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3098) to amend the act entitled "An act to reorganize the courts in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The bill was read. It provides that the justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, holding a criminal term for said District, may, when not engaged in the proper business of the criminal term, hold sittings of the circuit court, and employ the petit juries drawn for the criminal term in the trial of such cases depending in said circuit court as the justice presiding therein may assign to him for that purpose; and that the business done at such sittings shall be recorded in the minutes of the circuit court.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN VERMONT.

Mr. POLAND also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3169) changing the time of holding the circuit and district courts in Vermont; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It provides that the term of the circuit court holden at Rutland on the third Monday in October shall be held on the first Tuesday in October, and the term of the district court holden at Rutland on the 6th day of October shall be held on the 1st of October; that the term of the circuit court holden at Windsor on the fourth Tuesday in July shall be held on the third Tuesday in May, and the term of the district court holden at Windsor on the Monday after the fourth Tuesday in July shall be held on the third Tuesday in May, provided that this act shall not apply to the next term of the circuit and district courts to be holden at Windsor, but that the same shall be held as provided by law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

NEW LAND DISTRICTS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Public Lands the bill (H. R. No. 203) to create two additional land districts in the State of Kansas.

The bill was read.

Mr. SPEER. I must object to that bill; it seems to create two or three new land offices.

Mr. DUNNELL. It only creates two, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SPEER. I cannot do it now.

REPORTS ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 21, 1874, with the accompanying reports concerning the immigration service and the better protection of immigrants to the United States, be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being private-bill day, the regular order of business is the call of committees for reports of a private nature; but the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] who has charge of the bill in relation to American citizenship, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, desires to make a statement in regard to that bill. Under the regular order that bill will go over until Tuesday next.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I simply desire to say that I propose without further debate to call the previous question on the motion to reconsider. If the House sustains the previous question on that motion, I understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] will move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. If the House refuses to sustain that motion, I then propose to call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say a word at this point. It has been suggested to me by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that that committee is very anxious to go on to-day with the Indian appropriation bill, and I had thought that if the House would give the whole day to-morrow to private bills I would be willing that the Committee on Appropriations should have to-day. It is believed by the Committee on Appropriations that if they can go on with the Indian bill to-day, and the House will hold a night session, they may dispose of the bill to-day. We are all of course very anxious to facilitate the business of the Committee on Appropriations as far as possible. I am certainly very anxious that they should get along with their work. I do not desire that private bills or any other business should stand in the way of the appropriation bills, and if the House is willing to make that arrangement, to give the whole day to-morrow to private bills, that ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the arrangement suggested by the gentleman from Illinois will be made. I have no doubt that if the House will give us their assistance the Indian appropriation bill can be disposed of before to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. This will involve the postponement of the bill in charge of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] until Tuesday morning next after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to say as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that I desire to occupy ten or fifteen minutes in the discussion of the bill before any vote is taken in regard to it. I believe that is my right and privilege as a member of the committee reporting it. I understood that to-day being private-bill day the bill from the Committee on Foreign Affairs would, as a matter of course, go over until Tuesday next.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Would my colleague desire to submit his remarks before we had an opportunity to move the amendments agreed to in the committee?

Mr. MYERS. I desire to submit my remarks just as my colleague on the committee has submitted his.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I would have preferred to submit mine after the amendments were put in, if I could have done so.

The SPEAKER. The bill will go over upon the call for the regular order.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say a few words in regard to the order of business. When we last had a morning hour it closed while the Committee on Patents had a report before the House for consideration. That committee are entitled to another morning hour. We have several reports to make I do not care particularly to press the consideration of private bills now, except that for two Fridays unfinished business has intervened and cut off the morning hour. I think we would further the transaction of business by having a morning hour to-day.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] if it would not be satisfactory to him to have to-morrow exclusively for the consideration of private business? That would give him the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. If the House would agree to give the Committee on Patents two hours to-morrow in which to finish their reports I would have no objection. In the last morning hour we had but ten minutes.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to inquire if to-day and to-morrow are not what is known as objection days?

The SPEAKER. They are.

Mr. MAYNARD. Last Friday and Saturday were also objection days, and we gave them up in order to finish the legislative appropriation bill. I submit that we should not forego both to-day and to-morrow as objection days.

Mr. GARFIELD. We do not propose that.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The only question is whether we shall give to-day to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. It is within the control of the majority of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Before any motion is made in regard to it, I hope unanimous consent will be given that to-morrow shall be devoted exclusively to the consideration of private business, so that we will not be compelled this morning to antagonize the Committee on Appropriations. If we are left to antagonize the committee, to contend for our rights, we shall do it this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RANDALL. I object; I do not object to a morning hour to-morrow for private bills.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to make another inquiry. The Indian appropriation bill is now in Committee of the Whole. The last meeting that we had upon it was taken up in general debate, and I have received the impression some way that it was contemplated to occupy several hours more in general debate upon that bill, which would take up the whole of a day's session. Now, it seems to me we might more profitably devote this day to the consideration of private bills than to general debate on the Indian question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the proposition to the House. Is there objection to giving to-morrow wholly to the consideration of bills of a private nature?

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

MESSENGERS OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. GARFIELD reported back from the Committee on Appropriations the petition of messengers of the Supreme Court, asking for deficiency of pay and balance due them as compensation, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the Indian appropriation bill. Pending that motion I move that all general debate upon the bill be limited to two hours after its consideration shall have been resumed in Committee of the Whole.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the motion to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. POLAND in the chair) on the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate upon this bill has been limited to two hours. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] is first entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the gentleman proceeds I desire to give notice that the Committee on Appropriations will ask that the Committee of the Whole rise at half past four, if we shall not have concluded this bill by that time, and then ask the House to order an evening session to-night for the consideration of this bill. I say this now, so that gentlemen may help us if they are willing to do so.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the Committee of the Whole by any attempted analysis of the provisions of the bill now under consideration, believing that it has been better done by my colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations than I could do if I were to attempt it, and I think with sufficient particularity to enable all who have paid attention to the remarks of those gentlemen to understand the bill. But I desire to offer a few suggestions upon the past and present treatment of the Indians, and what I conceive to be the better policy to be adopted in the future toward them by the Government.

My colleague on the Committee on Appropriations from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER,] in speaking in behalf of the Indians, in the most forcible and eloquent manner alluded to the fact that they are without political status, that they have no political influence, and not being citizens they are without representation on this floor to defend their claims; and being without a voice, are left dependent upon the sense of justice and humanity on the part of Congress.

While I am not unmindful of the necessities and almost dependent condition of many of these Indians, and am willing to co-operate in executing any policy which may seem best calculated to ameliorate their condition, not inconsistent with the superior rights of the citizen who has a prior claim on the Government for his protection and security of person and property, I would desire that character of legislation which will look alike to the interest of each, believing that no other can in justice to all parties be inaugurated and carried into execution by the Government of the United States. Among those citizens who have this prior claim on the protection of the Government in their rights of person and property I represent many who have suffered great wrong at the hands of these Indians, in whose behalf both the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] spoke most fervently and eloquently. The character of legislation, then, which I desire is that which will be not only just, even generous, to the Indians, and just also to the citizen, so that he shall have the benefit of that protection which he is entitled to expect and has a right to claim at the hands of the Government, and that the Indian at the same time shall receive such consideration as he may be justly entitled to at our hands.

In arriving at a proper position to enable us to act more rationally and form a better and more reliable judgment as to what that policy should be, it may not be amiss, indeed I think it will be better, that we look for a moment at the true condition of the Indian as at present situated. I will not stop here to undertake to combat the position of my colleagues with reference to who have been oftener wrong, the white man or the Indian, in the wars which have arisen between them—who may have broken the treaties in the one instance or the other. Not that I do not feel that the hardy frontierman's cause is defensible; but I think it unimportant and immaterial for the proper discharge of the duties that devolve upon us. Nor can I agree with my colleagues that so much may be said in praise of that policy which has grown up under the administration of the Interior Department with reference to the Indians. I believe I am warranted by the facts applicable to the material and social, if not the moral, condition of the Indian, in saying that his condition now is much worse than it was twenty-five years ago, when he was passed from the jurisdiction of the War Department to the jurisdiction of the Interior Department. But I will not ascribe his worse condition to the one or to the other Department. It is the result of circumstances that surround his existence, and grows out of the fact that he is cut off from those resources that he heretofore could resort to for his support.

The last twenty-five years, Mr. Chairman, have been the most eventful quarter of a century that probably has marked the course of time during the Christian era. In it events of a more gigantic character in their social and political results have occurred than in any other twenty-five years, and especially on this continent. During that time more than three-fourths of the resources to which the red man could apply have been taken from him. He has been deprived of more than three-fourths of the territory that he then roamed over at will, seeking from its forests and its rivers and its lakes the game and the fish upon which he subsisted. There is but little left him, only a few buffaloes, that are now restricted almost exclusively to what a few years since was regarded as the great American Desert. The deer can no longer subsist him. The elk is disappearing. The bear and antelope and the other smaller game cannot be relied upon for his subsistence for a single month. But a few buffalo comparatively remain; and, estimating the Indians at two hundred thousand—and I believe, Mr. Chairman, that is as many as can be found within the limits of the United States to-day—if they were turned loose and left to depend entirely upon these natural resources, I doubt if enough could be brought together to subsist them for six months and keep them from absolute starvation.

Finding the Indian, then, in this restricted condition, both as to territory and the natural resources that are to be found in that territory upon which he can subsist, are we not placed in this position toward him, that one of two things becomes inevitable? We must either feed him, or, if we fail to feed him, we drive him into desperation, and war necessarily ensues, and extermination will follow. There are two views that will be taken of these questions, in favor especially of the policy of peace toward the Indians—feeding and peace. As a question of economy I believe it will be found cheaper to feed the Indians, and I am quite confident it will be found much cheaper in conjunction with that policy, if such restrictions are inaugurated, to put the Indian in such a state of subordination, such a condition of absolute control and subjugation to authority, that he will realize the full advantages that may result from his temporary support in preparing him, by making him acquainted with the arts of civilization, to become self-sustaining.

Apart from that there is another consideration, and, without stopping to make any particular comment or remark upon that sentimentality, which is begotten perhaps of the enchantment which distance lends to this subject, or yielding to the romance or poetry of fancied

Indian character, I feel and believe it is a natural feeling that comes out of the hearts of all that the Indian has some claims upon us. We have always recognized his possessory rights, and have treated with him recognizing these as a thing of substance and of value to him, and which in the course of the march of civilization and progress of our people we have practically deprived him of.

As a question of justice then, as well as humanity, is there not a resulting obligation upon the people of the United States to make some provision for the means of sustenance of these Indians, we having taken away from them the only means they had of existence? If we can do that more economically than we can by pursuing the other course, which would necessarily result in war, it seems to me it would be sanctioned by any wise view of statesmanship which can be taken of the subject, as well as receive the consoling reflection that humanity has been meted out in its proper proportions toward them.

What, then, would be the proper course to be pursued toward the Indians, if we adopt what is usually termed the peace policy; for I cannot believe there will be found many advocates to insist on withdrawing all support and in that way driving the peacefully disposed Indians (and there are a great many of them) where they would be forced into committing depredations which would lead to hostile collision and ultimate extermination? I say I cannot believe there will be found many who will be in favor of pursuing a policy of that character. I think we may rely that the sentiment which will be found more prevalent and more controlling is that milder sentiment toward them which will advocate such a course as will give them present sustenance with the hope that at an early day we may put them in a position of becoming self-sustaining.

One word, sir, in regard to our success in the line of civilizing the Indians. We have to admit in every direction, at all times and with all tribes of Indians the American people—the people of the United States—the Anglo-Saxon race has entirely and invariably failed. There is no success which crowns the efforts of any department, either of the Government or of social intercourse with the Indians through our missionaries, anywhere within the limits of the United States. There can be nothing claimed in favor of the administration of the Interior Department that will not find equally as great or greater claim when the Indians were almost exclusively under the administration of the War Department. Probably the highest plane of civilization which has ever been reached by any Indians in this country was during the time when they were under the control of the War Deparment; and, as I have already intimated, that cannot be ascribed to any influence exerted by that branch of the Government. It may possibly to some extent be attributable to the locality of the Cherokees and Creeks. When they occupied portions of the now States of Georgia and of Alabama they rose to a higher plane of civilization than they now occupy.

In these remarks I wish to be understood as referring to the Indian himself, for then the Indian was found who invented an alphabet through which they were able to correspond and to-day can correspond in a language that is their own, and which for a long time they have kept up and used as the medium of communication between themselves. Since then, in reference not only to these Indians but to the Choctaws and Chickasaws and all the others I know anything of, the line of civilization will be defined to be where the white blood has admixed and been intermingled with that of the Indian. The Sleekshin or Pin Indians, members of the Creeks, Cherokees, and Seminoles, are to-day no further advanced in the arts of civilization than they were nearly one-half a century ago. I do not deny there are classes who have rank among Indians and who have rights accorded to them who have obtained eminence in the arts and sciences of civilization, but they are not the pure-blooded Indians, not such as are characterized among the Creeks and Cherokees as the Sleekshin or Pin Indians. From this it may be deduced that intercommunication, so far as the advance of civilization among the Indians is concerned, would be the proper means of civilizing them, and that if you cut them off from communication, socially and altogether with the whites, it may be found almost impossible to civilize them. I do not hesitate to say if the object be to civilize the Indians, if that is the great primary, sole, and controlling consideration, the best thing you can do for that purpose would be to take them by the thousand, or as many as could be employed, and carry them to Massachusetts, or anywhere in New England or elsewhere, where they could be put into factories or employed in any manual labor in such manner as to learn how to work, and at the same time learn the language, habits, and modes of life of those among whom they would live. The theory of educating the wild child of the forest, inculcating in his mind high moral and religious sentiments in advance of learning him to work, has proved to be an absolute failure. Every where it has been so, I venture to say without fear of successful contradiction, both among us and among the Spanish-Americans when they ever attempted a similar course.

What, then, in view of the condition in which we find these Indians, may be adopted as a policy which will result in accomplishing the objects which may be desirable? Labor, as I have indicated, is the only instrumentality by means of which the savage has ever been civilized, so far as history has shed any light on this subject. We cannot bring the Indian into social contact with the whites and by an admixture civilize him; for, appealing again to history, we have found that one of three things has invariably resulted whenever an inferior and a superior race have been brought into social and economic contact and antagonism: either subjugation, amalgamation, or extermination. No inferior race in all historic times has escaped one of these three results; and I challenge the production of a single instance of a people who constitute an exception to this law. This principle may then, I think, be taken as axiomatic as applied to races of men. If this rule be reliable it may serve well as a point from which trustworthy deductions can be drawn as to the true policy to be adopted by the Government of the United States with the remnant of Indians now remaining.

We are not going to bring them into social contact. They are not prepared for that. We do not wish an amalgamation; and it has been found, if not impracticable, that the length of time required to absorb them in this way would be so great that we can scarcely look to it as a means of settling the question. The only remaining position then to be assigned to the Indian is that of subjugation. He must be subjugated. I do not mean by this to make him a hewer of wood and a bearer of burdens for the benefit of the superior race, but I mean such subjugation as will place him under the control of the Government, through such proper agencies and instrumentalities as may be proper for his own advancement and preservation.

On this subject I think we might be benefited by drawing somewhat upon the experience of even a race of people so inferior (as we regard them) as the Mexicans. They have civilized the Indian. They have brought him upon a high plane of civilization in regard to arts and sciences, as well as all the means of sustaining social civilized existence. It is true that the Spaniards and Indians have amalgamated very greatly. Captain Potter, undoubtedly one of the best authorities on this subject, says that of the eight millions of people within the jurisdiction of the republic of Mexico, there will not be found over one-eighth—that is, one million—who are of pure Castilian blood or direct descendants of the Spaniards who settled that country; leaving seven-eighths—or seven millions, the remainder of the population of the republic of Mexico—either Indians or mixed blood, part Indian and part Spaniard, and sometimes some other races have been thrown in to add to the general conglomerate. A great many pure-blooded Indians occupy high official position, distinguished as jurists, lawyers, and in high literary attainments. The late President Juarez, of Mexico, one of the ablest men who ever occupied the executive chair of that republic, was an Indian, without one drop of adulterated blood from any source, as was one of the competitors for that position as his successor. I might mention a number of others of whom the same remark may be made, and one who has some celebrity as a poet, (whose name I cannot at this moment recall.) In the valley of Mexico where the city is situated, as you travel northward until you reach the boundary between that republic and this, following either the meanderings of the Pacific or the wanderings of the Gulf, you everywhere find that the population is made up largely of Indians, pure and undefiled. Of course some are frequently found who have an admixture of Spanish blood; but you will rarely find in that population one who is more than a half-breed—who can claim to be more than half Spanish and the other half Indian. The greater proportion will be found pure Indian. These, although they may not be the very best character of population, have attained that point in civilization where they are enabled to maintain themselves, and if they could be protected by a just and permanent government would become prosperous and progressive. They are found to be peaceable, quiet, and comparatively industrious, reasonably ingenious, and capable of performing almost any character of labor that may be required, not alone in agriculture, but in the various arts necessary in carrying on the business of their country. A great number of them are now employed in the factories at Monterey as operatives; and the experiment has been altogether satisfactory to the wealthy English company that is continually adding to the machinery and extending the business of that large establishment.

How was this accomplished? Let us look for a single moment at this question. It has been accomplished in part through the instrumentality of the system called peonage and governmental control, exercised where found necessary by the military power of that Government, but much is due to the immediate direction of the faithful self-denying Catholic missionaries who have gone forth and established, where they did not already exist, what are called through that country the pueblos; being small villages or settlements with local governments of defined limited authority. Prominent in these establishments is the Catholic Church, and accommodations of shelter and comfort for the dependent, with ground on which they are required to labor and become able to support themselves. As progress is made the right of raising and grazing stock on a common pasture-land is added to other advantages. A military barracks, where is stationed a sufficient military force to protect the civilized portion of the population from outbreaks and massacres, and to enforce obedience on the part of the Indian, constitutes a necessary part of the policy. Through that process, from the time the Spaniards ceased to massacre and butcher the Indians, their civilization has gone on until it has reached the present plane. True, that work has in many places ceased. For the last thirty years little effort has been made in that direction. Where the efforts have ceased, where the Indians are no longer kept under the influences to which I have referred in the northern and eastern portions of Mexico, we find them as troublesome as they are among ourselves, where they are likewise neglected. If we with our superior intelligence, our greater and almost unlimited resources, have failed, while the Mexicans with their inferior means, circumscribed in every direction in respect to all the materialities of government and sustenance, have succeeded, may we not believe that their theory and their method of civilizing the Indians has something in it that does not belong to ours?

No distinguishable difference will be found between the missionaries that have gone out among our Indians and those of Mexico. From the time of the earliest French settlements on the Saint Lawrence to the present moment, they have been as self-denying, as devoted, as unselfish, and as sincere as probably could be found among the Mexicans and Spaniards. The difference then must have been in this, that our Indians were not under proper control. If success is to be achieved they must be brought into subjugation to the authority of the Government; it must take control over them and require that they shall work and earn their bread by the sweat of their face; and where failure has been the result of our policy it has in every instance, so far as we are enabled to ascertain, been because of a want of the necessary ingredient of the power by which you are enabled to exercise this control over the Indians.

Sir, if you go to-day to the banks of the Pecos, the San Juan, or the beautiful San Saba, you will find there the moldering ruins of church edifices that have been put up for the purpose of establishing these pueblos, and where they were established, but were afterward destroyed in consequence of their remoteness from the power of the government or from the internal wars that those people have been devastated by for a great length of time. From the feeble light that we can obtain from imperfect church history, traditions, and the memorials of the moldering ruins along these beautiful streams we learn that the missionaries were massacred because the Indians became dissatisfied and there was no sufficient power to control them there. In consequence of this these places remain desolate and in ruins, monuments of the sad history of the results of the self-sacrificing efforts of these devoted persons.

Sir, there may not be much necessity for the exercise of military interference further than to compel the Indians to remain on the reservations; but if we are to have the peace policy it must for a time necessarily be somewhat duplex in the means and manner of its execution. Military force cannot be dispensed with in the management of the Indians so long as they are disposed to roam and commit depredations. Many of the tribes do not now require the presence of the military, much less their active interference, to restrain them on the reservations; but as to those tribes that are ungoverned and ungovernable and refuse to submit to authority, I say that it is the duty of the Government, it is due to the people of the United States, it is due to the citizens whose money is to be appropriated for the purposes indicated in this bill, that it should be so used that benefits shall flow from it—benefits not only to the Indians, but benefits to the whites.

There are but two sections of the country in which Indians remain now which may be said to be ungovernable by the interposition of the missionary agents and the agents that the Government sends out. The Indians of this character are, first, the different bands of Sioux, estimated variously at from twenty-five to thirty-five thousand, and sometimes as high as forty-five thousand. I will remark, en passant, that it is safe always to take one-half the number of population as nearer the fact than what we get from the unreliable sources that we are dependent on for information as to the number of Indians. The other Indians of the character I have described are those in the Indian Territory on the Fort Sill reservation, being the Comanches, the Kiowas, the Apaches, the Cheyennes, and the Wichitas. Some of these tribes are not much disposed to war, but the Comanches, Kiowas, and Apaches have committed depredations upon the settlements in Texas from the earliest history of that country down to the present time. If we are to make these appropriations of money, I insist that it is the duty of the Government to see that the citizen shall be protected in his property and person, that his wife and children shall be safe from the scalping-knife and the tomahawk, that his daughter shall not be carried off into captivity and subjected to a fate worse than death, that his property shall not be taken off in broad daylight and he have no means of redress and no hope of compensation, but that such a policy shall be pursued as shall restrain the red man from committing depredations. As evidence of the true disposition of these Indians, and of what they have done for a considerable length of time, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an extract from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the heading of "The Implacables." I suppose his statements will be allowed reliable testimony upon this subject:

The Clerk read as follows:

There is a residue whose disposition and behavior certainly give little encouragement to further forbearance. The numbers of the actually hostile and depredating bands of to-day probably do not exceed in the aggregate eight thousand. Among these are several bands of Apaches in Arizona, principally the Tonto Apaches, the Quahada Comanches, and their confederates of the Staked Plains, west of the Indian country, and the greater portion of the Kiowa Nation. It would be impossible, from the large number of tribes, great and small, known to the annals of the country, to select three which have so little in the way of past wrongs to justify present hostility as these three tribes, which commit, practically, all the outrages properly to be charged against Indians. The depredating Kiowas and the Quahada Comanches are utterly without excuse. They are compelled to go back as far as 1847 to find a single substantial grievance of which to complain. Since that time the United States have given them a noble reservation, and have provided amply for all their wants. No white man has gone upon their lands to injure them; the Government has failed in no particular of its duty toward them; yet they have persisted in leaving their reservation, and marauding in Texas. They have not done this through any misapprehension of the intentions of the Government, from the pressure of want, or under the smart of any real or fancied wrong. I am disposed to think that the messages recently delivered to them by their agent and by the special commission sent to them the last summer; the unequivocal declarations made to their chiefs on the occasion of a recent visit to Washington; and, especially, the chastisement inflicted on the Quahada Comanches at McClellan's Creek, in October, by Colonel Mackenzie, have fully convinced these tribes that the Government is in earnest, and that a continuance in their present course will involve, as it ought, their extirpation. This may be enough; but, if it proves otherwise, they should be signally punished. An example made here would do much to strengthen the policy of peace, both with other Indians and with the country at large, as well as free the borders of Texas from a scourge that has become intolerable.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, these Indians have no claim upon Texas. They have no habitations or homes there. They are situated forty miles beyond the limits of the borders of that State and one hundred and fifty to two hundred miles from the portions of the State where they commit most of their depredations. They have been supplied with the necessaries of life. Sufficient money has been appropriated year after year to procure for them an ample sustenance. They are situated in one of the most desirable sections of the whole country, where the climate is salubrious and pleasant and the soil most productive; and yet these depredations continue. It cannot be alleged that it is in retaliation for any wrongs that the people of Texas have committed toward them, for they are beyond the reach of the people of that State, unless perchance it might be such as for felonious purposes seek to make inroads upon them; but I do not know of a single instance of the kind, and probably there have been very few, if any such occurrences, since they possess nothing that would be sufficiently attractive to induce any one, however feloniously inclined, to seek to obtain it at such great expense and peril as would be necessary to reach it. There is, then, no excuse for these depredations and no provocation, and they arise simply from a want of appreciation on the part of the Indians of their obligations toward the Government and all its people in consideration of the treatment that they have received. This has been kept up persistently to the present time, and it is now of monthly occurrence. Our herds are driven off; our people are murdered if it becomes necessary to the accomplishment of their business of plunder; not that they probably care for that as a primary object, but if it comes in the way of their mission of theft to kill they do so unhesitatingly. The amount of property, apart from the loss of life, the suffering that has been undergone by the people of the State, has been very great. They have been special sufferers, and up to this time have received no adequate protection against the recurrence of these wrongs.

I say it is altogether feasible—yes, it is very easy—to accomplish that which will effectually protect the people of all the northwestern border of the State without the expenditure of an additional dollar. The military that is there at the present time upon the reservation (eight cavalry companies, kept up at a heavy expenditure, with most comfortable houses built for the accommodation of the officers and of the men) is practically not worth a single dollar to all that country south of them, which has been the theater of these Indian depredations. It would cost no more to place them in a position where they would be enabled effectually to cut off the Indians than it does to keep them where they are at present stationed, except the expense of moving them.

It may be insisted by some that for Congress to dictate or direct in a matter of this sort would be somewhat in the nature of an encroachment upon the prerogatives of another department of the Government. Ordinarily that might be so; but we now have before us one of the most difficult subjects of legislation that it will probably become the duty of this or any other Congress to deal with. It is sui generis; one about which comparatively few persons have any practical information. We are to-day dependent upon reports from the different Bureaus and agencies that have charge of this business, that really give little more information than a column of figures, without note or comment, without preface even to direct our researches in finding out what the facts are. We need some well-defined legislative policy, a policy which shall not only indicate the general outlines of peace and means of sustenance, but directions how it shall be done and by whom it shall be done.

If it is to be of this duplex character, involving the agencies both of the Interior Department and of the War Department, I say it is not only no encroachment upon the prerogatives of the President who has been given immediate command of the Army, but it is our duty to indicate just how the military shall be used in carrying out that policy which we may judge best calculated to subserve the ends we desire to accomplish; and if those troops were taken from where they are, there will be no danger of any outbreak or disturbance arising by reason of their absence. And it will meet the full approbation, and in fact the desire, of the Society of Friends who have charge of those reservations, and who report not only that these troops are not needed there, but that they are absolutely in their way, and that they especially desire they should be taken away.

In this connection, and as preceding the few further remarks I desire to offer upon this subject, I ask the Clerk to read a letter which I have received upon this subject from the Society of Friends.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 25, 1874.

Hon. J. HANCOCK, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C:

Knowing thy deep interest in the protection of the people of Northwestern Texas, and being anxious ourselves to co-operate in all right measures for securing peace and safety in that part of the frontier, we desire to call thy attention to a few considerations bearing upon this subject.

We deem it unnecessary to enter into any inquiry as to the causes which originated the hostile feeling now mutually existing between the Indians of the Fort Sill reservation and the people of Texas. It is sufficient to know that this hostile feeling exists, and the practical question is, How shall the Government, through its military and civil agents, prevent acts of hostility?

From careful observation we believe that the Indian agents and other civil appointees of the Government are using all practicable efforts to influence the Indians to keep the peace; and we believe that these efforts are not without good results. So far, however, as forcible restraint enters into Indian management in that quarter, it seems to us that the location of the military forces is very disadvantageous. Fort Sill is in the central portion of the reservation and over thirty miles from the line of Texas. At this fort eight companies of cavalry are usually stationed, and for the ostensible purpose of restraining raiding parties either of Indians into Texas or of Texans upon the Indians. One result of the location of this fort in the central part of the reservation is that these parties almost invariably accomplish their work before the military find it out. It is seldom the case that an Indian raid is ascertained at Fort Sill until the raiders have returned to the reservation, and, becoming mingled with their respective tribes, it is impracticable to arrest them without making war upon the whole tribes, which would result in their rapid movement to the plains where the Army cannot follow them.

Now, it would seem that if the military forces now stationed at Fort Sill, Camp Supply, and the different posts in Kansas, were distributed in camps or posts south of the Red River, within supporting distance of each other and with telegraphic communication so as to supplement the forces already in that vicinity, that raiding parties would be much more likely to be intercepted and punished than by the present arrangement.

There seems to be no necessity for troops upon the reservations. There is no military protection whatever at the Cheyenne and Arapaho and the Wichita agencies, and the commissary of Indian supplies at the Kiowa agency is entirely outside of the fort and has no military guard whatever. The above suggestions have long since occurred to us as important, and with a hearty desire to aid in the promotion of peace and good order among these portions of our fellow-men, we commend them to thy attention, for such action, if any, as thy judgment may approve.

Very truly, &c.,

WM. NICHOLSON,
General Agent of Executive Committee of Friends.
CYRUS BEEDE,
Chief Clerk Central Superintendency.

Mr. HANCOCK. I will add a few remarks upon this subject, in order the more clearly to define what I mean when I speak of subjugation as applied to the Indians. Just here I think I may present a practical illustration of my idea with reference to the character of the subjugation and the means of its accomplishment. Take this Fort Sill reservation, at which there are several thousand Indians, about twelve thousand I believe, subject to its jurisdiction; that is, including all the associated bands within the jurisdiction of that superintendency. From this source, which is probably as reliable as any we have access to, from the Society of Friends, we are informed that the military, in the position they now occupy, are not only not beneficial but hurtful. In private conversation they go more into details than in the letter just read, and refer to instances that are well calculated to exasperate as additional reasons why they particularly desire the removal of those troops. They seemed to me to entertain a very clear conception of the necessity there still is for an influence that may be exerted by the military and by the military only. They wish the benefit of that restraining influence without immediate, direct, social contact, in order that the Indians, and especially the Indian women, may not be debauched and debased; that the men may be restrained from committing depredations and pursuing that roaming and wandering life which, so long as it may be kept up, will be an effectual barrier to the progress of those Indians in the line of civilization.

Now, as a practical application of my theory, these eight companies of soldiers, with the others that are already upon the borders of Texas, would be ample to form a cordon of posts south of the Red River, which should be supplemented by telegraphic communication, provision for which, in part at least, was made the other day by this House. Thus, with means of ready communication, the troops would be able to get information of every raiding party that might pass south of that line, would be able to cut off and punish such parties, and recapture the property that they might seek to carry into the reservation from the plains of Texas. As the agents in charge of these Indians say, when this shall have been done a few times the Indians will desist from their raids. When they shall have ascertained that whenever they pass a certain boundary they become subject to the control of the military and dealt with as outlaws and enemies, it being made the duty of the military to punish them, we are justified from the experiment in another section of the country—I mean in the Territory of Arizona—in believing that there will be no difficulty whatever in keeping the Indians upon the reservation.

This, then, will be sufficient protection, so far as regards restraining them in their propensity to roam over the country and to commit depredations upon the property of citizens. Now you have them localized. What is next necessary in the line of civilization? To place them under the control of such agencies as will direct their labor, requiring them to perform a certain amount of work, and if need be giving them as an encouragement compensation for their labor in the form of supplies for their sustenance. In that section of country any ordinarily able-bodied individual who will labor an average of one hour and a half, or at the outside two hours, each day will be able to secure an abundant supply for all his natural wants. If you subdivide that district of country into sections of six hundred and forty acres each, or even into townships, and put the population of each subdivision under the control of one of the faithful representatives of the Society of Friends, sustained by the authority of the Government and with the right to direct the Indians—a right that will be accorded to him as soon as you break down the tribal organization of the Indians and free them from the domination of their chiefs, which is a necessary step in their civilization—the direction of this agent or superintendent would become authoritative; the Indians would obey him as a commander, would do it cheerfully, and would go to work. We should then realize the result which the inferior Spaniard of Mexico has accomplished; we should civilize the Indian by making him self-sustaining; and as soon as the Indian has learned to work (an accomplishment that is not often attained, especially by the Indian, except in youth) he will have achieved the first necessary and indispensable step in the march of civilization. When this has been done the Indian will become self-sustaining. He will no longer be a charge upon the Government, a burden upon the community, an individual to be distrusted and treated as one ready to prey upon the substance of the laboring class of citizens who uphold the fabric of this great Government.

I think this can be easily achieved; and when it is accomplished we may proceed a step further; and even before its accomplishment, as soon as the bands shall have been organized and placed within prescribed territorial boundaries, you can have that which is indispensable to an honest and faithful administration of the Indian Office; where it has been said (and I see nothing to induce me to disbelieve the statement) the robberies and iniquities are more dark and damning than anywhere else in the whole machinery of the Government. My colleagues may be better able than I am to ascertain who has been the recipient of the benefit of a large portion of the money that has been absorbed through the operations of the Indian Office. At present you cannot rely upon any particular number with reference to a great many of these Indians; but when you have forced them to become localized; when you have compelled them to settle down within prescribed limits; when they are subdivided and put under the supervision of some one who will teach them the arts of husbandry, you have some definite numbers to provide for, you can make your appropriations and other legislation understandingly with reference to the numbers for whom you are acting; and this is indispensable to correct legislation and an honest administration of the Indian affairs.

The same rule I have indicated as applicable here is not at all inapplicable to the Sioux. Those Indians are in a condition in which they should not be permitted to remain. The amount appropriated for the subsistence of Indians, not required by treaty stipulations, is not far from $2,089,000; the balance of this entire appropriation of nearly $5,000,000 is made up of items falling under treaty stipulations with the different tribes, or to pay officers to carry on the machinery and defray the incidental expenses connected with our present system. Of this total amount, the Sioux, if I am correct, received over $1,300,000, and they are kept in that condition where no man can pretend to know how many there are of them. There are none except the agents or contractors, and probably the contractors only, who know how many there are of these Sioux Indians. This presents too great a temptation to imposition and fraud to be at all times successfully resisted by the character of persons engaged in the business of feeding Indians. They are, too, in a section of the country where we know it is physically impossible to advance them in the line of civilization. They are in a country beyond the meridian of 99, where there is not sufficient rain-fall for agriculture of any character to be carried on successfully. It is made up in a great measure of alkali plains, chalk hills, and slate, which is entirely unproductive, and the Indian, even if disposed to, could not raise any vegetable substance with which to subsist life. These Indians, I say unhesitatingly, should be taken control of by the War Department, and a sufficient military force sent there to accomplish fully the object in view. I would not have any more of them sent into the Indian Territory, but would have them located in some other section of our country; and the people of the United States have abundant territory where these Indians could find a climate and a soil suitable to their progress in the arts of civilization, and especially in the art of agriculture. There they could be restrained by such power as will make them obedient to the laws of the country, and respect the power and authority of the Government. If they are the wards of the nation they should be treated as any other minor wards, and sufficient influence and authority should be exercised over them to restrain them within the limits necessary for their own benefit as well as for the security of the country, and to the end that there may be perfect peace between them and the whites.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have already occupied much more time than I intended, and I am afraid I have disappointed some of my friends. I yield thirty minutes—if so much remains—of the hour and a half which it was agreed I should have to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of the gentleman from Texas has expired, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICHMOND] is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. BECK. I thought it was the understanding the gentleman from Texas should have an hour and a half, thirty minutes of which he should yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no information upon that subject. It was understood, by arrangement with the gentleman who reported the bill to the House, after the hour of the gentleman from Texas, the floor should be assigned to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RICHMOND,] who is a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The committee had no intimation that the gentleman from Texas desired his hour extended.

Mr. HANCOCK. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] and myself had an agreement to that effect.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I am perfectly willing, if the committee will consent, to extend the hour of the gentleman from Texas to an hour and a half.

Mr. HANCOCK. Such was my understanding, and I agreed to yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

The CHAIRMAN. The House having fixed the limit of general debate to two hours and the floor having been assigned for all that time, it is not competent now for the committee to make any extension of time.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Cannot the House by general consent extend the time?

The CHAIRMAN. The House can, but the committee cannot.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of extending the time.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, there is evidently a misunderstanding on this subject. This morning when the gentleman from Ohio moved to limit general debate to two hours I made no objection to that, supposing there were only one or two who desired to speak on this bill. I understand now there are four or five who desire to be heard, and if the committee rise, I give notice I will move to extend the time two hours longer, so that they may be heard.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I will agree to one hour and no more.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move that the committee rise, with the understanding that we shall extend the time for one hour only.

Mr. WOOD. Some of the Delegates who are largely interested in this subject desire to say something on the bill, and I think we will lose nothing by hearing what they have to say.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. STARKWEATHER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. POLAND reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Indian appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move that the time for general debate be extended for two hours, which will make the time three hours after we go into committee.

Mr. SHANKS. I think an extension of this kind should not be limited to two hours. Several gentlemen wish to speak, and I think we should give them an opportunity to do so.

Mr. BECK. I want thirty minutes. I have served on the Committee on Appropriations and had a good deal to do with this subject. I have heard these Indian treaties discussed and know something of the amendments made in regard to the Indian peace commissioners. Much of that legislation has been repealed. Some of the treaties have become obsolete. On these two questions especially I want to be heard, and I believe that other gentlemen want to be heard on other questions; and perhaps it will save time when we come to the five-minute debate if we should have an extension of time now for general debate.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BECK. Thirty minutes.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I will consent to one hour's extension of the time already allowed by the House. I will also ask that there shall be an evening session.

Mr. BECK. An evening session for business generally, or for the consideration of this bill?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. For the consideration of this bill.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to that; only I shall insist that nothing shall be done without a quorum.

Mr. MARSHALL. I wish to be heard for a moment, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, in regard to this arrangement which it is proposed to make. I wish to say, lest some gentlemen may be misled by this proposition, that I shall claim the floor myself. I understood I was to have it after the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK,] but I believe the floor has been assigned to another gentleman not a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I wish it to be understood, however, that I shall claim the floor myself. I do not wish to exclude the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] or anybody else; and if there is a general desire to continue the general debate, I hope the time may be extended even longer than three hours. I do not think we will lose any time thereby. It seems that several gentlemen desire to participate in the general debate, and I think an extension of time now will shorten the time occupied hereafter in the five-minute debate.

Mr. McCORMICK. I would suggest to the gentleman who has the bill in charge that the whole afternoon be assigned for general debate, as we are to have an evening session for the consideration of the bill section by section.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. On next Tuesday the centennial bill has a hearing in this House, and this bill will be crowded out. To-morrow is assigned for private business; and we want to get the bill through to-night. It seems to me that three hours more of general debate will be sufficient.

Mr. WOOD. That will bring us to the ordinary hour of adjournment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent that there be a session of the House this evening for the consideration of this bill? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. Is there unanimous consent that there be an extension of time for general debate on this bill, and that it be limited to three hours?

Mr. SHANKS. I have not agreed to that.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I ask a vote on my motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand the proposition is that there shall be three hours altogether for general debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion was that there be three hours more. That gives two additional hours.

Mr. GARFIELD. Three hours from now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes, sir. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the time for general debate was limited to three hours; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being taken on the motion that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POLAND in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Chairman, the condition of the Indian tribes, their rights and our duties toward them, are subjects for our serious consideration; to the Indian, now as always hitherto, of commanding importance. The questions that we have been called upon to consider for the past four months and more are doubtless vitally momentous to us as a people, and deserved, as they have received, our most serious thought. But we now approach a subject in which others than ourselves are deeply interested—others who once held sole dominion over the vast and magnificent territory which we now call our own. What is their present condition; what are their rights, and what is our duty toward them? I cannot in the short time allotted me, had I the ability, give the answer to these questions which their importance demands. I can only notice, and that but hastily, the more salient points involved in the discussion.

There are, I suppose, from the best information I can obtain, in the neighborhood of three hundred and fifty thousand Indians within our territorial limits. With one or two unimportant exceptions, they are to be found mainly upon the plains and in the mountains and forest fastnesses of the far West. About sixty thousand of them are in what is known as the Indian Territory, lying south of and adjoining Kansas. Within this Territory are over twenty tribes and fragments of tribes. They have a written constitution (as have the Senecas, of New York) and a regularly organized federal representative government. They have schools, academies, female seminaries, and churches. They have roads and highways, and to a great extent hold and cultivate their lands in severalty. The Cherokees, the principal tribe in the Territory, have a written language, an alphabet of their own, invented by their own Cadmus. They have a printing press, from which issues a weekly newspaper, large and respectable in appearance, one-half of which is printed in their own language and alphabet, the other half in the English language and character.

Another portion of the Indians, supposed to number about one hundred and fifty thousand, perhaps more, are on detached reservations, scattered over the West from the Mexican border to Alaska. The reservations are generally, if not always, under the care and supervision of some regularly appointed Government agent, or organized mission, and have the benefit of schools and religious instruction; and are, at least the larger portion of them, making commendable advancement in the arts and industries of civilized life.

But a very large portion of the Indians of the West are still in their wild and nomadic state. They exist in tribes, and under tribal government, but have, by the irresistible advance of our population, been driven from their common hunting-grounds, the buffalo plains, to the spurs and into the vales and dark and dismal retreats of the mountains.

But the fact of greatest alarm to the Indians in or out of these reservations, on the plain or in the mountain, is that our population is now pressing upon them from every side with a heartless disregard of their rights. We have a frontier pressing with irresistible force from the Mississippi westward, to meet a frontier pressing with equal force from the Pacific eastward. Between these two forces, that no power but God can stay, these unfortunate sons of the forest are like to be caught and piteously crushed as between the nether and upper millstones, without hope or refuge. Can we save them? That is the great question to which we, as legislators, are now called upon to address ourselves; nay, not as legislators merely, but as men and the descendants of men who now occupy and claim as our own the lands and ancient homes of these people, without pay or reward.

The question, then, presses itself upon us with peculiar force and pungency, what are their rights and what is our duty toward them? Originally they were the sole occupiers of the soil—held dominion over all this land by unquestioned right. When the white man, uninvited, first landed upon these shores they were a powerful people, numbering many millions, free as the air they breathed and the forests they ranged. The white man, though uninvited, did not come altogether unexpected; for they had a tradition that a superior race was to come from the place where the sun rises, and live with and dwell among them. They received us as that race, and presented us "the ear of corn" as a token of welcome—an emblem of peace and plenty.

They were neither barbarians nor savages, nor were they infidels; although all these opprobrious epithets have been applied to them by our own people in extenuation if not in justification of the continued wrong we have done them. We sometimes affect to despise them, as so low in the scale of human beings, so degraded, as to be incapable of civilization or of making any progress in social life. Now, so far as this is true of our conduct toward the Indians we have done them great injustice. When our fathers first landed upon these shores, and before these men of the forest had been contaminated by intercourse with the degraded and conscienceless of our own race, what was their condition? True, they were not cultured, not enlightened, in the meaning which we give to those terms. Yet they had a language, consisting of many dialects; and while they had no alphabet, properly so called, they had a system of symbolic writing by which they could express their great thoughts, their feelings, and their passions. They lived mainly by hunting and fishing, and yet cultivated the ground so far as to raise corn or maize, potatoes, and some other esculents. They had a currency, and it will probably be very much to the relief of some gentlemen present to be told that it was a hard, a very hard currency. It consisted of certain shells, beautifully fashioned into various forms, each one of which had a fixed value. These constituted the Indian's money, his medium of exchange. Ingeniously woven into broad belts, they were worn for ornament, and on all important occasions were used and given as an earnest of truth and good faith to be observed in their promises passed and covenants made.

They were neither infidels nor pagans. They worshiped no false gods. No act of idolatry is chargeable to them. They believed in the one, invisible, incomprehensible Deity, the Creator of all things, whom they called the Great Spirit. Said an Indian chief, in 1773, to the celebrated missionary, Zeisberger:

> This day the Great Spirit has ordered that we should see and speak with each other face to face.

Said an Osage chief, one of the delegation that visited Washington this winter, speaking to the crowds that gathered around him in the parlors of the Ebbitt House:

> We are all one people, created by the same Great Spirit. We differ only in color.

Pope sang, more than one hundred and fifty years ago, of the poor Indian—> ——whose untutored mind,

> Sees God in clouds, and hears him in the wind.

Their religion, unlike that of our ancestors, the ancient Britons, had no cruelty in it. They had no infamous rites, as had the Druids, that they practiced in dark groves and other secret places. They believed in a future state of existence and painted their heaven as the happy hunting-ground, just as we better-informed Christians paint our New Jerusalem as having streets paved with gold and encompassed by walls of precious stones. This belief in a Deity who created all things and in a future state was common to all the tribes and Indian nations on this half of the American continent.

But they are said to have been a wandering, nomadic people, without any fixed home or dwelling-place, and with no regularly organized forms of government. While the individual Indian did not claim a distinct and ascertained portion of land as his own by title paramount, each tribe as against every other tribe claimed to hold in its own right certain territorial possessions, defined and determined by the everlasting landmarks of nature, the river, the mountain, the inland sea. The hunting-grounds of each tribe were sacred to it, and to each individual man of the tribe—held as inviolate as we, each one of us, hold our farms, our homesteads, to-day. And no wars among the Indians were so fierce and relentless as those tribal wars waged in defense of tribal rights to lands. The common law of the forests guarded and protected their possessions as the common law of our country guards and protects us in the shelter and security of our homes.

They had no written constitutions or laws, and yet they had regularly organized governments, in most instances wonderfully well calculated to protect them in their rights. Their form of government was generally that of a confederacy of two or more nations or tribes. Thus we read of the Monakins, the Powhatans, the Massachusetts, the Pokanokets, names of so many confederacies, the confederate name being generally that of its principal tribe. Let me give you an instance:

The most noted of these confederacies, or leagues as they are sometimes called, was that of the Mingoes, more familiarly known in history as the Five Nations, or the Iroquois, as they were called by the French. The nations composing this confederacy were the Mohawks, the Oneidas, the Onondagas, the Cayugas, and the Senecas. To these were subsequently added by conquest the Tuscaroras of North Carolina, since which they have been known as the Six Nations. They acted upon the Roman principle, to make friends of conquered nations by bringing them into the confederacy, conferring upon them all the rights and privileges they themselves enjoyed, and thus securing their friendship and co-operation. "Let them come and live with us," said, on a memorable occasion, a celebrated Onondaga chief, revered among all the tribes for his wisdom and judgment—"Let them come and live with us; it will strengthen our country." They had a regular, systematic government, having in many respects a very striking resemblance to that of these United States. We have our townships, counties, States, and union of States. They had their bands, their tribes, nations, and league of nations. We have our Congress, whose laws are of equal validity and force in each and all the States. They had their national council which assembled once a year. Before this council all important questions were brought and discussed with a decorum and gravity which, may I suggest, we would do well more closely to imitate; and their decision when made was the law of the confederacy. In this council resided all power—executive, legislative, and judicial. Each nation was composed of several tribes, and had at its head a sachem, or governor, who managed its internal affairs and was in no way amenable to the general council of the league. The tribe was peculiar. It did not consist, as in olden time, of a group of families, for the father and son were never of the same tribe. Their laws permitted marriage only between members of different tribes, so that husband and wife were never members of the same tribe; and under the same law the children belonged to the tribe of the mother and not of the father. And what is still more strange, all titles, rights, and property were transmitted in the female line to the exclusion of the male. And this, I believe, is the rule in all Indian tribes. Another peculiarity about the tribe was, that each tribe consisted of five bands, and each band belonged to some one of the five nations, so that each nation had its representatives in each one of the tribes.

But we cannot go further into detail. Suffice it to say, it was the proud boast of the Iroquois, that the great object of the league was peace—"to break the spirit of perpetual warfare, which had wasted the red man from age to age." And for nearly three hundred years, we are told, they had no civil wars, no wars among themselves. This one fact, that under its wise provisions wars and bloodshed were prevented among the many nations and tribes that were parties to it, through such a series of years stamps it as one of the grandest of human efforts in the government of men. While the system bound together, as in one family, the peoples who were parties to it, yet it was capable of indefinite extension, and was ultimately made to embrace and gather into its folds all the tribes from the Saint Lawrence and the lakes of the north to the Tennessee—from the Atlantic to the Mississippi. They were a brave and warlike people, and were not without their bloody conflicts with the nations outside the league and who persisted in their refusal to become parties to it. Mild and conciliatory in peace, they were terrible on the war-path. Says their historian: "Space afforded no protection, distance no shelter from their war parties, which ranged equally the hills of New England, the declivities of the Alleghanies, the prairies of the Mississippi, and the forests of Tennessee." In a word, by common consent the highest position among the Indian races has been accorded to the Iroquois in eloquence, fortitude, legislative wisdom, courage, and military sagacity.

In what has been said I have attempted to convey some faint idea of what the Indian was and what were his capabilities before the white man planted colonies on these shores. What has been the result to this unfortunate race of our intrusion and trespasses, for such they were, in the mildest aspect in which our entrance upon their domain can be viewed? Then they numbered fully six millions within our present territorial limits. Now, driven from the eastern sea westward over mountain, plain, and river, far beyond the Father of Waters, there remains of this once proud and independent race but a miserable remnant of some three hundred and fifty thousand persons.

We do not propose now to discuss the question of the original right and title of the Indian to these lands as against those who first colonized them, nor to animadvert upon the manner in which they were put out of possession, further than to say that a great and irreparable wrong was done them, which makes our duty to those who remain the more imperative.

Has our own treatment of the Indian since he came under our jurisdiction and care been always marked by that wisdom and that justice to an unfortunate race which they had a right to demand, and which it was our duty to have rendered? It must be admitted, in the light of impartial history, that from the origin of our Government the policy adopted toward the Indians has, at least in very many instances, proved most disastrous to them, if not injurious to ourselves. Forced, or, which is the same thing, persuaded against their will, to cede their lands to the General Government for a consideration that bore no proportion to their value, the Indians were denied citizenship and all the conditions by which citizenship might be acquired, and were held to be foreigners in their own native land, a land that had been theirs for a period of time beyond which "the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." They have been left in the hunter state upon the borders of civilization, and not permitted to learn the arts and acquire the habits of civilized life within its folds. The system of reservations and annuities, under the general superintendency of Government agents, considering the way they were usually managed till within a few years, was productive of a vast amount of evil, which many times provoked to bloodshed and most disastrous wars. Heartless and dishonest contractors and traders gathered like a pestilence around those agencies, and by the sale of intoxicating liquors and by their immoral practices, spread demoralization and death among the tribes, and generally contrived with too much success to cheat both the Indian and the Government. These evils at length became so enormous, resulting as they frequently did in the most bloody and cruel raids along our far frontier, as to demand the interposition of the Government. A commission was sent out to inquire into the condition of the Indian tribes, which resulted in an entire change of policy on the part of the Government in their management.

In 1869 a Society of Friends, following the teachings of their great leader, William Penn, who laid the foundations of my own noble Commonwealth on the rock of just dealing toward the natives of the soil, presented a memorial to Congress, asking permission to go among the Indians and try the policy of peace and kindness in their management. Their prayer was granted, and the President appointed eighteen of their number to go to those men of the plain and forest, now pupils of civilization, and try and see what they could do for their reclamation; and they are now in this field of beneficent labor. The plan has thus far proven eminently successful. Other churches have become more deeply interested in the same great work. More care is taken by the Government in the appointment of agents, and giving out of contracts for supplies, that proper men may be selected for those important trusts—honest men, who have regard for truth and integrity, for the Bible and its holy inculcations, and who, therefore, will not carry moral pestilence and ruin among the tribes they visit, and of which they have the care. It has come to be known as the peace policy; and however much it may be derided by those who have no faith in anything but gunpowder in dealing with the Indian, I hope and pray it may continue to be the policy of the Government until he is placed on the same platform with the Christian white man in virtue, intelligence, and civil rights and privileges. I venture the assertion that this policy has never failed where it has been fairly and honestly tried. Did it fail with Roger Williams? Did it fail with William Penn? Said a Chippewa chief at an important council held early in this century: "When the French arrived at these falls they came and kissed us; they called us children, and we found them fathers. We lived like brethren in the same lodge." And it is a fact, attested by the history of the times, that the peace policy of the French toward the Indian generally gathered the tribes to their standard in their early wars on this continent. I repeat again and with emphasis, it never has failed when honestly and fairly tried, and why? Because it was the policy of Him who preached "on earth peace, good will toward men."

But if we wish continued success in this direction, we must avoid doing and saying those things which tend to make the Indian doubt our good faith. Nay, we must say and do those things which will tend to bring back to his breast the confidence he had in our truth, affection, and integrity in the times of William Penn.

I was very much surprised to find that the doctrine had been announced on the floor of the Senate, the other day that the Indian reservations were "moonshine."

Now, I do not say but that a system better for all parties than the reservation system might have been adopted in efforts to reclaim the Indian; but that is not now the question. We have adopted the system, and it is now too late to change it. The question is how shall we work it, so as to secure as a result the greatest good to the Indian? If the reservations are all "moonshine," the sooner we undeceive the cheated Indian the better. Let us see if this be true. What, then, is a reservation? Technically it is something created at the time of the conveyance or deeding of land that did not exist before, as rent, for instance. But when used as in our treaties with the Indians it is the synonym of exception, and means a portion of land excepted out or kept back at the time of making the treaty; leaving the Indian to hold his reservation by the same title by which he held his lands before any treaty was made. Now, what was that title? It is very well defined in the books. It consists the right of the Indian to hold, possess, occupy, cultivate, and do what he pleases with his land through all time, subject only to the pre-emptory right of the Government, that is, the right of the Government as against every other power or party, to buy when the Indian wants to sell. But until that contingency arises, until he wants to sell, no power on earth has the right to dispossess him, for any purpose, of one foot of his soil against his will; not even for railroad purposes. We have no more right to run a railroad even through Indian reservations or territory, against his will, than we have to run one through the Canadas without having first obtained the consent of the Canadians. Am I stating the doctrine too strongly? Let me give you one or two authorities. Says Justice Baldwin, in Mitchell vs. The United States, (9 Peters, 745:)

> Indian possession and occupation were considered with reference to their habits and modes of life. Their hunting-grounds were as much in their actual possession as the cleared fields of the whites; and their right to their exclusive enjoyment, in their own way, and for their own purposes, was as much respected until they abandoned them, made a cession to the Government, or an authorized sale to individuals.

Says Justice Nelson, in the case of the New York Indians, (5 Wallace, 773,) a recent case:

> Until the Indians have sold their lands and removed from them in pursuance of treaty stipulations, they are to be regarded as still in their ancient possessions, and are in under their original rights, and are entitled to the undisturbed enjoyment of them.

The same doctrine was announced many years ago by Marshall, Chief Justice, in the celebrated Cherokee case, (5 Peters, 15,) in which he says:

> The Cherokees constitute a state—a distinct political society, separated from others—capable of managing its own affairs and governing itself. They have been uniformly treated as a state from the settlement of the country.

Upon these principles the Government has acted from the beginning, and it is now too late to repudiate them. They are the principles of absolute justice, which the Creator of all things has impressed upon the mind and conscience of every man, and which are admitted in a great degree to have regulated the rights of civilized nations.

I have heard it gravely alleged that Congress has the power to abrogate and annul any Indian treaty, if in its opinion the general interests of the country demanded it. But it is not a question of power. No one denies but that we have the power, if we see fit to abuse it, to break our treaties with the Indians, as of course we have, to break them with any other nation with which we hold treaty relations, as with France, or England, or the German states; but we must take the consequences, as must every man, or body of men, who breaks faith and disregards obligations, voluntarily assumed, of the most solemn form and character. Now, a power to do does not by any means imply the right to do. Have we the right to break faith with the Indian, to hold as naught our most sacred treaties with him? No man in this enlightened age can, it seems to me, contend for a principle so abhorrent to all our most cherished ideas of proper dealings between man and man.

What, then, is our duty toward these fragments of an almost exterminated race? In the relation they sustain to us they are called our wards, the wards of the nation. Can we depredate upon the property of these our wards? No, no. Can we neglect their moral and intellectual culture? Again I say no.

If the reservation system is continued, as I take for granted it will be, our first duty is, and it is a duty of paramount importance, to see to it that they are placed on reservations capable of cultivation and tillage, not on sterile plains or among rocks and mountain spurs where soil enough cannot be found to grow a mullen-stalk. Have we in no instance acted in disregard of this obligation? Having secured to them reservations that, under the labor ordinarily bestowed upon lands reasonably productive, will assure them all the necessaries and many of the comforts of life, we should liberally furnish them all the needed supplies and proper persons to instruct them in agriculture and the mechanic arts. We should not be parsimonious in our appropriations for this purpose. Funds liberally bestowed, to secure to the Indian all the aid he needs in his endeavor to acquire the arts and habits of civilized life, is ultimate economy. At the earliest moment, when he is so far advanced in civilization as to know what it is to have a property in the soil that he can call his own, give him his land in severalty, that he may learn what home and all its endearments mean. Let him feel that there is one spot on this green earth he can call his own, and on which no man dare trespass. Go to the Cornplanter reservation on the northern border of my own State. There each Indian has a fee-simple deed for his farm, lives as does his white neighbor on his own land, and alike with him is protected in all his rights. What is the result? They are a quiet and peaceable community, have their schoolhouses and churches, and show about them all the evidences of civilized life.

Once more. Am I claiming too much when I say we should cultivate and educate those reservations, with an eye to their proper preparation for ultimate admission into the Union as States or parts of States? Even in the rude and uncultivated condition in which our fathers found him, the Indian has shown great skill and capabilities in organized government. Bring him within the embrace of our own civilization; elevate him from his low condition and degradation to the proud position of American manhood and citizenship; confer upon him all the prerogatives of a man equal in rights and privileges to every other man, then will we have made some atonement for the great wrongs we have done him through the ages that are past.

Mr. MARSHALL obtained the floor and said: I do not rise now for the purpose of taking part in this general discussion on the Indian appropriation bill; nor do I propose to do so at any length hereafter. I yield thirty minutes to my colleague, [Mr. KNAPP.]

Mr. KNAPP. Mr. Chairman, the bill submitted for consideration demanding an appropriation of $4,965,488.43 should have careful consideration. It may be that under our present financial administration every effort possible has been made to decrease the expenditures of this Department of the Government. My claim is that the whole financial substructure upon which the republican party builds its policies tends directly to the increase of public expenditure, and is in the interest of capital. Therefore I would feel that I had failed to do my duty did I not enter my protest against the general system that has characterized the control of the country by the party in power. For the last nine years, in the midst of peace and blessed with abundant harvests, the people of the section that I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor have, by unwise discrimination, been growing poorer from day to day, and becoming more thoroughly subjected to the despotism of monopolies built up and sustained by the legislation of the republican party.

When the financial question was pending it was my hope that by some legitimate means the people could have secured relief from the extortions of the money monopoly that the republican party created through the national banking laws; that the plundering and centralizing organizations known as the national banks could either by some crippling policy been put in process of ultimate extinction, or by sweeping enactment have been stricken from existence. Every expedient that parliamentary tactics or legislative artifice could devise has been resorted to by the majority of this House to protect them from the direct responsibility of action in regard to these banks. It has never been denied that their abolition, and the substitution of legal tender by purchase of five-twenty securities for national-bank notes, would save the people from twenty to twenty-five millions taxation annually. It has never been denied that the national banking system creates the wild spirit of speculation that raised the rate of interest against the people, and by that result depleted the country localities of the money necessary for its legitimate development, decreased the value of land and its products, surrendered all the useful interest to the control of the money-changers, made capital centralized in a vast monopoly, the instrument by which unwise public administration could be perpetuated; that instead of directing the energies of the people to the development of our legitimate resources, its tendency is to educate a whole generation that the only road to wealth is to secure comfortable quarters in rings, whose study is to devise ways and means by which they can plunder the mechanic, the laborer, and the farmer, from whom all wealth is derived, of the results of their toil; that it has organized combinations whose only purpose is to prey on our material interests; to make labor, the foundation of wealth, pay for the rioting, debauchery, and crime of a class who live by their wits, and has driven the unconscientious but sharp class to the cities to engage in organized ventures against the public welfare.

When the Senate bill came up for consideration there were two questions considered by me. The first and most important one was whether the tendency of the bill was to strengthen the national banks; the second was whether it was better for the people that we should legalize the audacity of one of the clerks of the ring, who, to the detriment of the people, has control of the public purse.

I believe the power of the national banks largely depends on the organized gambling rings of the New York stock boards. The Comptroller of the Currency reports that this nest of plunderers, during the late panic, had sixty millions of the money of the people from the country national banks, on call loan in their hands, borrowed from the national banks in the city of New York. The only clause in the Senate bill in relation to national banks that is commendable is that which compels the country banks to hold a larger portion of their reserves in their own vaults. It subtracts that much capital from the grasp of the class whose only effort is to combine all they can control against the producer of wealth. When pork, corn, wheat, cotton, or tobacco are owned by the producer, money is locked up.

The moment the ring, organized and made powerful by republican legislation, gets the control of the product, it in turn is locked up against the consumer. Thus in a twofold way it robs the people: first the producer, and second the consumer, are made the victims. It is claimed by many, among them a Mr. Knox, who under our theory of government is supposed to be a servant of the people, that this is contraction. It is contraction against the half highwayman and half gambler, whose employers are the national banks. It is subtracting power from those whose only object is the robbing of the producing and laboring class: the first class suffering by the locking up of money against the producer, the second class suffering by the locking up of the products against the consumers. My theory is that every dollar taken from the gambling rings of Wall street is a dollar subtracted from the enemies of the people.

Mr. Chairman, twenty-six millions, without authority of law, was paid out to bolster up the tottering condition of the national banking ring, who had loaned sixty millions of the money of the people, drawn by the legislation of the republican party, to the gamblers on Wall street, and used by them to make corners on wild-cat stocks of wild-cat railroads—used by them to make corners on the producer of wealth, when the product was in his hands, and against the consumer, when it was transferred from the producer to the rings. When the general account was made up it was found that these ring manipulators had decreased the exports and increased the public expenditures; that the rings were absorbing millions, and our productions were decreased; that the people were becoming impoverished and the plunderers becoming millionaires, and that revenues were consequently deficient to meet public expenditures; that instead of decreasing the public debt republican ring administrations, although they had mortgaged the blood and sweat of the people, were demanding that additional debt should be created to meet their extortion.

The only question submitted for consideration was whether the forty-four millions should be let out to meet this deficiency, or whether the rings should increase the taxation against the producer and laborer. I deemed it expedient to legalize what was unlawful to protect an overburdened people, and therefore accepted the hard conditions imposed by the ring administrations. I thought it better that the people should have the permanent benefit of a policy that had its inception in a desire to protect the gambling coadjutors of the national banks, the only question being whether further exactions be made against the people to perpetuate the power of the banking and stock-board rings. I voted for the Senate bill for the reason that I believed it decreased the power of the plundering rings created by unwise legislation of the republican party.

The operation of the national banking system upon all the industrial interests is tersely set forth in the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, as follows:

The national-currency act requires that the country banks shall hold 6 per cent., the redemption cities 12½ per cent., and the New York City banks 25 per cent. of their liabilities in cash, making an aggregate of cash reserve of from 13 to 15 per cent. The remainder of the reserve required to be held by the country banks may be on deposit with the banks in the redemption cities, while that of the redemption cities may be on deposit in the city of New York.

These large accumulations in the redemption cities, and in the banks of the city of New York, are to a large extent invested in call loans, the banks in the redemption cities and in the city of New York having no resource like the joint-stock banks of England in which to place their surplus of reserves, which can be readily converted in the markets of the world into coin, if occasion shall require; and it can hardly be doubted that if the surplus means of the country banks, which were invested in call loans by their city correspondents, had been invested in funds convertible into cash upon demand, the disastrous results of the late panic would have been largely avoided.

The crisis was caused in a great degree by the desire of the country banks to withdraw their balances from the city banks; first, because in the month of September the amount on deposit with the city banks was needed for the legitimate purposes of trade; and secondly, because the country banks, foreseeing and fearing the return of the experience of previous years, thought it safer to withdraw their balances at once. When the reserves of the New York City banks became alarmingly reduced by the drafts of their country correspondents, the only resource left to the city banks was to convert their call loans, amounting to some $60,000,000; but these, if paid at all, were paid in checks upon the associated banks, and the latter found, the next morning, at the clearing-house, that, although a portion of their liabilities had been reduced by the payment of call loans, they were in the aggregate no richer in currency than on the previous day. Suspension followed.

And again, on page 23, the Comptroller, quoting from a previous report, says:

The reserves of the nineteen hundred national banks located elsewhere than in the city of New York are held to a great extent in that city. For most of the time during the past year an amount equal to more than one-fifth of the capital of all these national banks has been held on deposit by the national banks of the city of New York to the credit of their correspondents. In many cases these credits amount to twice the capital of the bank with which they are deposited; in other cases the amount of deposits is three, four, and even five times the capital, which amount has been attracted thither largely by the payment of interest on deposits. The failure of one of these New York City banks in a time of monetary stringency would embarrass, if not ruin, many banks in the redemption cities, and, in turn, the country correspondents of these banks would suffer from the imprudence of the New York bank, which would be responsible for wide-spread disaster. * * * *

In times of excessive stringency loans are not made by such associations to business men upon commercial paper, but to dealers in speculative securities, upon short time, at high rates of interest; and an increase of call loans beyond the proper limit is more likely to afford facilities for unwarrantable stock speculations than relief to legitimate business transactions. * * * * * *

The variations in the liabilities requiring reserve in the banks of the city of New York are very great. The banks outside of New York during the dull season send their surplus means to that city for deposit upon interest, to await the revival of business. The banks in the city of New York at such periods of the year have no legitimate outlet for these funds, and are therefore threatened with loss. The stock board takes advantage of this condition of affairs, speculation is stimulated by the cheapness of money, and a market is found for the idle funds upon doubtful collaterals, and the result is seen in the increased transactions at the clearing-house, which, during the past year, exceeded $32,000,000,000, or an average of more than $100,000,000 daily, not one-half of which was the result of legitimate business, the total amount of transactions being greater than that of the bankers' clearing-house of the city of London. The evil arises largely from the payment by the banks of interest on deposits—an old-established custom, which cannot easily be changed by direct legislation.

Again he says, on page 28:

The present financial crisis may in a great degree be attributed to the intimate relations of the banks of the city of New York with the transactions of the stock board, more than one-fourth, and in many instances nearly one-third, of the bills receivable of the banks, since the late civil war, having consisted of demand loans to brokers and members of the stock board, which transactions have a tendency to impede and unsettle, instead of facilitating, the legitimate business interests of the whole country. Previous to the war the stock-board is said to have consisted of only one hundred and fifty members, and its organic principle was a strictly commission business, under a stringent and conservative constitution and by-laws. The close of the war found the membership of the stock board increased to eleven hundred, and composed of men from all parts of the country, many of whom had congregated in Wall street, adopting for their rule of business the apt motto of Horace, "Make money: make it honestly if you can; at all events make money." The law of the State of New York, restricting the operations of the stock board, which had been retained on the statute-book since 1813, had, unfortunately, been repealed in 1858, so that its members and manipulators were enabled to increase their operations to a gigantic scale.

Again, says the late Secretary of the Treasury, now a Senator of the United States, in a recent speech delivered in the Senate:

The processes by which the currency of the city of New York was inflated are generally well understood. The statistics show that the deposits of the banks of the city of New York, including the national banks and the banks established under the laws of the State, were increased $50,000,000 between the month of April and the month of September. Four banks in that city were indebted during a portion of that period of time to the extent of more than $50,000,000. The presence of this vast sum of money in New York, accumulated by unnatural processes, brought upon that city, and then upon the whole country secondarily, the evils which we are now called to consider.

* * * * * * * *

If, therefore, anything can be inferred from the experience of the last autumn, it is this: that the accumulation of currency in the city of New York by artificial means produced an inflation of the currency in that city, led to speculations, to excitement, disaster, and ruin.

There could be nothing of more general benefit to the people than thorough study of the declarations of these parties. They confess that the system created and sustained by the party in power has resulted in the annual money panics; that stock-gambling and railroad consolidation have been the consequences of republican legislation.

Mr. Chairman, the fundamental error of the republican party is that they have no faith in the capacity of the people to control. Their policy has been to absorb authority over finance; to assume control of the political administration of States; to make allegiance to party rather than devotion to law the rule to control their action. I have been educated to the conviction that it was the effort and pride of our people to demonstrate in the face of contending systems that they were the power, that they not only had the right to govern, but had as well the capacity, and that the control of the people was the safety of the State. The practice of the republican party has looked to the establishment of an irresponsible personal government; their studied effort to cultivate the impression that every man who spoke of the sanctity of the Constitution, or the authority of laws, or the rightful power of the people, was a hypocrite and a demagogue. If these gentlemen had looked more deeply into the subject they would have discovered that the assumption of the central Government of control over the finances of the people had resolved their elected servants into rings to promote their own rather than the general welfare, had made them conspirators against the public safety, had made them select as counselors and advisers the money-changers, who by education and interest are the enemies of every wealth-producing class.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose no one will deny that the depreciation of legal-tender and national-bank notes result in serious injury to every legitimate interest. Let me for a moment attempt to explain the causes that have produced the depreciation, the result of which has been to discredit the Government at home and abroad. The Congress succeeding the campaign of 1868 passed an act construing the legal effect of the five-twenty bonds, twelve hundred millions of which were then in existence; the construction declared that both principal and interest should be paid in gold. The five-twenty bonds are now payable at the option of the Government, and on the present standard of depreciation of the paper, 13 per cent., it creates an additional debt against the people of $156,000,000. The depreciation was largely the result of the republican legislation; it drove the legal-tender out of one of its greatest fields of usefulness; it was done at the dictation of the bondholder, who had already by previous legislation secured exemption for his bonds from all public support. Upon the behests of this class, and for their protection, the republican party, by their majority in Congress, disregarding law, principle, and policy, against the letter of the contract, made a dividend of the earnings of the people to the extent of one hundred and fifty millions, and translated it by this single enactment to the pockets of the already protected bondholders, withdrawing legal-tenders from their legitimate field of usefulness, contracting their power, and, therefore, contracting their value. Another legislative condemnation of legal-tenders by the republican party is their refusal to receive them for duties on imports, thus again contracting their sphere of usefulness, and again destroying their value and detrimentally affecting the credit of the Government.

The injurious effect upon private interest by this legislative discrimination on the part of the republican party against the Government circulation is incalculable. Its results upon the people in defraying public expenditures can be shown. The gold recovered as duties on imports, paid by the consumers of imported articles, costs the people, on the present standard of value, one hundred and thirteen cents of circulation for every dollar in gold paid; this discrimination in favor of the bondholder and against the people amounting annually in the payment of interest to about $15,000,000, the whole interest paid being about $120,000,000, 13 per cent. added to which aggregates in excess the sum above named. It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that it would be well to commence some legislation to protect the people from organized robbery. For ten years the banker, the bondholder, the manufacturer, and the railroad monopolist have had a free swing at the public purse, the public lands, and private rights. Would it not be well for us so-called Representatives of the people to pay a little attention to our legitimate duties? The banks, the bondholders, and railroads are certainly out of their swaddling-clothes. They have been petted and pampered with as many of the indications of affection as the loving mother exhibits to her first-born boy. We have built them into a strong manhood, and can doubtless look to them as our offspring in all future with pride. And I modestly call my brother representatives of the people to the regular order of business, that we, for awhile anyhow, forget our darlings and pay attention to the general welfare.

I desire to present a table, compiled by the very highest and most reliable authority, showing that, without cost to the people, or any substantial increase of the public debt, silver coin can be substituted for the fractional currency. Does not every one know that the retiring of the fractional currency and the substitution of silver therefor would appreciate the value of the whole volume of the circulation? Why, let me ask, when it costs us nothing, does not the republican party substitute silver for fractional currency? The exchange can be made of the United States coinage of silver about dollar for dollar. It would increase the value of one of our own products, and in that way add to our wealth. It would, without question, appreciate the value of the circulation, and thus tend to decrease the public burdens. There is some inherent quality of the mind, independent of the question of value, that makes gold and silver circulation an inducement to economy and the guardian of public honesty. The reverse is true of paper. When paper is abundant a saturnalia of thieves always exists; extravagance and corruption attend public administration as well as private life. Knowing the facts, it appears to me that no man of common sense can oppose its substitution for fractional currency. Who is there who would not rather have a half-dollar of United States coinage in silver than the half-rotten paper half-dollar of fractional currency? It will not increase the debt to substitute it. The people want it; it will not decrease the volume of the circulation, and will inflate it by increasing its value. The table shows the relative value of paper circulation and United States silver coinage, and is as follows:

Gold value of a dollar in subsidiary silver coin, when standard silver is worth certain sums, gold coin.		Gold value of a dollar greenback, when gold is at a certain premium.
When standard silver bullion is worth, in gold, per ounce—	One dollar in subsidiary silver coin is worth, gold—	When the premium on gold is, per cent.—	The gold value of a dollar greenback is—
$1 01	$0 81.1	1	$0 99
1 02	81.9	2	98
1 03	82.7	3	97
1 04	83.6	4	96.1
1 05	84.4	5	95.2
1 06	85.2	6	94.3
1 07	86	7	93.4
1 08	86.8	8	92.6
1 09	87.6	9	91.7
1 10	88.4	10	90.9
1 11	89.2	11	90
1 12	90.0	12	89.3
1 13	90.8	13	88.5

The remedy for our present evils is in the abolition of the national shaving shops, called national banks, and the consequent decentralization of money; in the abolition of protection and the assertion of free trade; in the dethronement of the rings and the enthronement of the people. Whenever this rightful action is attempted a howl of disapproval disturbs the serenity of the cowardly. A subsidized press, who, instead of being the educators of the people, have become the hired instrument of the rings, talk of vested rights and pledged faith, and claim that, by past legislative action, influenced in part by ignorance, in part by passion, and in part by baser motives, these systems of plunder against labor, and all the elements that constitute the wealth and prosperity of the people and the security of free institutions, shall be perpetuated. My claim is that our Government was established to demonstrate the capacity and the right of the people to govern themselves. Their claim is, the action of the people must be subordinate to the dictation of protected bondholders, who claim vested rights against them; of vast money monopolies, who claim vested rights against them; of consolidated railroad carrying interest, who claim vested rights against them; of organization of gamblers on Wall street, who claim vested rights against them. The people have vested no rights in railroads nor banks, bondholders or gamblers, that robs them of the reward of their honest toil, nor jeopardize that freedom that our Government was intended to protect and perpetuate. Vested rights and pledged faith was the battle-cry of the railroads of my own State of Illinois when they raised the rates of transportation of its surplus products to market and robbed the agriculturist of the rightful result of his labor. Vested rights and pledged faith is the cry of the national banks, while they quietly pocket 6 per cent. in gold on bonds exempted from all taxation, and in addition take out of the pockets of the people 10 per cent. interest on the circulation—equivalent to 90 per cent. on the par value of the bonds which cost them nothing. Vested rights and pledged faith is the battle-cry of the stock gambler when he waters railroad stock and makes corners against the producers and consumers of wealth.

There are no vested rights against the people in favor of plunderers. The Government was created to demonstrate the dignity of labor and the equality and authority of the people. The sovereignty rests with them by fundamental law, and rings, combinations, and monopolies will find a thoroughly awakened people obstructing the accomplishment of their designs. I believe future American history will demonstrate that experience is the most valuable educator. Republican rule has learned the people that, whenever they let out their authority to others, rings, the objects of which are to rob the valuable interests and the producing classes, take control of the country. The people have learned "that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty;" have learned to economize the delegation of their authority; have learned that during the existence of passions begotten by an unhappy conflict between a common brotherhood, tied together by every natural law, the enemies of free government have been making dangerous encroachments on their rightful authority; have learned that to promote the prosperity of the country and protect their liberties they must call a halt on rings and monopolies; and have learned, by the insecurity, the general distress, and the want of prosperity their unbridled control has begotten, that their first and highest duty is to depose them and take control of their own affairs.

Mr. Chairman, it is our duty, by easy and cheap communication, to foster and encourage reciprocal demand for the different products of our own country. The development of easy and cheap communication between all its localities is, for two reasons, imperatively demanded. The first is, it cements our political bonds by allying our interests; the second, that our diverse productions, resulting from diverse climates and soils, when easy and cheap communication for transfer of products is established, will enable the people of each of the sections to devote their energies to the productions most congenial and wealth-producing. The cotton-producing regions of the South and the cereal-producing regions of the Northwest, for the benefit of our own people, should be connected by cheap communications. Improve water-lines, build railroads; in short, do anything that will relieve the oppressed producing classes from the insatiable avarice of the rings and monopolies that are the creatures of republican control.

Here the committee informally rose, and Mr. CROOKE took the chair as Speaker pro tempore, to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. BABCOCK, his Private Secretary; who also informed the House that the President had approved bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1573) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location;

An act (H. R. No. 2193) to ratify an agreement with certain Ute Indians in Colorado and to make an appropriation for carrying out the same;

An act (H. R. No. 1039) for the relief of John B. Weber, late colonel of the Eighteenth Regiment Corps d'Afrique;

An act (H. R. No. 2868) to render available an unexpended balance of appropriation for collection and payment of bounty, &c., for colored soldiers and sailors;

An act (H. R. No. 200) for the relief of settlers on the Cherokee strip in Kansas;

An act (H. R. No. 668) relative to private contracts or agreements made with Indians prior to May 4, 1872;

An act (H. R. No. 1575) for the relief of Richard H. Swift; and

An act (H. R. No. 1581) for the relief of George S. Wright, administrator of the estate of John T. Wright, deceased.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. MARSHALL. I yield the remaining half-hour of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard upon the Indian appropriation bill before the debate under the five-minute rule begins, especially upon two points in it: the one relating to the treaties made in 1867 and 1868, which I think are not treaties in any such sense as to require this House blindly to carry them out merely because they are called treaties; and I want to explain the reasons why I shall oppose appropriations to carry many of the provisions of them out—I could not do so in a debate limited to five minutes; and the other point on which I want to be heard now is as to the repeal of the section of an appropriation bill enacted three years ago on my motion, giving to the peace commissioners authority to revise and examine the accounts of the Indian Bureau before payments were made on the vouchers of agents. That provision was abrogated two years ago, improperly as I contend, and, as I believe, because of its abrogation many irregularities have sprung up.

I desire to say first that this bill, like all former bills presented before a general election, purports to be in the interest of economy. The amount it appropriates is, I suppose, low enough if we could prevent deficiencies and have the money honestly applied; but like all other bills it will have to be supplemented hereafter unless the present administration of the system is changed and some control can be had over the expenditures of money by the Indian Bureau. The amount asked to be appropriated is under $5,000,000; but we all know what the history of such bills is. Last Congress, when the gentleman from California, Mr. SARGENT, (now in the Senate,) reported a bill similar to this, he showed that it was very economical as compared with the bill of a year previous. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] in his very able speech, which I read carefully last night, attempts to show that we are now in the line of economy because the appropriations in this bill are cut down below $5,000,000. I have heard so many professions of that sort that I understand their value. What does the Secretary of the Treasury say in his report sent to us at this session? He says that the net expenditures by warrants for the fiscal year which closed on the 30th day of June last amounted to $7,951,704. What does he say as to the expenditures of the current fiscal year? Two million eight thousand dollars were expended for the first quarter, and he estimated the amount which we expended for the Indian service during the balance of the year at $6,500,000, making over $8,500,000. We are spending these sums now, if the Secretary can be relied on, although we are told that the bill of last year was an economical bill. How do gentlemen account for such exhibits as these in the face of their professions? What does the Secretary show in his statement of the actual appropriations made for Indians? Turn to his book of appropriations and it will be there seen that he shows that we have appropriated for Indians $6,468,977, and for the current fiscal year, and outside of all the small bills put through. We have had laid upon our tables within the last day or two a deficiency bill, one of the items of which, under the head of the Interior Department, is $1,363,813; and if my figures are right the amount for Indians is $940,600. So that, as I in common with other gentlemen on this side have always charged and proved, we are going from bad to worse in the matter of Indian expenditures. Why are we doing it? The gentleman from Missouri shows that we are doing it in part because of the Indian treaties made in 1867 and 1868, involving expenditures of over $3,000,000. I agree that is one reason why we are spending so much. These treaties are abominations in many respects. I contend that they are not treaties in any such sense that this House is bound to regard them, and that fact I will endeavor to maintain and make good if I can get the attention of the committee.

Sir, I have as high respect for treaties made by the President and Senate as any other man on this floor, when made in conformity to the requirements of the Constitution under the authority therein granted. But when treaties are improperly made, or the conditions under which they are authorized are evaded in essential particulars, then I feel authorized not to be absolutely bound by such action, and to deny that this House is bound to appropriate money to carry them out, especially when it is shown that those treaties subserve no useful purpose.

Mr. Chairman, when these treaties were attempted to be made in 1867 they were inaugurated, they were set on foot, under an act of Congress. Both Houses participating, a treaty under the constitutional treaty-making power is never made by virtue of an act of Congress; but in the cases now being considered commissioners were sent out to settle with the Indian tribes, on the best terms they could, by an act of Congress which you will find in the fifteenth volume of the Statutes at Large, on page 17. Their orders were to make arrangements with the Indians, and to submit for the approval of Congress their acts in regard to reservations set apart for them. The act, in section 2, used this language:

> Said district or districts, when so selected, and the selection approved by Congress, shall be and remain permanent homes for said Indians to be located thereon, and no person[s] not members of said tribes shall be permitted to enter thereon without the permission of the tribes interested, except officers and employés of the United States.

The action of these commissioners was never submitted to Congress. The Senate assumed the right to act without consulting the House. Turn to page 635 of the same volume, and you will find that in pursuance of the authority of that act of Congress, which requires, as I have shown, the action of the commissioners to be submitted to Congress, so-called treaties were made with a lot of roving savages; I take that made with the Sioux as a specimen of the whole, by articles 2 and 16, of which a country was given up to the Sioux Indians which extended over not only the Northern Pacific and the Central Pacific, but even the Kansas Pacific Railroad, and which nobody has ever kept or thought of keeping. It is, and for years has been, a dead letter, neither the Indians nor the whites having paid any respect to its provisions from that day to this. I quote article 16:

> The United States hereby agrees and stipulates that the country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains shall be held and considered to be unceded Indian territory, and also stipulates and agrees that no white person or persons shall be permitted to settle upon or occupy any portion of the same; or without the consent of the Indians, first had and obtained, to pass through the same; and it is further agreed by the United States that within ninety days after the conclusion of peace with all the bands of the Sioux Nation the military posts now established in the territory in this article named shall be abandoned, and that the road leading to them and by them to the settlements in the Territory of Montana shall be closed.

So utterly absurd were these so-called treaties that the House in the Fortieth Congress refused to recognize them. These treaties involved the country in the payment of over $60,000,000. When in the Forty-first Congress I announced that it did so involve us in at least $60,000,000, my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, Judge LAWRENCE, of Ohio, rose and said that I had understated it and that they would cost the country over $90,000,000, as I see by turning to the debate in the Globe of that date, and I suspect he was nearer right than I was. When these matters were laid before the Forty-first Congress the House refused to make any appropriation to carry out the treaties, and rather than do so we put a gross sum into the hands of the President of $2,000,000 to manage Indian affairs as best he could. He did so manage them during that year by and through the officers of the Army and the peace commissioners, as I understand, and they were managed better then under the military authorities with the aid of the peace commissioners than they have ever been since. Next year the struggle was renewed. The House struck out all the appropriations to carry out these treaties, partly because they were in violation of the act of Congress which authorized the commissioners who made them to act, and mainly because of the useless and wasteful expenditure of money, which did no good to the Indians and was terribly oppressive on the tax-payers of the country. The Senate had so far to yield to the demands of the House as to make a permanent law that "hereafter no Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or power with which the United States may contract by treaty." That stands to-day upon our statutes as the law of the land. And while it was further provided that "no treaty heretofore lawfully made and ratified shall be impaired or set aside," it left the question open as to the validity of these treaties, which this House has always contended were irregular, null, and void. Further than that, and to show that this House was in earnest in the matter, I will read a resolution which I offered on this floor, and which was adopted on the 20th of April, 1871. It is as follows:

Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution "that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur," the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the powers of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on the law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good.

This House adopted that resolution without a division, less than seven members rising in their places to vote against it.

That is the copy of a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Fourth Congress, (in Washington's administration,) upon which the yeas and nays were recorded as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Theodorus Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, David Bard, Lemuel Benton, Thomas Blount, Nathan Bryan, Dempsey Burges, Samuel J. Cabell, Gabriel Christie, John Clopton, Isaac Coles, Jeremiah Crabb, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, Samuel Earle, William Findley, Jesse Franklin, Albert Gallatin, William B. Giles, Nicholas Gilman, Andrew Gregg, William B. Grove, Wade Hampton, George Hancock, Carter B. Harrison, John Hathorn, Jonathan N. Havens, John Heath, Daniel Heister, George Jackson, Edward Livingston, Matthew Locke, William Lyman, Samuel Maclay, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, John Milledge, Andrew Moore, Frederick A. Muhlenberg, John Nicholas, Alexander D. Orr, John Page, Josiah Parker, John Patten, Francis Preston, John Richards, Robert Rutherford, John S. Sherburne, Israel Smith, Samuel Smith, Thomas Sprigg, John Swanwick, Absolom Tatom, Philip Van Cortlandt, Joseph B. Varnum, Abraham Venable, and Richard Winn—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Fisher Ames, Benjamin Bourne, Theophilus Bradbury, Daniel Buck, Joshua Coit, William Cooper, Abiel Foster, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Henry Glen, Benjamin Goodhue, Chauncey Goodrich, Roger Griswold, Robert Goodloe Harper, Thomas Hartley, Thomas Henderson, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, John Wilkes Kittera, Samuel Lyman, Francis Malbone, William Vans Murray, John Reed, Theodore Sedgwick, Jeremiah Smith, Nathaniel Smith, William Smith, Zephaniah Swift, George Thatcher, Richard Thomas, Mark Thompson, Uriah Tracey, John E. Van Allen, Peleg Wadsworth, and John Williams—35.

This House claimed the right in the Forty-first Congress by an almost unanimous vote, as the Fourth Congress had done by an overwhelming majority, to determine whether they would carry out treaties even when regularly made if they did not meet their approval. I shall refuse in this bill to carry out treaties not only irregularly made, but which were void in their inception, ridiculous in detail, and which will involve this country in the payment of $60,000,000—which has already involved it in over $20,000,000 of useless expenditures.

The statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] is that over $3,000,000, perhaps $3,500,000, annually for the last six years were involved by these so-called treaties; if they are to be continued for twenty years will make the statement of my friend from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] that they would involve an expenditure of $90,000,000 nearer the truth than was my statement that it would involve an expenditure of $60,000,000.

Why do I say that these so-called treaties were ridiculous in their detail? Take the first paragraph of this Indian appropriation bill, that which provides for the Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches. You will find on the third page of the bill that part of these appropriations are installments to be expended for carpenters, for farmers, for blacksmiths, for engineers, for millers, for physicians, for teachers, giving places to a swarm of supernumeraries hanging around these tribes, performing no services, perhaps never getting in sight of any of the tribes, but drawing their salaries with commendable promptness and regularity.

What is the condition of these Indians? Are they farmers? Do they need engineers and carpenters? Do they need any of these employés? Let your commissioners answer. I hold in my hand the report of 1872, made by the ablest man that has been in the Indian Bureau since I have been here; I mean General Walker. If he was in office to-day I would have more confidence in the management of these matters than I have now, and I do not mean to reflect on the present Commissioner personally. On page 41 of his report, General Walker says:

Kiowas, Comanches, and Apaches.—Wild and intractable, these Indians, even the best of them, have given small signs of improvement in the arts of life, and, substantially, the whole dealing of the Government with them, thus far, has been in the way of supplying their necessities for food and clothing, with a view of keeping them upon their reservation and preventing their raiding into Texas, with the citizens of which State they were for many years before their present establishment on terms of mutual hatred and injury. The liberality and forbearance of the Government since the treaty of 1867, when complete amnesty for the offenses of the past was extended to these Indians, even to the extent of allowing them to retain their stolen stock, have not borne the fruits expected, and it may be found necessary, according to the opinion expressed in another part of this report, to bring them to a sense of their errors by severe punishment. In the opinion of the committee the point has been reached where forbearance ceases to be a virtue. * * * However, it may be said in a word of these Indians that their civilization must follow their submission to the Government, and that the first necessity in respect to them is a wholesome example, which shall inspire fear and command obedience. So long as four-fifths of these tribes take turns at raiding into Texas openly and boastfully, bringing back scalps and spoils to their reservation, efforts to inspire very high ideas of social and industrial life among the communities of which the raiders form so large a part will presumably result in failure.

What does the present Commissioner say on this subject? He says that these tribes are to-day in such a hostile attitude and so fierce, that he sees nothing left except to turn them over to the military, so that they may be punished as they ought to be; and that the protection of Texas requires this at the hands of the Government. Yet we are called upon in the very first provision of this bill to make appropriations, under what are called treaties, for blacksmiths, millers, teachers, physicians, engineers, and a swarm of useless supernumeraries, when you cannot catch one of these Indians half the time with a lasso.

That is a fair specimen of the character of the treaties of 1867–'68, and these are the items Congress is called to vote away the money of the people to carry out. Some gentlemen call these sacred treaties, when our official reports show that these Indians are on the war-path, and cannot even be punished, as shown by both of your commissioners. This state of things is known to us all, while we are voting millions of public money under pretense that we are educating and civilizing them. Sir, war dissolves and annuls all treaties even among civilized nations. When you are dealing with savage Indians, when you have to supply them with what is necessary to keep alive those who are peaceful and needy, it is the merest folly on earth to talk about the sacred character of treaties, such as those which were made in 1868. I do not refer to the old treaties, but to the treaties claimed to be made under an act of Congress and which were never reported to this House for its sanction, though required by law to be. I believe this House is yet a part of Congress. That is one complaint I have to make. But I must be brief. I can only make suggestions. I will stand by the old treaties, right or wrong, because they have been recognized and acted on without question, and many of the tribes with which they were made are far advanced in civilization. Our courts have recognized them. Our condition when they were made and the status of the Indian tribes were very different. Now we are asked to recognize as sovereign powers vagabonds whom we would hang if they should steal a cow. It is a farce.

The other complaint I make grows out of the atrocities that have been perpetrated in the administration of Indian affairs. We have found upon examination of this subject that before the peace commissioners obtained any control of expenditures in the Indian Department, robberies such as were unknown in any other part of our service were perpetrated against the Indians. I was one of a committee of three appointed by the Committee on Appropriations of the Forty-first Congress to make an investigation of this subject, and I will call attention to some of the facts developed in that case as a specimen of the working of the system. The Quapaws and Creeks and other poor beggarly Indian tribes, whose women and children were almost starving, had $300,000 sent to them by the Government, and agents were appointed to attend to its faithful distribution and see that the Indians received the money. No man by law could make a contract with them, because they were our wards. Yet the result of the investigation, in which I took part, will be found in a report signed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] by Mr. SARGENT, of California, now a Senator, and myself, which report makes, among many other things, the following statement, which was abundantly sustained by proof:

To the mind of the committee the testimony shows irregularities, neglect, and incompetency, and, in some instances, a departure from the express provisions of law for the regulation of Indian expenditures and in the management of affairs in the Indian Department.

After showing the outrageous character of the contracts made with Bosler and others, without advertisement or competition, at double the rates paid by the Army for like supplies at the same time and at the same places, and after setting forth the proof as to the payments to the Quapaws and others, the committee say:

It will thus be seen that out of the payment of $125,000 to the Chickasaws, General Blunt received $62,500; out of $84,000 to the Choctaws he received $33,600, and out of $90,000 to the Quapaws, $30,000; in the aggregate $126,100, out of payments amounting to $299,000. As it was not believed to be of sufficient importance to delay the presentation of this report, the committee did not attempt to ascertain how much was paid to the traders, which could only have been learned, if at all, by sending for witnesses from a distance at great expense; and as neither General Blunt's conduct, nor that of the agents now out of the employ of the United States, nor of the traders can be investigated by Congress for any other purpose except to prevent the repetition of such extortion and misconduct in the future, the committee think they have performed their duty by calling attention to the facts and the existing laws, and by suggesting such legislation as will prevent a repetition of these things, as it is fair to presume the cases to which the attention of the committee has been directed are only specimens of the whole.

Besides this there were merchants, traders, and other claimants taking their share; so that of this appropriation of $299,000 less than 20 per cent. reached the hands of the Indians in any shape whatever. They were robbed and plundered at least with the acquiescence, certainly without protest from the agents of the Government. That, I say, is merely a specimen of the system. It is shown in that report (which I hope gentlemen will send for and read; it is No. 39 of the reports for the third session of the Forty-first Congress) that private contracts were made with others besides Bosler at double the prices at which men made contracts when they were advertised and put up at public bidding and let to the lowest bidder. Immense sums were squandered in that way until the Commissioner then in office had to be relieved or removed, in great part, I believe, because of the facts developed in that report in which the two republican members and myself united.

The difficulty we have had with the Indians has always been that we have never done them justice. There is only one way to manage the Indian: first show him that you have the power to make him do right; then let him see that you are ready to do him justice. We have been feeble in enforcing our power. We have never done the Indian justice when we have taken control of him. We have sent out among the Indians vagabond agents at $1,500 a year who have seldom been content unless they could make $25,000, and who in connection with the thieving "rings" of contractors have robbed the Indian and made him feel nothing but contempt for the white man; and in all his acts he sees nothing worthy of imitation, but everything to shun and avoid.

I would be reluctant to put the Indian now under control of the military; it might alarm him, though I believe his fear would be groundless. I would only do it if the military could be made to act in harmony with the peace commission, so that the commissioners could allay the fears of the Indians. For I believe in civilizing the Indian; I believe it can be accomplished, slowly it may be, but with reasonable hope of success; but it cannot be done so long as dishonesty and fraud form a part of all our dealings with him. We must be just; we must show the Indian that we are powerful, and that we are as honorable as we are strong. How does England manage the Indians in Canada? She makes the Indian behave himself; she makes the white settlers treat him well; she fulfills all her contracts with him. We on the contrary undertake, as I have shown in the example I gave, to pay $299,000 to two or three tribes of Indians and in fact pay them less than $50,000, our officials standing by and allowing them to be robbed of all the balance. What must the Indian think of that sort of civilization? He understands it as meaning that he is to be brought down to a level with the plunderer whom he despises.

I believe that as long as men are trusted with control of the Indians merely because of their political influence; as long as the Senate (and I speak of that body with all respect) can confirm as agents their brothers, cousins, and other kinsmen or favorites, and send them out to the Indian country to make fortunes at the expense of the Government, you can have no proper system of Indian administration. If we are to have such agents dealing with the Indians, I prefer to turn them over to the War Department; for I will say in behalf of the officers and soldiers of the American Army that whatever else may be said against them you cannot make thieves of them. Their education, their esprit de corps, their position in society, their whole standing before the country, is conducive to their integrity as men; and the records of this country will show that single individual Indian agents have committed more robberies than all the paymasters of the United States from the foundation of the Government down to the present time. I regret to have to say it, but my observation here has forced the conclusion upon me, that in the custom-house, in the post-office, in the Indian Bureau, everywhere where politics control, dishonesty among subordinates is the rule, not the exception; while among the officers of the Army I am happy to say honesty in the disbursement of money is the rule, and not the exception. Therefore I look to them to make faithful Indian agents.

We must have honesty in our administration of Indian affairs. I do not believe we can get it outside of the officers of the regular Army. The officers must be among these people at any rate; we must have troops in the neighborhood of the Indians, because we cannot control a savage except by giving him a palpable exhibit of our power, and the only man he respects is the man he regards as a warrior. He has no respect for the "sneak-thief;" he has no respect for the man who is selling him mean whisky, stealing his blankets, and robbing him of his money. But he has respect for the power of the Government, and for the men whom he looks upon as his equals or superiors in the field of battle. And, sir, let me tell you there is no officer of the Army who wants to bring on war with the Indians. There is no glory in an Indian war. The agent or the trader, the fellow you send there whose interest is to count more Indians than there are that there may be the more supplies to steal, may want strife. But the soldier who has to go into the field, the officer who has to command the troops, knows that no matter how gallantly he may behave, he can gain no credit in a contest with a few savage, half-naked, half-starved Indians, any more than you or I could gain in a contest with a nest of hornets; for if we should kill them all and be ourselves stung once, we would be the losers in the strife.

The soldiers know that, and they seek no strife. In dealing with these men I agree with the Commissioner when he said—I mean General Walker—"there is no question of dignity be it remembered involved in the treatment of savages by a civilized power. With wild men, as with wild beasts, the question whether in any situation one shall fight, coax, or run is a question of what is easiest and best." And it will be so treated always by all sensible men. But, Mr. Chairman, my time is running too fast to dwell on that any longer.

I do not want the Indians oppressed. I want them protected. I want them dealt with honestly. When that is done they will deal honestly and truly with us, and their civilization will soon follow. Convinced of the magnitude of the frauds perpetrated on the Indians three years ago, I introduced two amendments to the Indian appropriation bill; one requiring the peace commissioners to examine all of the accounts of all of the Indian agents and all contracts; the other making it a penal offense for any man to take money from them or pretend to be their attorney. The first became a law, but the latter did not until my friend from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] reported it from the Committee on Indian Affairs and passed it.

The law I had the honor to present and have passed reads thus, (see Statutes, volume 16, page 568:)

That hereafter no payments shall be made by any officer of the United States to contractors for goods or supplies of any sort furnished to the Indians, or for the transportation thereon, or for any buildings or machinery erected or placed on their reservations under or by virtue of any contract entered into with the Interior Department, or any branch thereof, on the receipts or certificates of the Indian agents or superintendents of such supplies, goods, transportation, buildings, or machinery beyond 50 per cent. of the amount due, until the accounts and vouchers shall have been submitted to the executive committee of the board of commissioners appointed by the President of the United States, and organized under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, and the third section of the act approved April 15, 1870, for examination, revisal, and approval; and it shall be the duty of said board of commissioners, without unnecessary delay, to forward said accounts and vouchers so submitted to them to the Secretary of the Interior, with the reasons for their approval or disapproval of the same, in whole or in part, attached thereto; and said Secretary shall have power to sustain, set aside, or modify the action of said board, and cause payment to be made or withheld as he may determine.

So long as this law was allowed to remain on the statute-book the peace commissioners exercised a control over the action of the Department which was very beneficial. They prohibited the making of all contracts until after due advertisement. They prohibited as far as they could Indian agents from sending in false accounts and having them paid by the Indian Bureau whether right or wrong, as had been done too often before. But it was found that this provision of law was holding the "ring" down too close. Two years ago, in May, 1872, the most salutary provision in that law was repealed against my protest and against the protest I believe of every man on this side of the House. I spoke against it; I voted against it; I called the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill because of it. I announced then that it was a fraudulent attempt to relieve the Indian Bureau from the control of the men who were seeking to save the money of the people and protect the Indian from the rapacity of the thieves who were robbing him. The majority of the House paid no attention to what I said. They passed the law; and what followed then? I have the report of the peace commissioners to the President, in which they say that from July, 1872, to March, 1873, no accounts were sent to them by the Indian Office for examination, it having been held by the Department that the act of May 29, 1872, relieved it from the necessity of submitting accounts to the board and relieved the board of the duty of acting on them.

I submit the following extracts from the recent report of the executive committee of the peace commissioners, and from that of the Secretary of the Interior, to show how diametrically they are opposed to each other. The committee say:

SIR: The executive committee of the board respectfully present the following report:

From July 1, 1872, until March 1, 1873, no accounts were sent to us by the Indian Office for examination, it having been thought by that office that the act of May 29, 1872, relieved them of the necessity of submitting accounts to the board and relieved the board of the duty of acting on them. After the meeting of Congress the discussion upon the Indian appropriation bill showed that it was not the opinion of Congress that the board had been relieved from auditing these accounts.

The Secretary of the Interior says:

It will be observed that by the act of May 29, 1872, the examination of accounts and vouchers by the board of commissioners was not to be longer deemed a prerequisite of payment. In view of the legislation in that behalf which had been previously enacted, and was still unrepealed, and the peculiarity of the language of the act of 1872, I deemed it best, for prudential reasons for the time being, to continue the practice of sending all accounts to the board for examination prior to the final action of the Department thereon.

Somebody is misstating the facts; both cannot be true. It was evident when Congress met in December, 1872, that some rights had to be given to the commissioners in this matter; they claimed it, and the Secretary acquiesced partially in their claim. Since March, 1873, the commissioners have had a partial recognition, but it has been only partial, and they have been overruled in many cases in which it seems to me they were clearly in the right. It is another evidence of the tenacity with which Bureaus cling to power, and the reluctance with which they submit to any control either from Congress or any other power.

I have only time to call attention in a hurried way to some of the leading points in the report of the commissioners and the reasons why their views were disregarded. I suppose most of the members of this House have their report. In it they show that they have reported against the payment of many claims for payment on contracts made, not after due advertisement, not to the lowest bidder, but made under so-called exigencies that were mere pretenses, contracts really made because the office thought they had the right to do just as they pleased. These accounts amounted to nearly half a million dollars. The commissioners say that some of these accounts are fraudulent. I think they prove it. Many were grossly irregular and in plain violation of known law.

They show that contracts have been made with private parties at far greater cost than would have been necessary if they had been let at public biddings, simply, as I assume, because those men were the friends of the Bureau. And when the Secretary of the Interior comes to make his excuses for overruling them he justifies on the ground that he refers matters of this sort to the Assistant Attorney-General, as they now call the solicitor of the Indian Department. I hope members will look carefully at the excuses given. They show upon their face that the whole thing is a mere effort on the part of the department to absorb all authority and deny all restraint, and the excuse for doing it both as to exigencies and as to the conditions under which the contracts were made is so puerile that it is hard to see how any man could give a legal opinion sustaining those views. For example, about $77,000 was contracted for to deliver cows and oxen to a lot of Sioux because of an exigency. They had no time, it is said, to consult the commissioners, or even to advertise for bidders, when the proof shows that for five years these things had been postponed and no reason assigned for it. It was in an old matter which had run for five years unregarded, and yet they could not take time to notify the commissioners or put up advertisements, the exigency became so great, although it had never been thought of under the treaty which was made in 1868. In another case a contractor had agreed to deliver so many cattle in October, so many in November, so many in December, so many in January, so many in February, or at various times during the winter, so as to supply certain Indians. They were all, however, delivered in the fall, the contractors thereby freeing themselves from the risk of caring for the cattle during the winter, freeing themselves from the responsibility of feeding them, yet knowing the wasteful condition of things that if they were all sent to the Indians at once they would be starving before March unless other supplies were sent to them. The Assistant Attorney-General gives his opinion to the Secretary, notwithstanding the protest of the commissioners, that time is not of the essence of the contract and that it was just as well to deliver them all in October as to deliver them during the year, so much during each month for the supply of the Indians. But, as I said, I can only call attention to those things; every member will, I hope, read them carefully and judge for himself. I do not impute bad motives to the officials in the Interior Department; but their decisions are very unfortunate for the Indians and the country. Every man knows that a very important matter was to require contractors to deliver the stock from month to month according to the necessities of the case.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BECK. Let me just say one word more. I intend to ask on Monday that the rules be suspended for the purpose of making it in order to propose the re-enactment of the law which this House unanimously passed in 1871, requiring these commissioners to examine all accounts before that department shall make contracts or pay accounts in Indian matters.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. In what year was the opinion given to which the gentleman has reference?

Mr. BECK. The opinion given by Edward D. Smith to the Secretary of the Interior is dated November 28, 1873, and will be found in Executive Document No. 23 of this session.

[Mr. WOOD addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, it is well understood that the present Executive of the United States, soon after his first inauguration, adopted a policy in reference to the management of the Indian question which differs materially from that which had been pursued by any of his predecessors and which is generally known and recognized as President Grant's "peace policy." This so-called peace policy has been made the subject of much laudation on the part of some of his friends and admirers, and especially on the part of the officials whom he has from time to time appointed to carry it into effect. Scarcely a single report has been made or a single communication been submitted to Congress by any one of the officials connected with the administration of Indian affairs for the period named which has not come to us fairly laden with words of commendation and compliment over the success which has attended this new and heretofore untried experiment.

And yet, sir, notwithstanding these flattering reports which have from time to time been laid before Congress and the country, there seems to be to-day in the public mind everywhere a more general and wide-spread distrust of and dissatisfaction with the management of the Indian Bureau than there is in reference to any other branch or department of the public service.

Whether this supposed mismanagement is attributable to the Secretary of the Interior, who has a sort of appellate or supervisory control over the whole subject, or to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who is the recognized head and chief of the Bureau, or to the board of Indian commissioners, who have jointly with the Secretary of the Interior and the Indian Commissioner an advisory control, or yet to the Indian agents and superintendents who are scattered here and there over the Indian country, no one seems exactly to understand. But that there has been extravagance and profligacy in the expenditure of the public money for which some one is responsible is a fact which is not only susceptible of proof, but about which there seems to be but little diversity of opinion.

Mr. Chairman, the statistics of the country show, and it is I believe a well-established fact, that the Indians of this country are year by year rapidly diminishing in number; so much so, indeed, that those who have given to the question any serious reflection are in great doubt as to whether a century or two hence the Indians as a race will not have become wholly extinct in this country. This being so, one would naturally suppose that as time passes on and the number of Indians to be provided for by the Government year by year grows less and less, the expenditures necessary for that purpose would be correspondingly diminished. But, sir, a reference to the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury develops the fact that within the five years ending June 30, 1874, during which this so-called "peace policy" has been fairly in operation, a far larger amount has been expended upon the Indian service than was ever before expended in an equal number of years under any former administration from the origin of the Government down to the present time.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the report of the Secretary does not show exactly what the expenditures for the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, will be; but we have before us facts and figures which enable us to approximate at least the amount expended for that purpose. I have before me Executive Document No. 142 of the present Congress, in which the total amount appropriated for Indian service for the present year is given as $6,432,489.09.

Of this amount thus appropriated there was expended for the first six months of the present fiscal year the sum of $4,163,937.34. In addition to the amount thus actually expended, there was incurred for the six months named, over and above the actual expenditures, an indebtedness which, as shown on page 26 of Executive Document No. 142, amounts to $202,592.28, making the total expenditures for the first six months of the present year amount to $4,366,529.62.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I will ask my friend from Kentucky [Mr. ADAMS] whether he does not know it to be a fact that nearly all the contracts for supplies of all kinds, for clothing, and also for provisions, consisting of beef, flour, coffee, sugar, &c., are made for the entire year during the first half of the year, and the payments have been made upon those contracts, and that that is the reason of the showing he has just referred to?

Mr. ADAMS. I do understand the contracts are made in the first half of the year, Mr. Chairman; but I do not understand the supplies are furnished and paid for until the necessities of the agencies require them. That is my answer to the question of the gentleman.

Now, then, the entire cost of the Indian service for the first six months of the present fiscal year was $4,336,529.92, as I have already stated. Supposing it will cost as much for the remaining six months as for the preceding six months, we have as the total cost of the Indian Bureau for the entire year the modest little sum of $8,733,559.84. Estimating the cost of the present year, therefore, at the sum of $8,733,559.84, as above indicated, we have as the cost of this so-called peace policy for the five years during which it has been in successful operation the following figures:

1870	$3,407,938 15
1871	7,426,997 44
1872	7,061,728 82
1873	7,951,704 88
1874	8,733,059 84
Total	34,581,429 13

For the five years immediately preceding President Grant's administration the entire cost of the Indian service was as follows:

1864	$2,629,975 97
1865	5,059,360 71
1866	3,295,729 32
1867	4,642,531 77
1868	4,100,682 32
Total	19,728,280 09

For the five years immediately preceding the war, under the administrations of President Buchanan and President Pierce, it was as follows:

1857	$4,354,418 87
1858	4,978,226 18
1859	3,490,534 53
1860	2,991,121 54
1861	2,865,481 17
Total	18,679,782 29

Thus it appears that this so-called peace policy during the first five years of its operation has cost the Government $14,853,149.04 more than was expended for the same purpose in an equal number of years under the administration of Presidents Johnson and Lincoln immediately preceding that of President Grant; and that it has cost $16,901,946.84 more than was expended for the same purpose in an equal number of years under the administrations of Presidents Buchanan and Pierce which immediately preceded the war.

The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE,] in his remarks a day or two since, undertook to give an explanation of the causes which render necessary an increase in the expenditures of the Indian Department now over what they were in former years, and attributed it to the fact that in by-gone days the Indians had a wide extent of country, abundantly supplied with game, over which to roam and hunt at will, and had access to streams abounding with fish of every variety and description; whereas now, he says, they are crowded upon small, sterile, and unproductive reservations upon which it is impossible for them to live by the hunt and the chase, and which are utterly unsuited for agricultural purposes.

On the other hand, however, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr.

PARKER,] in his remarks, undertook to show us that the reservations upon which the Indians are now located are entirely too large for any practical purpose, and embrace too much of the valuable public domain not required for the real wants and necessities of the Indians. And to prove this he exhibited to the House a table of statistics and figures, which demonstrates the fact that there are at present within the various Indian reservations upon an average at least seven hundred acres of land to every Indian located thereon.

Now, there may possibly be something in the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa that the supply of game from which the Indians were at one time able to subsist themselves is not so abundant now as it was in former times. And however just and pertinent his remarks may have been in reference to the condition of the Indians at the present day as compared with that of the Indians of twenty-five or thirty years ago, they have no sort of applicability to the condition of the Indians for the last five years past, and furnish no explanation whatever for the increased expenditures of the Indian service under President Grant's administration, for the simple reason that the reservations upon which the Indians are now placed have not been materially diminished in size from what they were five years ago, are certainly no more sterile and unproductive now than then, and the Indians quite as capable of subsisting themselves now as they have been for years past.

We must therefore search elsewhere and look to other causes than those assigned by the gentleman from Iowa for an explanation of the startling increase in the expenditures of the Indian Bureau for the five years last past.

But, Mr. Chairman, this so-called peace policy has not only shown itself to be reckless and extravagant in the expenditure of the public money, but it has shown that those who are charged with carrying it into effect have an utter disregard for the laws of the land, and that they are ready at any and all times to violate the most positive enactments upon your statute-books whenever it suits their convenience to do so.

One of the very first things done by Congress after the inauguration of President Grant in 1869 was to appropriate and place at his disposal the sum of $2,000,000, in addition to the amount required to meet the ordinary expenses of the Indian service, to be by him expended in such manner as he might think best to maintain peace and promote civilization among the Indians; and a report of all expenditures was required by the law to be made in detail to Congress in December following.

That the House may understand exactly the objects for which this sum was appropriated, and the character of the report required to be made to Congress, I beg to call attention to the law itself, which is in the following words:

That there be appropriated the further sum of $2,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the President to maintain the peace among and with the various tribes, bands, and parties of Indians, and to promote civilization among said Indians, bring them, where practicable, upon reservations, relieve their necessities, and encourage their efforts at self-support; a report of all expenditures under this appropriation to be made in detail to Congress in December next.

Thus it will be observed that a report was required to be made in detail, showing the exact amount expended for each specific purpose.

But, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding this positive requirement that there should be made a report in detail of the manner in which this sum of money was expended, I undertake to say that no such report was ever made. I have before me what professes to be a report on that subject, consisting of less than half a page of printed matter, which does not give in detail the manner in which either the whole or any part of said appropriation was expended, but simply shows that there had been, at the time it was made, expended for various purposes the aggregate sum of $356,374.98, without designating how much was expended for any one particular purpose or another, and all the information it gives us is that there then had been expended in various ways, and for different purposes, the sum of $356,374.98, leaving a balance of $1,643,625.48, since expended in some way, but in reference to which we have no account whatever except the intimation in this report that it will be required for various purposes connected with the general and incidental expenses of the Indian service.

Mr. AVERILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. AVERILL. It is simply this: Is the gentleman not aware that, at the expiration of the time at which this commission was to make that report, there was but one-quarter part of those two millions that had been expended?

Mr. ADAMS. That did not prevent a report being made at a subsequent time, nor did it prevent a report in detail of the amount that had at that time been expended.

Mr. AVERILL. A report was made of all that had been expended.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not intend, by alluding to this failure to make the report required by law, to intimate or insinuate that the President of the United States has himself misappropriated, or knowingly allowed any one else to misappropriate, any portion of this money. But what I do assert is, that no such report as the law required was ever made, and that Congress and the country to-day are in profound ignorance as to the time when, the place where, or the purposes for which this immense sum of $2,000,000, placed at the disposal of the President, was expended.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not all I have to say in reference to the disregard of law to which I have referred.

In section 3 of the Indian appropriation bill passed July 15, 1870, we find the following clause prescribing the duties of the board of Indian commissioners, namely:

And it shall be the duty of said commissioners to supervise all expenditures of money appropriated for the benefit of Indians in the United States and to inspect all goods purchased for said Indians, in connection with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, whose duty it shall be to consult said commission in making purchases of such goods.

Here, sir, is a positive requirement of the law that the board of Indian commissioners shall inspect all goods purchased for Indians, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall make no purchases except upon consultation with said board of Indian commissioners. And yet, sir, notwithstanding that fact, the board of Indian commissioners, in their annual report made to this Congress, on page 16, give an itemized statement of purchases made from March 1 to December 31, 1873, amounting in the aggregate to $873,587.66, which they had no opportunity to inspect, because said purchases were made without any sort of consultation with them and without even any knowledge of theirs.

Not only so, Mr. Chairman, but section 4 of the Indian appropriation bill passed July 15, 1870, provides as follows:

That no part of the moneys appropriated by this act, or which may hereafter be appropriated in any general act or deficiency bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, to pay annuities due to or to be used and expended for the care and benefit of any tribe or tribes of Indians named herein, shall be applied to the payment of any claim for depredations that may have been or may be committed by such tribe or tribes or any member or members thereof; and no claims for Indian depredations shall hereafter be paid until Congress shall make special appropriation therefor; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Here, again, is a positive requirement that no money appropriated to the Indian service shall be applied to the payment of claims for Indian depredations, and that no such claim shall be paid until Congress shall make special appropriation therefor. No prohibition could possibly be more positive and peremptory, and no language plainer or more explicit; and yet, Mr. Chairman, we find on page 28 of Executive Document No. 142, forwarded to this House by the Commissioner over his own signature, that he has gone on paying claims for Indian depredations out of money appropriated for other purposes, when this statute positively declares that no such payments shall be made.

But again, sir, on page 251, volume 16, Statutes at Large, we find a provision to which I ask the careful attention of the committee, and the language of which is as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any Department of the Government to expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or to involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

This section, it will be observed, declares in the most positive and emphatic terms that it shall not be lawful for any Department of the Government to expend in any one year any sum of money in excess of the appropriations made by Congress for that year, or to incur any indebtedness in excess of such appropriations; and yet, sir, strange as it may seem, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, on page 26 of Executive Document No. 142, forwarded to this House by himself, gives to us—what? I read from the document itself:

"A statement showing the outstanding indebtedness of the Indian service so far as can be ascertained, from July 1 to December 31, 1873, for which there are no funds."

This statement, Mr. Chairman, aggregates the sum of $202,502.58 as the amount of indebtedness incurred during the first six months of the present fiscal year in excess of the appropriations made by Congress, for the payment of which there are, of course, no funds. And this, too, in direct violation of the statute above referred to.

Sir, if an officer of the Army or of the Navy were thus to disregard the law of the land and thus to trample under foot the rules and regulations enacted for their guidance and control, he would be summarily tried before a court-martial, and ignominiously dismissed from the service as a discredit and a disgrace to the uniform he wears. And, sir, we all remember that only a few short years ago the then President of the United States, for the alleged violation of a law the provisions of which were susceptible at least of two constructions, and as to the meaning of which the most learned judges and jurists of the country might well differ, was in the high-sounding name of "Representatives of the whole people" arraigned before the bar of the Senate to answer for the commission of high crimes and misdemeanors. But to-day the officers connected with the administration of this so-called peace policy under President Grant boldly announce to us over their own signatures that they have done that which your laws declare shall not be done, and that they have violated laws the provisions of which are positive and peremptory, and the meaning of which is so clear and unmistakable that even the wayfaring man need not err therein; and yet, strange to say, all these things do not now seem to attract the attention of the Representatives of the whole people at all!

Mr. Chairman, from all that we have from time to time heard in reference to the progress and success which have attended this new experiment at Indian civilization and christianization, one might well conclude that by this time all feeling of hostility on the part of the Indian toward the white man had, under its benign influence, been entirely eradicated; that there is now no longer any disposition on the part of the Indian to depredate upon the property or disturb the peace of his pale-faced neighbor; and that the unprotected frontierman can now lie down at night without fear of molestation or harm from those whom he lately regarded only with feelings of apprehension and alarm.

But, unfortunately, sir, such is not the case. We find that there has been presented to this Congress a larger number of claims for Indian depredations than was ever before presented to any one Congress. We see the halls and corridors and committee-rooms of the Capitol literally besieged by claimants demanding indemnity and reparation for depredations committed by Indians; and I have it from gentlemen upon this floor representing the State of Texas that the depredations of the Indians in that State have continued to increase until they are now threefold to fourfold greater than before the inauguration of this so-called peace policy.

But, Mr. Chairman, one of the noticeable features of this new policy is the conflicting opinions which we have laid before us by those charged with its execution as to the propriety of what has been done, and the contradictory statements furnished us as to the causes which have brought about certain results.

The board of Indian commissioners, consisting of gentlemen selected on account of their well-known intelligence, integrity, and philanthropy, in their official report laid before us at the beginning of the present session, inform us that among the many accounts submitted to them by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for their approval were some thirty-nine vouchers, aggregating the sum of $426,909.96, which they were, for reasons deemed satisfactory at the time, compelled to reject or suspend and forward to the Secretary of the Interior with the reasons for their action; and that their action in reference to eighteen of these vouchers, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $369,520.97 was set aside by the Secretary of the Interior and the money paid to claimants, notwithstanding their objections and remonstrances to the contrary. Now, in reference to this difference of opinion between the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the one side, and the board of Indian commissioners on the other, respecting the disbursement of this large sum of money, I shall not here and now venture any opinion; but it is a question about which I imagine the members of this House and the people of the country generally would like to be further advised.

And, again, I have before me Executive Document No. 186, of the present Congress, bearing date March 17, 1874, in which both the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs urge upon Congress an additional appropriation of $202,500 to meet a deficiency in the supply of beef required for the subsistence of the Indians during the present year at the Red Cloud and Whetstone agencies, which deficiency they say was occasioned in part by the accession at these agencies of large numbers of Indians from northern bands and tribes and in part by the excessive demands of the Indians, which the agents were powerless to resist. The board of Indian commissioners, however, attribute this deficiency to overreceipts on the part of the agents to contractors and to extravagance in issue to the Indians, whose number was nothing like so great as that reported by the agents.

The views of the board of commissioners upon this subject cannot be better stated than to give their own language, as contained in their official report laid before the present Congress, in which they say:

> A large portion of the amount of accounts disapproved and recommended to be suspended in part was for cattle delivered in advance of contract time and in excess of the current needs of the several agencies, which entailed upon the Government all the cost of herding, and the risk of loss by stampeding, disease, &c.
>
> Affidavits in our possession go to show that some of the cattle lost probably got into the herds of the contractor from which they had originally come, and in one case, after receiving an amount in excess of the quantity called for by contract or needed at the time, and after the receipt had been given to the contractor for them, a large number were turned into the contractor's herds; no receipt being taken to protect the Government's interest, and no guarantee that a like number of beeves of equal weight would be delivered to the agent.
>
> This system of excessive receipts has also caused great extravagance in issue, and, as a result at some agencies, the stock of beef calculated to last all the year is represented as all having been used before the year was more than half gone. From investigation we are satisfied issues of beef, flour, &c., have been made in some cases to a number of Indians greatly in excess of that actually at the agencies. At one agency, where the agent reported issue to Indians numbering from fourteen thousand to nearly seventeen thousand, we learn from good authority that the number has never exceeded eight thousand. At another, where the agent reported issue to nearly eleven thousand Indians, the best information on the subject goes to show that the number never exceeded five thousand.

The two agencies here referred to by the board of commissioners are, I am advised, the identical agencies for which this additional appropriation is asked.

It thus appears that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs account for this deficiency and the necessity for this additional appropriation in one way, while the board of Indian commissioners attribute it to other and entirely different causes. Whether the explanation furnished by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the one side, or that furnished by the board of Indian commissioners on the other, be the correct one, I shall not here and now undertake to decide; but I imagine the members of this House would like to be fully satisfied upon this subject before voting for the additional appropriation asked for.

And even conceding the facts of the case to be as represented by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, it would certainly have been well for them to have informed us from what particular tribe or tribes this large number of Indians came. If from tribes which are being subsisted at other agencies, then there ought to be a corresponding diminution in the expenses incident to the agencies from which they came, and no additional appropriation ought therefore to be necessary.

If, on the other hand, they came from wild roving bands, with whom the Government has heretofore had no communication and with whom it has heretofore been impossible to enter into any negotiations, it will strike every one with surprise that so large a number of this class of Indians, whom we are advised it is so difficult to collect or retain upon any particular reservation, should thus voluntarily have left the tribes with which they were connected and abandoned the nomadic habits and pursuits to which they are so much attached, by quietly settling down upon limited reservations and continuing to hover for an entire year around these two particular agencies.

But, sir, this is not the first time within the last few years that large numbers of wild and before unheard-of Indians have been discovered for whose maintenance and support largely increased appropriations have been asked.

In the latter part of the spring of 1872 it was discovered by the department here in Washington that there was in the vicinity of Fort Peck, in the Territory of Montana, a wild, powerful, and warlike tribe of Indians of whom nothing had ever before been heard, and who, for the lack of a better name no doubt, were designated as Teton-Sioux.

Their number was estimated at something over eleven thousand. They were represented as being in a state of great destitution, but exceedingly hostile and aggressive toward the whites, and ready to wage a war of butchery, spoliation, and plunder upon the surrounding country, unless immediate and ample provision should be made for their extreme necessities. Accordingly an appropriation of $500,000 was forthwith made for that purpose, which was followed by a similar appropriation of $200,000 last year, and the bill under consideration I find contains a like appropriation of $150,000 for the next fiscal year. When it was first announced that the sum of $500,000 had been appropriated for this purpose, the good people of Montana are said to have been astonished to hear that such an expenditure should have been thought necessary to relieve the necessities and prevent the depredations of a tribe of Indians supposed to be located in their very midst, but of which they themselves had never heard. And I have during the past winter talked with several of the citizens of Montana who have been there for a number of years, and who to this good day are so incredulous as to suppose that the tribe of so-called Teton Sioux is a myth which exists only in imagination rather than a reality in fact. Indeed, soon after the first appropriation of $500,000 for this purpose, so many were the doubts expressed and so meager the information had in reference to the number and location of these Indians that the Secretary of the Interior found it necessary to appoint a commission, consisting of Hon. B. R. Cowan, N. J. Turney, and J. W. Wham, to make a thorough investigation into the facts of the case.

The result of this investigation is fully set forth in a report of that commission, which was on the 10th day of December, 1873, laid before this House, and a copy of which I have before me. From this report it appears that the commission visited the very spot where it was supposed these Indians could be found, and after long-continued and diligent search succeeded in finding only about twenty-eight hundred and thirty-three of the Indians in question; two-thirds of whom, they say, were children under fourteen years of age. And just what means they had of knowing that even these were hostile Tetons rather than Indians being supported by the Government at other surrounding agencies they do not state. It is true they report that they could hear from others of various other hostile bands, headed by warlike chiefs, whom they supposed to belong to the Teton tribe, but about these they profess to have no personal knowledge and are able to give no positive information.

And this, sir, is the extent of the information which we have as to the number and location of this powerful and warlike tribe upon whom we are yearly expending such vast sums of money.

This commission, however, further report, that notwithstanding the hostile and warlike character of these Indians, they were nevertheless able to mingle freely with them for more than two weeks without fear of molestation, and upon their return succeeded in inducing a delegation to come with them upon a visit to Washington.

And by reference to a statement of disbursements for the benefit of the Tetons, which was laid before us simultaneously with the report of said commission, I find that there was expended upon this delegation during their stay in this city the startling sum of $24,000. This looks like an enormous expenditure for the entertainment of a small delegation of Indians for a brief period; but it seems to have been the custom of the Indian Bureau for the last few years to expend money as lavishly as possible upon these savage delegations, by the purchase of everything which it is supposed will be either pleasing to their eyes or pleasant to their taste. And that the members of this House and the people of the country generally may have some idea of the hospitalities extended to these delegations during their visits to the capital, I desire just here to refer briefly to some bills of expenditure of recent date for the benefit of Indian delegations visiting Washington, to which my attention was incidentally called a few days since.

Among other items contained in these bills were hair-brushes, at four dollars each; and yet every gentleman on this floor knows that a ten-cent strand of beads would have been to the Indians far more acceptable. Another item was nail-brushes, at one dollar each; whereas we all know that a brass ring worth five cents would have been regarded by the Indians as a treasure of far greater value. There was also charged cakes of toilet soap, at fifty cents each; the like of which doubtless many of our own constituents have never yet enjoyed the luxury of using. Then, again, I saw on the same bills boxes of cigars, at eight dollars each; when a common clay pipe and a handful of ordinary tobacco, at a cost of fifty cents, would have been all that the Indians desired. And still another item, more remarkable than all the rest, were bottles of champagne wine, at four dollars each; when everybody knows that a drink of rifle-whisky, which could be bought at thirty cents per gallon after having paid a revenue tax of seventy cents to the Government, would have been equally palatable to the Indian and have tended quite as much to his civilization.

There are a number of other interesting items charged upon these bills to which, if I had time, allusion might be made, but those to which I have referred sufficiently illustrate the purposes for which the money of the people is expended on these uncivilized delegations when they visit the capital of the country.

I have not had an opportunity of seeing the bill of expenditures incurred for the benefit of the Teton delegation heretofore referred to, but, judging from the amount expended for that purpose, I imagine they must during their sojourn at the capital have been entertained in most princely and magnificent style; and if their comrades in their far-off western homes have been treated as hospitably and fared as sumptuously as the delegation which visited Washington seem to have done, I do not wonder that all is peace and quiet within the camps of the hostile Tetons and that the agent who has them in charge is able to write letters of congratulation over the success which has thus far attended the peace policy.

Mr. Chairman, the management and control of the Indian question is, under the operation of this so-called peace policy, intrusted to so many different persons that it is difficult to tell where the responsibility rests for what has been done or for what there has been a failure to do. Here we have the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the board of Indian commissioners, and the various religious denominations of the country all exercising a greater or less control over this subject, and this being so, it is no wonder that there should be a want of harmony in opinion, a lack of unity of purpose, and a want of concert in action, and that we should have laid before us conflicting statements and contradictory reports in regard to the various matters connected with this service.

Sir, notwithstanding all that has been said in reference to the gratifying success which has attended this policy, its results may be fairly summed up as follows:

It has succeeded in spending nearly twice as much of the public money as was ever before expended in an equal number of years under any former administration.

It has succeeded in violating laws, the provisions of which are positive and peremptory, and the meaning of which is plain and unmistakable.

It has succeeded in laying before us conflicting opinions as to the propriety of disbursements made, and contradictory accounts of the causes which render necessary large appropriations of money.

And finally, it has succeeded in so dividing the responsibility for its management among a multitude of persons that it is impossible to tell who is at fault for any blunder that may have been committed or any wrong that may have been perpetrated.

Sir, this condition of affairs unquestionably calls for a remedy of some kind, but exactly what is best to be done it is difficult to determine.

There is, I understand, a bill pending before this House by which it is proposed to transfer the entire management and control of this much-vexed question to the War Department, where it was in the earlier days of our history, and where it is believed the Indian question was managed far better than now.

This, though possibly not the very best that could be done, would unquestionably be an improvement upon the present system.

The Secretary of War, with nothing but an Army of less than twenty-five thousand men to occupy his attention, and that too under the command of experienced officers, could well afford to devote a good portion of his time to the Indian question; while the Secretary of the Interior, having under his charge the Land Office, Patent Office, Pension Office, and Bureau of Education, necessarily finds himself so occupied with other matters that it is utterly impossible, in the very nature of things, for him to exercise much care or supervision over Indian affairs.

And then the places of the Indian agents and superintendents, whom we are now paying over $100,000 annually, might be better filled by the detail of competent officers and soldiers of the Army, who now loiter idly around their camps without anything even to occupy their attention.

Besides, sir, it is well known that these agents and superintendents, upon whose capability and fidelity so much depends in the administration of Indian affairs, are under the present system appointed on account of political service or party fealty, rather than their qualifications and personal integrity, so that, even when they are inclined to be honest, they hold their places by such an uncertain tenure that they are frequently removed before they become fairly acquainted with the duties they are required to perform; while, on the other hand, the officers of the Army, selected on account of their acknowledged merit, are, as a class, at least men of unquestioned integrity, holding their offices during good behavior, and therefore independent of any turn political events may take; and, once acquainted with the duties and necessities of the Indian service, they could manage it more efficiently, and certainly more honestly, than under the present system.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHANKS. It would always be much better, I have no doubt, if we could have matters as we want them and not be compelled to take them as we find them. I have no doubt I could find fault with the Christian religion; perhaps I could give some good reason why somebody else should be regarded as not having done exactly as he should have done. But in doing that I might do very great injustice to some who have done as well as they could. I think it is the duty of a statesman when he finds fault with the management of a government, after the declaration of fault, to lay down some plan by which it might be bettered. If that is not the purpose of finding fault, then indeed it would be as well that fault was not found at all.

These people known as the Indians once occupied this whole continent, and at that time they were as proud of their position as we are to-day of ours. In December, 1492, they received their first instructions from the white man that their time had come. And we are told to-day by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] that for three hundred years we have been grating against these people. He might have gone on and said that during those three hundred years we have ruthlessly, and in a spirit showing the want of Christian forbearance, sacrificed them until millions of them have gone the way of all the earth, and but two hundred and fifty thousand are left for this Congress to quarrel over within the territory now occupied and held by the American people.

I was a little surprised to hear the gentleman from New York assume the position he did, that these people could not be civilized and that they could not be christianized. I do not know why he took either position. So far as civilization is concerned, there are to-day ninety-seven thousand of these people quite as well civilized as are thousands and thousands who live in the city where he has the honor to reside and where he once had the honor to preside. There are ninety-seven thousand of these people who to-day worship the same God that you do, and with perhaps quite as much zeal as does the gentleman from New York, who bids defiance to the salvation offered by the Son of God to all men.

He tells us that they cannot be civilized! Why, sir, these men are civilized; ninety-seven thousand of them are quite as civilized as we are, some of them quite as intelligent. He may go to the Indian Territory and he will find men there speaking the Greek language, the Latin language, the Choctaw, the Chickasaw, and the English; and he cannot do anything of that kind. I think it is unkind for men to assume this position in relation to any other people on earth. I say this for the purpose of calling attention to a fact which I desire now to state, that if it were not for the national prejudice against these people we would have no trouble in settling this matter, and the Indian would have no trouble in raising himself to manhood side by side with you and me.

I tell you that to-day if it was not for the encroachment of white men, commencing with the day that Columbus landed on the island of Hispaniola, and which to-day at sundown will be persecuted with the same zeal for the purpose of taking from these people what they have—if it was not for that, this people would be with you and I, citizens of a common country, as is another class of people who not fifteen years ago we were told in this same Hall were not competent to attend to their own affairs. Yet to-day they have their savings-banks and institutions; to-day they stand on this floor and speak as well as you and I, and a great deal better than you and I—that is, better than I. I beg pardon of the Chair, [Mr. POLAND;] I forgot who was in the chair.

We were told by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] (and I take this view of it because I want to draw attention to that particular point) that some time ago $2,000,000 were appropriated and placed in the hands of the President of the United States to manage matters with the Indians. He closed by averring that under that administration—you will recollect it was managed then by the officers of the Army—the Indian question was managed better than at any other time.

But another Kentuckian [Mr. ADAMS] rose and told you (and told you very truthfully, too) that the details of the management of that $2,000,000 were as yet unknown to this country, and the report did not tell us what had become of it. That is the condition of opinion of the two gentlemen from Kentucky; and I leave the account with them, only saying that the gentleman who last spoke [Mr. ADAMS] stated the facts about that case. That money was wasted. I tell you, sir, to-day that the management of this Indian question by the Army has been the most expensive management known at any time to this country.

It is said that the Indians ought to be turned over to the War Department. But it has been said also that they cannot be christianized or civilized. If that be true, then they ought to be turned over to the War Department, and they ought to be executed at the earliest possible moment. But I do not believe that they cannot be christianized; I do not believe that they cannot be civilized. I believe from past experience that both can be effected, and that very rapidly.

Instead of turning them over to the War Department, I insist that they ought to be kept under the peace department. I ask the enemies of the peace department to say where in the United States to-day is there an Indian arrayed in hostility against the Government? And I ask another question—when at any time within the last three hundred years, before this peace policy was adopted, have we been able to say the same thing?

The peace policy has brought into the field a class of men whose integrity we cannot doubt. That there are some lingering errors connected with the management of Indian affairs is true. That these errors were very great a short time ago is also true. I might suggest perhaps where some of these errors now lie. But the peace policy, so far as I understand it, has in it every virtue that human nature can bring into it. The peace policy brings into the management of Indian affairs a class of men who are to be indorsed by the churches of the country; so that each respective church stands before the world morally responsible for every man whom it decides should be intrusted with the management of Indian affairs. If any more sacred position can be taken by men, I do not know what it is. If there is anything in Christianity, if it is important that the Indian should understand Christianity, it is certainly important that Christians should be selected to manage his affairs and teach him Christianity.

But, Mr. Chairman, turning the Indians over to the War Department is bad for another reason. The Army cannot possibly teach men all that is necessary or anything that is necessary for an establishment of peace. Why, sir, the War Department is the very opposite of peace. In the name of God, what do we want with the War Department if we have peace? We want a War Department to prevent violations of law—to sustain the Government in its hour of trial when there is no peace. We do not want war in time of peace; and we cannot educate men to the pursuits of peace by educating them to war. Why, sir, we send men to West Point, not to educate them for the church or the pulpit, not to educate them for the plow, not to teach them how to manage stock upon a farm—the things the Indians may be taught. We send them there to learn how to kill men in the quickest and most approved style. That is what you send men to West Point to be educated for; and when you put the Indians under the War Department you put them in the hands of those who I do not say are bad men, but who are trained to a particular pursuit and that pursuit the very thing we do not want to teach the Indians—war. Why, sir, it is not proper to bring before the Indian the fact that he himself may take hold of the weapons of war. You want to teach him peace and the arts of peace. You want him to engage in agriculture and other peaceful pursuits.

Now, I want to call attention to a few things that have been said in this debate. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] was very anxious to say that I had made a report in which I brought forward a statement made by an Indian—Joseph, of the Willowa Valley. I am glad the gentleman made that allusion, because I want to place on record a statement made by that man, for of all the men whom I have met, white, black, or red, I never saw one who impressed me with having a better view on the subject in question. Joseph, of the Willowa Valley is not a Christian gentleman; he was never taught Christianity. I asked him, however, in council whether he desired to have schools on his reservation. He answered me, "No." I asked him why. He said, "If we have schools on the reservation they will teach us to have churches." He said that with a solemnity that I have never myself learned in my Quaker training. I then asked, "Why do you not want churches?" His answer was: "They will teach us to quarrel about God." If an expression more valuable than this ever passed the lips of man I would like to know what it is. What is the sequel of that? Why, sir, there is a contest to-day upon the Nez Percé reservation between the Catholic and Protestant churches as to which shall have priority; and each professes to teach to the Indian God according to their views.

Now, sir, from the time Columbus discovered America these people have never had justice done to them. They would have learned the Christian religion if you had not burned them at the stake because they were not willing to be slaves. They would have learned the Christian religion if you had not quarreled about God. They would have learned the truth if you had not quarreled continually about what the truth really was.

We are told with majestic eloquence and with much sympathy, as it were, that it has cost us a great deal of money to manage the matter. Now, here is a continent. It was theirs. Now the continent is ours. They have a few acres left which we are told to-day they hold, not of the original right which God gave them, but which they hold, at our will. They hold by right of occupancy—an occupancy they hold of right as you to-day have the right to hold of God.

With that understanding, we are still told it costs something to take care of these Indians. What has it cost them? It has cost the sacrifice of race. It has cost the right to all their lands. It has cost them the only hope they ever had of making themselves among men a race and a power. They are to-day nothing, and we are everything. Yet, sir, we are quarreling about paying the little balance we owe them for lands we have taken from them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in estimating this cost we do not stop to think that this whole continent is ours. We do not stop to think we have acquired it piece after piece, section after section, State after State, and promised to pay the Indians for it, and then passed laws, which are upon our statute-books, where they have stood from 1802 to 1872, in which we have promised to, and did, pay every fellow who would come and make his claim against them out of their moneys all he and his associates demanded, until we have robbed them of nearly all the money arising from the sale of their lands and leave them to-day paupers. Half the legislation we have enacted since I have been connected with the Indian Committee has been to provide homes for poor, helpless tribes that have been plundered of the proceeds of the lands they sold to us, until to-day they are helpless before their enemies, starving for bread and asking Congress to give them aid, and yet Congress quarrels about their management without laying down any remedy, and finds fault without even so much as giving them an opportunity to believe in the same God we do.

Now, I know it is a common saying among men if a man speaks for the Indians he must necessarily be a fanatic. I am willing to be such a fanatic, and I wish to the Almighty God there were two hundred and ninety-one fanatics on this floor who had integrity and virtue enough to stand by our treaties and to the contracts made with the Indians, and give them back the value of that which you took from them by force. I say two hundred and ninety-one; because that is all there is of us, excepting these territorial representatives, and you do not let them vote.

I have not time to take up fully this Indian subject. I am only talking a little for the sake of God and humanity. I wish I had time to take it up in all its branches and demonstrate to the House what there is in it. If you viewed it, Mr. Chairman, (Mr. POLAND in the chair,) as I do, after carefully studying it, you would be their advocate against their cruel foes until your hair is grayer than it is to-day. Gray hairs, I know, are venerable, and I know the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] would do the fullest justice to these poor, hunted, helpless children of the forests and plains.

They tell us these expenses are very great. Let us look at it. There are two hundred and seventy thousand Indians. They cost this year something like $4,000,000, and a large portion of that is for interest on the money we owe them. You have an Army of the United States of only twenty-five thousand men for which you are appropriating $28,000,000 a year. Last year the appropriation for the Indians was $6,000,000, while the appropriation for the Army was over $34,000,000. Thirty-four million dollars for taking care of about thirty thousand men; and yet here are two hundred and seventy thousand Indians for whom we appropriate only $4,000,000, about which there is so much complaint! Notwithstanding all the benefits you have obtained from the Indians, notwithstanding you have taken from them this entire continent, yet you come and complain about paying them the small pittance of less than one-fourth of the amount it takes to keep up your Army of twenty-five thousand men. I think this rather cold charity for these people. I wish to say simply, I hope and trust those who hereafter utter complaint about the Indian appropriation bill will be kind enough to give us some better mode of managing Indian Affairs. Let those who propose to put the care of the Indians under the Army show some good plan by which they can be better managed under the War Department than now; how they can be better civilized under that mode of treatment than has heretofore been possible.

I wish to say one word more. The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK,] for whom I have a very high regard, stated that wrongs had been done by the Indians to the people of Texas, and he wished to place the Indians in the hands of the War Department on that account. Now, I wish to call attention to this fact, that a grand jury of the United States court in Texas found that it was the Mexicans who committed those offenses to which the gentleman has referred, all along the southern border of Texas. General Sheridan, in testifying before the Committee on Indian Affairs, stated in effect that the depredations in Texas by Indians on the other frontier were incited and encouraged by white men, who induced them to steal cattle for a paltry consideration to the Indians, and then sold them to the Government. The testimony went to show that these depredations in the State of Texas were due on the north to white men, and on the south to Mexicans. General Sheridan had to defend a suit for over $40,000, brought against him by these dishonest white men, and only escaped judgment by proving that these same white men induced the Indians to steal the cattle which Sheridan had seized. This, therefore, was no original violation of law by Indians, and there is no reason why the administration of Indian affairs should be placed in the hands of the War Department. But on that account it is a reason why some steps should be taken to protect Indians against bad white men.

Mr. HANCOCK. I wish to correct the gentleman's statement. That was a thousand miles away from the Fort Sill reservation, being on the Lower Rio Grande.

Mr. SHANKS. It was at Brownsville, Texas, in the court for the southern district.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. As we are to have by order of the House a session to-night, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us first read a paragraph or two of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, and read as follows:

That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes.

For pay of one superintendent of Indian affairs for the central superintendency, $2,500.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out lines 8 and 9, as follows: "For pay of one superintendent of Indian affairs for the central superintendency, $2,500," and insert in lieu thereof, "for pay of two superintendents of Indian affairs for the central and northern superintendencies, $2,000 each, $4,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For pay of sixty-five agents of Indian affairs, at $1,500 each, except the one at Iowa, namely:

Six for the tribes in Oregon, namely, Warm Springs, Klamath, Grand Ronde, Siletz, Umatilla, and Malheur agencies;

Three for the tribes in Washington Territory, namely, Neah Bay, Yakama, and S'Kokomish agencies;

Three for the tribes in California, namely, Hoopa Valley, Round Valley, and Tule River agencies;

Two for the tribes in Nevada, namely, Pi-Ute and Walker River, and Pyramid Lake agencies;

Two for the tribes in Idaho, namely, Nez Percé and Fort Hall agencies;

Four for the tribes in Montana, namely, Flathead, Blackfeet, Crow, and Milk River or Fort Peck agencies;

Ten for the tribes in Dakota, namely, Red Cloud, Whetstone, Yankton, Ponca, Upper Missouri, Grand River, Cheyenne River, Fort Berthold, Sisseton, and Devil's Lake agencies;

One for the tribes in Wyoming, namely, Shoshone and Bannack agencies;

One for the tribes in Utah, namely, Uintah Valley agency;

Four for the tribes in New Mexico, namely, Abiquiu, Navajo, Mescalero Apache, and Southern Apache agencies;

Two for the tribes in Colorado, namely, Los Piños and White River agencies;

Six for the tribes in Nebraska, namely, Great Nemaha, Omaha, Winnebago, Pawnee, Otoe, and Santee agencies;

One for the tribes in Kansas;

Seven for the tribes in the Indian Territory, namely, Kaw or Kansas, Sac and Fox, Quapaw, Neosho, Kiowa and Comanche, Upper Arkansas, and Wichita agencies; and the superintendent of the central superintendency shall perform the duties of agent for the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws and Chickasaws, and Seminoles;

One for the tribes in Minnesota, namely, at the Chippewa agency;

One for the tribes in Iowa, namely, at the Sac and Fox of Iowa agency, $500;

Two for the tribes in Wisconsin, namely, at the Green Bay and La Pointe agencies;

One for the tribes in Michigan, namely at the Mackinac agency;

One for the New York Indians, namely, at the New York agency;

Seven for the tribes in Arizona, namely, Colorado River, Papago, Pima and Maricopa, Chiricahui, San Carlos, Camp Apache, and Moquis Pueblo agencies, in all $36,500: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the President to dispense with the services of such Indian agents herein mentioned as may be practicable; and where it is practicable he shall require the same person to perform the duties of two agencies for one salary.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 10 strike out "sixty-five" and insert "sixty-seven;" so it will read, "for pay of sixty-seven agents of Indian affairs."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I desire to know from the gentleman who has this bill in charge what reason there is for increasing the number of Indian agents? I wish to ask him also this question: whether any report has been made by the President, or by his authority, as to the disposition of the money he was authorized to divert or pay out to farmers, mechanics, &c? By the law passed last year he was required to make a report to Congress of what he had done with it, and I wish to know if any report of that sort has been made.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I think there is a decrease in the number of agents from what it was last year.

Mr. BECK. How many had you last year?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I find that the number last year was seventy-three. We have increased in some places and decreased in others, but there is a decrease in the entire number.

With reference to the other question which the gentleman propounded in regard to the employés at these agencies, I desire to call his attention to section 4 of this bill, which limits the amount to be paid to these employés.

Mr. BECK. We made a provision last session of Congress that whenever there were a number of useless employés provided, as was admitted to be the case, because the Indians in many cases were not in a condition to receive them, the President might apply the money for the benefit of the Indians in other ways, and report to Congress. I have not the act in my hand at this moment or I would read it. I wish to know if a report of that has been made. If it has been I have not seen it.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. We have the report, but it has not been printed.

I will say to the gentleman that we have a provision in this bill which, I think, will save about $250,000 in the pay of these employés to the Government.

I now move to amend in line 34, by striking out "four" and inserting in lieu thereof "five;" so that it will read:

Five for the tribes in New Mexico, namely, Abiquiu, Navajo, Mescalero, Apache, and Southern Apache agencies.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move further to amend that paragraph by inserting after the word "namely" the word "Pueblo."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move further to amend by striking out, on page 3 of the bill, after the word "and" in line 43, down to and including the word "agent" in line 45, as follows: "the superintendent of the central superintendency shall perform the duties of agent," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "one;" so that it will read:

Seven for the tribes in the Indian Territory, namely, Kaw or Kansas, Sac and Fox, Quapaw, Neosho, Kiowa and Comanche, Upper Arkansas, and Wichita agencies; and one for the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws and Chickasaws, and Seminoles.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend in the same paragraph, in line 41, by striking out "seven," and inserting in lieu thereof "eight."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend by inserting after the word "Kansas" the word "Kickapoo."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I now move that the committee rise.

Mr. SHANKS. Before that motion is put, I have an amendment which I desire to offer to the seventeenth line.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The gentleman can do that this evening; he had better let us rise now.

Mr. SHANKS. Very well.

Mr. BECK. Allow me one moment. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to a provision of law about which I desire to ask him, and I do it now so that he may be able to look it up before the session of this evening. It is a provision of the act of February 14, 1873, and is as follows:

Provided, That the several appropriations herein made for teachers, millers, blacksmiths, engineers, carpenters, physicians, and other persons, and for various articles provided for by treaty stipulation, may be diverted to other uses for the benefit of the various Indian tribes, within the discretion of the President, and with the consent of said tribes expressed in the usual manner; and that he cause report to be made to Congress, at its next session thereafter, of his action under this provision.

I would inquire if any thing has been done under that provision? The gentleman can answer me after the recess.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POLAND reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that for the session of this evening on the Indian appropriation bill less than a quorum in Committee of the Whole may be authorized to proceed with the consideration of the bill and to act upon it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope that proposition will be acceded to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will state that a sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations have worked very faithfully upon the bill and understand it thoroughly; and I have no doubt the public interest will be promoted by the agreement I suggest.

Mr. BECK. I object.

Mr. MAYNARD. O, I hope the gentleman will not insist on that objection.

Mr. BECK. I insist on a quorum being present.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 259) for the relief of James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, in the State of New York;

An act (H. R. No. 497) granting a pension to William Hafford, of South Yarmouth, Massachusetts;

An act (H. R. No. 814) granting a pension to Olive S. Breed;

An act (H. R. No. 816) granting a pension to Jane La Font;

An act (H. R. No. 1364) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855;

An act (H. R. No. 1396) granting a pension to Thomas J. McIntire, of Rowan County, Kentucky;

An act (H. R. No. 1951) granting a pension to Isaac M. Grant;

An act (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River;"

An act (H. R. No. 1562) for the relief of Jacob Parmerter, reimbursing him for defending a suit brought against him for an official act;

An act (H. R. No. 1230) granting a pension to Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minors of Joseph F. Doak, deceased;

An act (H. R. No. 2096) granting a pension to James Roach; and

An act (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Eliza A. Maxham;

It further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 320) fixing the number of paymasters in the Army of the United States;

An act (S. No. 457) to declare the true intent and meaning of a certian portion of the treaty with the Sioux Indians concluded April 29, 1868;

An act (S. No. 503) for the relief of Susan R. Moore, a relative and legatee of Phœbe Sofield, a pensioner;
An act (S. No. 595) for the relief of Benjamin Cooley and James W. Boswell;
An act (S. No. 596) for the relief of H. W. Read;
An act (S. No. 597) for the relief of William A. Griffin;
An act (S. No. 609) granting a pension to Margaret A. Hoffner;
An act (S. No. 613) granting a pension to Jefferson A. French; and
An act (S. No. 614) to provide for the removal of the wreck of the ship Patrician, near the entrance of the harbor of San Francisco, California.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:
An act (S. No. 350) providing for the payment of the bonds of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. CHIPMAN, by unanimous consent, from the Select Committee on the Washington Monument, submitted a report in writing; which was recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

UTAH CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. HARRISON, by unanimous consent, presented the views of the minority in the contested-election case from the Territory of Utah, Maxwell vs. Cannon; and the same was ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. PELHAM, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of E. F. M. Faehtz and F. W. Pratt, and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to give notice that if necessary I shall call for a quorum this evening in the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. STEELE. I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment which I shall offer to the Indian appropriation bill when in order. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I again ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be permitted to proceed this evening in the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill without a quorum, provided there should not be a quorum here.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. BECK. I insist on my objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I insist on the motion that the House now take a recess.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I shall insist on a call of the House if there is no quorum here.

The motion of Mr. GARFIELD was agreed to, and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. LOUGHRIDGE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. SHANKS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the pending appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. POLAND in the chair) on the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I move to strike out the eighth and ninth lines of the printed bill as amended.

The clause was as follows:

For pay of two superintendents of Indian affairs for the central and northern superintendencies, $2,000 each, $4,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I would ask my colleague what is his object in making that motion?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. My object is this: there is no more necessity for these superintendents of Indian affairs than there is for five wheels to a wagon. We formerly had eight of them, then we reduced them to one, and the committee has now amended the bill so as to provide for two. We provide for sixty-five agents, and they can report directly to headquarters here, to the Interior Department, instead of reporting to these superintendents. These superintendents are useless. The service has been much better performed since the eight we formerly had were taken away entirely. There is no necessity for a superintendent. My amendment is in the interest of economy, about which we all clamor so much, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. What is the business of those superintendents?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Nothing in the world. If an agent is stationed a thousand miles east of a superintendency and he wants to send a letter to Washington, he must send it through the superintendent.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I did not suppose that the gentleman was sincere in his motion to strike out, and I thought he certainly would not insist upon it, for if adopted it would derange all this part of the Indian service. It is important that these superintendents shall be retained, shall be in the Indian Territory. The Department is proceeding upon the idea of getting all the Indians into the Indian Territory; and every year additional Indians come into the Territory. We had formerly six superintendents; we have been cutting them down gradually, and have now cut off all but these two. The Friends in this country, at the request of the President, went into the business of endeavoring to instruct the Indians; they were the first who went into it; they went into it with a great deal of determination and industry. That society has spent over $100,000 of its own means in this business. Men who are wealthy left their homes in Philadelphia and in other parts of the country and went down there at their own expense and spent weeks and weeks in the Indian Territory looking after these Indians. When the Friends took charge of this business it was the understanding that they should have this superintendent. It was the understanding of the Quakers who took charge in Nebraska that they would have the superintendent there. The committee looked over all this question and carefully through all this bill. I think there is nothing in the bill which should not be there, and nothing there which can be dispensed with.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Will the gentleman be kind enough to specify any duties which these superintendents have to discharge?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. They have the entire charge of going over the Territory and looking after the interests of these Indians. It takes Mr. Hoag most of his time to do so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. What duties do the agents perform?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. They look after the tribes of which they are agents. The superintendent has charge of the whole field. Why do we have a general in the Army, and a colonel under him, and a captain under the colonel? Why not have the captain do all the work?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. They do do all the work.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Why not let the captains report to the general?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. This is not an army.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The superintendent has charge of the whole field. I say what I know, that there is not a better man or a more devoted man in the United States than Mr. Hoag, and he spends all his time in this work. Adopt this amendment and you will break down the service in that country. I know the party in whose interest this amendment is offered, and it is not for the good of the service.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I do not know anything about interested parties, but I know that there were formerly eight or nine of these superintendents.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I move to strike out the last word, and yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. We formerly had eight of these superintendents. The number was curtailed, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] has told you, until the committee brought in a bill for but one. The service was done better after the number was curtailed than before. They had nothing to do but to stay at one point and forward communications from sixty-five agents to whom we pay over $90,000 annually, the agents discharging all the duties and performing all the work. This is a sort of appendage that performs no service, and is as useless to the system as a fifth wheel would be to a wagon.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I most heartily support the motion to strike out the eighth and ninth lines of this paragraph. I say distinctly, from some knowledge of the relations of these Indians and this superintendent, that he is simply a fifth wheel to the coach—nothing more nor less. Those agents do business directly with the Indian Department; and when I asked the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] to specify particularly what duties the superintendent of Indian affairs for the central superintendency or the northern superintendency has to perform, he said in general terms that he has to supervise the agents. Now, sir, the agents give their bond directly to the Government; they transact their business directly with the Indian Bureau and not through the superintendent. The simple fact is, that if the Government has any business to transact with a tribe through the agent, the superintendent comes in as a clog instead of an assistance in the transaction of such business. For instance, let any question spring up in relation to the Indian lands in Kansas; the question will be referred to the superintendent, and he will refer it again to the agent. Whatever report comes here relative to those lands is the report of the Indian agent, that report being delayed, probably, for two or three weeks by reason of the fact that a third party, who gets his information from the agent, and nowhere else, has to be consulted.

I unite with the gentleman from Iowa in stating that Mr. Hoag is a most excellent man; so are the Quakers most excellent citizens; but I know no reason why any society of men should claim to hold an office which is of no benefit to the Government.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. If the society of Quakers in the United States come forward and pay out of their own pockets $100,000, and agree with the Government to take charge of those wild Indians on the condition that they shall have the superintendencies, and if representatives of that society are appointed to those positions, is it manly, is it honorable, is it just for the Government to turn round and kick out those superintendents?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Not if the officers are a necessity to the Government; but if they are not necessary for the interest of the Government, and the Quakers ask for that which is not a necessity, I say I would kick a Quaker out of an office that was not necessary as quickly as I would kick out any other man.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. One other question. Under the gentleman's view, what becomes of the $100,000 that this society gives? Would we make anything by turning out those superintendents and driving the Quakers out of this service?

Mr. COBURN. Do they give the money on that condition?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Yes, sir; they took hold of the Indian service on that condition; they had an understanding of that kind with the Government.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I am looking merely at the question of the necessity for these officials.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. We would lose in dollars and cents by doing what the gentleman advocates.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I do not desire to maintain the position that this superintendent should be retained in the service because he is a Quaker, although I have the warmest feelings toward that class of people on account of their opinions on this Indian question. I go upon the higher ground of the necessity of this superintendent. I do not believe that he is necessary as the superintendent for any of the more civilized tribes in the Indian Territory, such as the Cherokees, Choctaws, Seminoles, Creeks, and a few others that might be mentioned. But west of these tribes in that Territory there are to-day over 12,000 Indians——

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Then why not transfer the superintendency from the civilized community out among those tribes where it ought to be?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I think it best that the headquarters should be where they are now. But I was going on to give my reasons for the belief that a superintendent is necessary there. There are two or three prominent points where the Indians who have been recently warlike and savage in their disposition toward the whites are now concentrated. The western part of the Indian Territory is one of those points. Over twelve thousand Indians, consisting of bands of Cheyennes and Arapahoes and a few Apaches, the Kiowas and Comanches, and a lot of other consolidated tribes, are all there under the management of this superintendency. Their condition is to a certain extent civilized, compared with what it was two or three years ago; and this has been brought about in a large degree under the management of this superintendent. I believe that it is necessary, so far as those wild Indians are concerned, that this superintendency should be continued for the present. I desire to join with my colleague on the committee [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] in saying that the Society of Friends are to-day contributing fully as much by their money and their personal exertions toward the civilization of these wild Indians as the Government is. This superintendent is a most excellent man; everybody agrees on that. The committee were as desirous as anybody else to dispense with these superintendents wherever it may be possible. But we do not believe the good of the service will at present permit the discontinuance of this superintendency. We believe that these twelve thousand Indians, made up of consolidated tribes in the western part of that Territory, should be cared for. The testimony taken before our committee goes to show that there is no necessity for a military officer or a soldier in all that country. The only necessity for the military is upon the southern border of that country, where a line of military posts should be established to keep the wild young men from raiding upon the people of Texas.

These people say to their superintendent and agents they can manage all these twelve hundred recently wild and savage Indians without the aid of the military. All they ask is the military shall aid them on the southern line of the country in keeping the people back from going into Texas.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Let me ask a question. I understood the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER,] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] who has the bill in charge, to say that somebody gives $100,000 to the Government. If that be so, why do they not pay these agents? These agents, I am lead to believe from this discussion, are furnished at the request of these people.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. These Quakers gave this sum of money, with the understanding that when they went into the service they should have the right to appoint these Indian agents. Now, to turn round and put them out, after this agreement has been entered into, of course they would lose all further interest in the matter.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Let me see what is the position occupied by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] and the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.] This bill provides for seven agents, at a salary of $1,500 each, for the tribes in the Indian Territory, namely: Kaw or Kansas, Sac and Fox, Quapaw, Neosho, Kiowa and Comanche, Upper Arkansas and Witchita Indians. They are the very bands of Indians these gentlemen say these agents are not necessary for. They are to have agents at a salary of $1,500 each. The bill then goes on and provides further for one superintendent for the central superintendency, who shall do the duties of the same for what? For the wild and uncivilized? No, sir; but that the superintendent of the central superintendency shall perform the duties of agent for the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, and Seminoles, the very Indians who do not require an agent; and the very tribes the gentlemen say this man ought to superintend are given to agents, and this superintendent is put over the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, and Seminoles.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The gentleman is mistaken. The bill has been amended, and he may not have been in when it was done to-day. The superintendent has no jurisdiction over these civilized tribes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Has he over these others?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. What others?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Those not civilized.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Not over the five tribes the gentleman has indicated.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. We have seven agents over them, and we make only one agent for seven civilized tribes.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, withdrew his motion.

Mr. SPEER. I renew it pro forma to make an inquiry of my distinguished friend from Iowa, who is in charge of the bill; and my inquiry, I will say, results from a little practical connection I have had with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. A former citizen of my county who removed to Missouri entered into some arrangement for the occupancy of real estate in the Indian Territory with the Indians, but subject, it seems, to this superintendent of Indian Affairs there. Difference of opinion, it appears, arose between the superintendent and citizen as to the time at which the lease for the real estate expired. The Indians themselves were satisfied with the view the citizen took of the lease and the time it had to run, but the superintendent interfered and said although the Indians themselves were satisfied, and although the citizen was satisfied, yet he for reasons of his own said the lease expired and must end. Application was made through myself and another member of the House to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for redress. The matter was submitted to Mr. Smith and by him referred to Superintendent Hoag, and by him referred to the agent in charge of the Indians immediately affected. The evidence was taken and reported by the Indian agent to the superintendent and by him reported to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

My inquiry is this, What are the specific duties under the law of the superintendent? Are his powers and duties defined by law or do they lie within the undefined limit of his discretion? The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is an officer known to the law. If he errs he is responsible—responsible to the law, responsible to his superior; but this intermediate grade of superintendent is an irresponsible, unrecognized office, the duties of which lie within the discretion of the person appointed superintendent. He is responsible to no defined law. He is accountable to no superior for errors of judgment, sometimes of a most aggravated character, inflicting most serious consequences and injury to the citizen. There seems to be no recognized legal redress. This case to which I refer, pending now, it seems to me is a practical illustration of the uselessness and dangerousness of this position or office of superintendent.

Who is he? What law authorizes his appointment? What law defines his duties? To whom beyond his own discretion is he responsible?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has asked me a question, and I desire to answer it. It is not the business of the Committee on Appropriations to pass laws to establish offices. These superintendencies have been established for fifteen or twenty years. It is an old office in the Indian service. They report, as I understand it, to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. They are appointed under an old law, passed in 1851.

I cannot undertake now and here to state all the duties of these superintendents. It is understood in the Department of the Indian service that they have certain defined duties and a certain defined jurisdiction. It is desired and recommended by the Secretary of the Interior that these officers shall be continued, and I presume the Secretary understands what officers are required in the organization of the Indian service.

Now let me say for the information of some gentlemen who may not fully understand this matter that there are in the Indian Territory about seventy-two thousand Indians. Sixty thousand of those, including the five tribes spoken of by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BUTLER,] are civilized. They do not really require an agent. Each of those five tribes up to the present time has had an agent. In this bill we strike off four of those agents and place the five tribes under one agent, thus saving four agents; because the agent there really has nothing to do but to receive the money from the Government and pay it to the tribe. The twelve thousand Indians outside of the civilized tribes in that Territory are wild Indians, Indians who have been on the war-path, Cheyennes and Arapahoes, who, as I stated yesterday, cost us in 1854, 1855, 1856, and 1857 sixty million dollars to fight them. The Comanches and Kiowas down on the borders of Texas, in this same territory, are also very wild Indians. They have been giving for years a great deal of trouble to the people of Texas. They have been continually on the war-path and continually over in Texas, stealing cattle there.

Now, the Quakers took control of these wild tribes, and these are all they ever had charge of; they took control of them in their wild condition and have succeeded admirably in their dealings with them; they are now all staying on their reservations. And it seems to me that now to come in here and disorganize this service, where these Quakers are doing so much good to the Indians, would be an unwise policy to adopt for the sake of saving a few hundred dollars of pay to a superintendent.

Let me say this to the committee: If this Congress sees fit to strike off this superintendent, this large body of people—and I do not speak of them as any better than other people, although it is well known that the Quakers are among the very best people in the country for work like this—would, I know, feel like giving up that service. And I ask the committee whether, for the sake of a few hundred dollars, we should permit them to give up so important a work?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BUTLER] to strike out lines 8 and 9 of the bill.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 21, noes 45.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is lost.

Mr. STORM. I call the attention of the Chairman to the fact that a quorum has not voted. I think we should not do business here without a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point that a quorum has not voted?

Mr. STORM. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman insists on it the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. STORM. I do not insist on it. But I think it is for the Chair to see that a quorum votes on a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman will raise no question of that sort.

Further count was not insisted on, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PURMAN. I offer the following amendment:

Between lines 46 and 47 insert "one for the tribe of Seminoles in Florida, $1,000."

I beg to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have in the State of Florida over three hundred Indians, the remnant of the original Seminole tribe. This fact seems to have been overlooked by the United States Government since the close of the Seminole Indian war, and I now desire to present their claims for consideration, that a channel of communication may be opened between this tribe and the Indian Department at Washington.

These Indians are a foreign body or nation in our State, having no connection or interest in common with our people. They roam over a most beautiful portion of country to the east and north of the everglades, but make their more permanent homes within the everglades, upon the most charming and prolific islands in the world.

Hardly any communication exists between these Indians and our people, and in this exclusiveness is found the cause of our long-continued harmony. This harmony will no doubt last forever, but it is not founded upon a sound basis. Relations of amity and friendship should be cultivated with them, and the benefits of civilization should be extended over them.

What is needed is more mutual confidence and communication upon the safe foundation of a mutual protection. We have no mode of adjudication between them and our citizens. There is no officer or agency who can take their complaints or necessities into consideration. They are not subject to our laws, and there are no mutual remedies for grievances, if any should ever arise between us.

Mr. CROUNSE. Why are they not subject to our laws?

Mr. PURMAN. They are not subject to our laws simply because the Indians in this country are regarded in the nature of a foreign nation, and have only treaty relations with the General Government.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Are they not made citizens under your laws?

Mr. PURMAN. We have opened the way to citizenship by the provisions of our State constitution to all classes of people within our limits, including Indians, but without first being taught the manners and customs of civilization it is not possible for these Indians to avail themselves of the political and civil blessings within their reach.

Now, the only way to reach these Indians is through an agency. They must be brought in contact with some agent of this paternal Government here in Washington; somebody in whom they can have confidence, some one who comes there authorized to treat with them, to consider their wants, and make known their necessities to the Federal Government. There is but one way in which this can be done, and that is through this agency.

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a communication which I addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and his answer thereto, upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1874.

SIR: I beg to call your attention and request your official co-operation in behalf of the interests of the remnant of the Seminole tribe of Indians, about three hundred and fifty in number, still remaining in the southern portion of the State of Florida. Judging by the history of the Indian wars in Florida, the immense expenditures, and the meager results obtained, these Indians will forever remain in our State, and their forcible dislodgment and emigration beyond the Mississippi will never again be attempted by the United States Government.

Their permanent continuance in our State is therefore a question of vital importance to us. They cannot, in safety to our great interests, continue as savages, and they must not, in defiance of these great interests and civilization. They are an independent people in our midst, bound by no tie of society to our population, by no moral or legal obligation to our government. As a foreign tribe or nation they have even no treaty connection with the United States Government. They are simply strangers and savages in our midst; and as long as they remain in this uncared-for character will be a foreign element of danger and destruction to the peace and welfare of our State. They are peaceable but exceedingly exclusive in their manners, hold as little intercourse with our citizens as possible, and live in all the primitive habits of their progenitors.

The State of Florida has not the power nor the means to extend her paternal and civilizing kindness and provision over these Indians, yet she has extended to them a tender of political privileges, and prepared the way for their civil and political identification with our inhabitants. But without preliminary expenditures of money for their civilization, education, and preparation for the duties of industry, Christianity, and citizenship, these neglected Indians can never avail themselves of the blessings extended to them by our very liberal and progressive State Constitution, vide article 16:

"SEC. 7. The tribe of Indians located in the southern portion of the State, and known as the Seminole Indians, shall be entitled to one member in each house of the Legislature. Such members shall be elected by the members of their tribe, in the manner prescribed for all elections by this constitution. The tribe shall be represented only by a member of the same, and in no case by a white man. * * *

"SEC. 8. The Legislature may at any time impose such tax on the Indians as it may deem proper; and such imposition of tax shall constitute the Indians citizens, and they shall thenceforward be entitled to all the privileges of other citizens," &c.

The State of Florida can do no more, not from want of inclination, but from lack of means. The paternal care and guardianship over these wild people, whose aboriginal race is nearly run, and whose only refuge is in civilization and in incorporation with the destiny of the predominant race, must come from the General Government and through the efficient administration of your Bureau. The very commendable policy of your Bureau is working wonders in the condition and hopes of the Indian tribes in the West, and the problem of the Indian's future I believe to be in the course of successful solution. I wish you God-speed in the noble achievement, and that the Indians in our State, who deserve well of the Government on account of their peacefulness, whose peace has never been purchased by annuities, and whose only request upon the Government has always been for simply the permission to remain among the hallowed graves of their fathers, may also be brought under the blessings of the new policy, I am constrained to indite this communication.

Be pleased to return me an immediate reply, favoring an appropriation of $5,000 by Congress for the establishment of an agency among these Indians, and for their education and general amelioration.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

W. J. PURMAN, M. C.,
From State of Florida at large.

Hon. E. P. SMITH,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to be in receipt of your communication of this date relative to the remnant of the Seminole tribe of Indians remaining in Florida, and suggesting that Congress be asked to make an appropriation of $5,000 for the establishment of an agency among them, and for their education and general amelioration.

In reply I would respectfully state that this office is in favor of an appropriation of the amount named for the purpose of ascertaining the condition and wants of the Indians referred to, and to render them such assistance as may be deemed advisable and necessary to advance them in civilization. The best interests both of the citizens of Florida and of the Indians, require that this remnant of the Seminole tribe receive care and attention at this juncture of their history.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDW. P. SMITH, Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM J. PURMAN,
House of Representatives.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I hardly think that these Indians ought to have an agent appointed. They are citizens of the United States and the State of Florida. Some of them are members of the State Legislature, and all are electors. It would seem to me very strange to appoint an agent for men who are electors and members of the Legislature. As, however, the amount asked for is only $1,500, I shall make no objection, although the cost of these agencies I fear will amount to fifteen or twenty thousand dollars before we get through the bill.

Mr. PURMAN. My motion only asks for $1,000.

The question was taken on Mr. PURMAN'S amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SHANKS. I desire to call attention to the fact that there is no provision in this bill for the Colville agency in Washington Territory. That is an agency now in existence in which the agent has charge of a number of tribes, the Methons, Lakes, Colvilles, San Pails, Lower Spokanes, and Okinakones. There is no estimate for that agency, and I ask the consent of the House that this portion of the bill be passed over until we can hear from the Department in relation to it. I was at the agency last summer, and I found that it was well conducted and that there was a school there.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have no objection to its being passed over.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I move to amend in line 46 by inserting at the end of the paragraph the words "and the duties to be performed by the agent of the Cherokees."

I suppose there will be no objection to that amendment. It is desirable from the fact that this agent is an Indian, and these Indians all prefer him. He is the only native agent, and they prefer him for that reason.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have no particular objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DANFORD. I move to strike out lines 49 and 50, as follows:

One for the tribes in Iowa, namely, at the Sac and Fox of Iowa agency, $500.

I offer that amendment in accordance with the recommendation of the superintendent of Indian affairs, and I will ask the Clerk to read that recommendation.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I think it rather ungenerous in the gentleman from Ohio to move to strike out that clause. This agency is in what was formerly my district, and it is all that my State has in this bill. It is only $500. I will simply say in addition that heretofore this agent has had $1,500, the same as all the other agents. It is not often that the gentleman in charge of a bill will strike down the salary of his own agency and allow the salaries of all the others to stand.

Mr. DANFORD. I ask the Clerk to read what the superintendent says about these Indians.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Sacs and Foxes are doing better than in any previous year. They have suffered severely in their farming interests by the drought the present season, although they had planted a larger area than usual. In imitation of their Creek neighbors, they are entering upon the raising of stock. The building for school purposes will soon be completed, and their children will then feel the benefit of the ample educational provision of their treaty.

A portion of the tribe, numbering six or eight lodges, became exiled from the tribe several years ago, and are now located in Tama County, Iowa. Since their location there some Pottawatomies, Winnebagoes, and dissolute citizens, have amalgamated with them until they number upward of three hundred. They have purchased about four hundred acres of land—the title vesting in the United States—on which a few of them raise some produce, but insufficient for their support. They subsist mainly as vagrant beggars, and would be amenable to State law on this account if they were citizens. The Government long ago established a wise provision that fragments of Indian tribes should forfeit their shares of annuities while absent from their proper reservations. An unfortunate exception was inserted in the Indian appropriation bill of 1868, by which these Iowa Sacs and Foxes are allowed to receive their proportion of annuities so long as they remain peaceable and have the consent of the State of Iowa to remain within its limits. This exceptional provision has been continued from year to year, and while the money thus withdrawn might have benefited them had they been with the tribe in the Territory, its effect in their present location has been to increase their habit of vagrancy. Believing that they will not improve under their present circumstances, I recommend the suspension by Congress of their annuities while off their reservation, and that they be removed, with another remnant of the tribe in Kansas, to their proper home in the Indian Territory. I believe also that the best interests of the Sacs and Foxes of the Missouri now in Nebraska would be promoted by a union with the tribe under consideration in this paragraph. The reservation is ample for all, as they would number in the aggregate less than one thousand, and the services of two agents could be dispensed with.

Mr. DANFORD. I must insist upon my amendment, for the benefit of the constituents of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] as well as for the benefit of the Indians themselves.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to substitute for the line proposed to be stricken out the following:

One for the tribes in Iowa, namely, at the Sac and Fox of Iowa agency, $1,200 to build a school-house: Provided, No salary be paid to the agent unless he lives near enough the agency to teach and care for the tribe every day.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I believe I am entitled to the floor. I made a mistake when I was up a few moments since. I do not know but I said these Indians were in my district. They are not in my district, but in the district of my colleague, [Mr. WILSON.] There are some very dissolute citizens up there, according to the report of the superintendent. I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] that I do think this is very ungenerous on his part. The State of Ohio has the whole Indian Department; there is not an inspector, a board of commissioners, or anything about the department that is not controlled by Ohio; they have all the patronage; and for a member from Ohio to get up here and object to $500 for the State of Iowa seems to me to be a little unjust.

Mr. FRYE. And not only that, but Ohio has the whole of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Yes; the whole of the Interior Department. I think this agency should be continued. These Indians are there; they have their land, and $5,000 coming to them, and this $500 will pay for an agency there.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If I can get the ear of the committee I will say something about this. And if I had any idea that the ears of the gentlemen composing this committee were half as long as I suppose the ears of the man who wrote that report to be, I would not say anything that would come so near home. The way in which these Indians have been treated by agents of this Government is simply shameless. The report made by this gentleman is nothing more nor less than a slander both on the Sac and Fox Indians and on the people who live in their vicinity. I can tell you all about how these Indians came to be there. They are the descendants of Black Hawk, Keokuk, and Powieshiek and the other Indians of whom the United States Government originally bought the territory embraced within the State of Iowa. The Government now owes these Indians for that purchase some $800,000, and those of them who are in Iowa and in the Indian Territory receive interest on that amount now.

At one time these Indians lived on a reservation in Kansas; but it was very unhealthy there and a great many of them died. Those of them who have wandered back to the old burial-ground of their fathers have absolutely refused to remove to the Indian Territory, where I understand they have a very fine reservation, where there is a school-house, and where they are being taught the arts of agriculture and civilization, and improved materially. But these Indians in Iowa, although they have been threatened by the Interior Department with the entire loss of their annuity if they would not remove, say that they prefer to die where they are. Since they have come back to Tama County they have increased in numbers instead of dying out. Every argument has been employed to induce them to go back to the Indian Territory. They say, however, that when they were on their reservation in Kansas their numbers decreased; they died out; but since they have come back to the State of Iowa they have increased in numbers.

Now the question for this House to determine is this: These Indians have been turned over to the Lutheran Church, which has appointed a commissioner for them, who lives in Ohio. The reason why he cannot succeed in evangelizing these Indians is, he says, because he has no school-house there and no facilities of any kind. He comes over once or twice a year and prays with these Indians. I have nothing to say against him. I presume he is a Christian gentleman. But I believe if he had a school-house about which he could form a nucleus where the Christian people of that county could gather, a great deal of money which is now sent by the people of my district to Egypt, Asia, and Africa to civilize the heathen there would be given to this agency.

As regards the dissolute people mingling with this tribe in my district, that is nothing more nor less than a slander. In fact the man who wrote that has talked about the matter at random.

Why, sir, within two miles of that agency there is a village called the City of Churches where there is a church belonging to each of the most prominent religious denominations of America. There is not a more intelligent, a more Christian, and more highly civilized people either in the West or in the East than right around that tribe of Indians. And, sir, that community consider it a shame and a disgrace that the American people should expend millions of dollars annually for the purpose of civilizing the Indians and yet do nothing for the children of the original owners of the soil of Iowa, who are right there in the midst of one million five hundred thousand people.

The object of my amendment is to compel this agent, who receives a salary of $1,800, to stay there and attend to his duties. There are plenty of Christian ministers who now labor with congregations the whole year around for $1,200, and who would work with those men as Dr. Livingstone worked and spent his life in Central Africa.

But if this committee is unwilling to do anything to civilize those Indians, then I say cut off the salary of this agent and pay merely enough for the employment of some man to disburse their annuities. If there is a sentiment of humanity in this House, I appeal to that sentiment to give the Christian people of the State of Iowa a nucleus around which their charities can gather.

Mr. DANFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the person who makes the report referred to is not the superintendent of Indian affairs to whom this bill gives $2,500 per annum for looking after the general interest of these Indians?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand he gets $1,800, some two or three hundred dollars as room-rent, some $600 for an interpreter; and he lives in Ohio.

Mr. DANFORD. Well, he is the superintendent of Indian affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Now, I do not want to create the impression that this man is a swindler. He has no opportunity at all to do anything under present circumstances. I would not want to create the impression that this man has been doing wrong.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Will the gentleman inform the committee whether those Indians themselves are not as civilized as any ordinary community anywhere in Iowa?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, sir; they are as low down in the scale of humanity as you can imagine.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Let me inform the gentleman that William Whistler, one of those Indians, belonging to the Sac tribe, has been a member of the Kansas Legislature.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Then I think they ought to have a missionary out there. There is no doubt about it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, it was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I move to amend by inserting after line 46 the following:

And the offices of the agencies of the Kaw or Kansas and the Neosho are hereby blended into one office, whose duty shall be performed by the agent of the Kaw or Kansas Indians, with headquarters at the Osage agency.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. This does not change the law; it merely blends two agencies. We have been increasing and decreasing agencies all the time; this is to decrease.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] state what law the amendment proposes to change?

Mr. GARFIELD. It proposes to consolidate agencies, and is new legislation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Have we not been doing that all the time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I offer this amendment in the interest of economy. Those tribes are all living close together; they speak the same language. One agent is sufficient for the whole of them, as everybody knows. I trust the committee will adopt the amendment.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Why, Mr. Chairman, that would not do at all. These are two very important agencies. There are not two more important agencies in that district.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. What necessity is there for two agencies, when these Indians all speak the same language and live there together?

Mr. LOWE. I move to strike out "Quapaw," in line 42, and insert the same word after "Seminole," in line 46. I do this more for the purpose of making an inquiry than anything else. I wish to ask whether one of these seven Indian agents is assigned to the Quapaw tribe? That is a very small band in the northeastern portion of that Territory, contiguous to the Cherokees, and it seems to me it might well be associated in the agency with the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, and Chickasaws. I ask the chairman of the committee whether this section contemplates an agent specially assigned to the Quapaw tribe?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Does not my colleague [Mr. LOWE] know that at the Quapaw agency, which is now filled by Mr. Jones, of Leavenworth, there are at least six small tribes—the Wyandottes, the Shawnees, the Senecas, the Quapaws, the Modocs, and the Ottawas?

Mr. LOWE. The point of my inquiry was, whether the Quapaw tribe has a separate agency or whether the agency embraces these tribes contiguous to it?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. It embraces these other contiguous bands.

Mr. LOWE. Then I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to inquire whether any of these agencies are intended to include the Osage tribe?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The Neosho is the Osage.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, nays 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of clerks to central superintendency, $1,600.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to strike out what has just been read by the Clerk, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

For pay of one chief clerk $1,600, one assistant clerk $1,200, and one copyist $600, for the central superintendency; in all, $3,400.
For pay of clerk in the northern superintendency, $1,200.

Mr. Chairman, these offices all existed before. We left them out of the bill, but on further examination, with the testimony from this country of gentlemen who have charge of this superintendency and after the restoration of the northern superintendency which we have made and the committee have voted, we regard these clerks as necessary to do the immense amount of work to be done there.

Mr. SPEER. This is $800 more than is reported in the bill.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. It is less than before.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of seventy-three interpreters, as follows: Seven for the tribes in Oregon, namely, one for the Klamath agency, and one each for the Grand Ronde, Siletz, Umatilla, Warm Spring, and Malheur and Alsea sub-agencies, at $400 per annum each.

Mr. McCORMICK. I move to strike out "400," in line 80, and insert "1,000."

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, to the committee, from my observation in dealing with the Indians for some years past, I have become satisfied, on more than one occasion, mistakes have arisen from agents and superintendents and whites dealing with them generally through ignorant interpreters, interpreters who profess to have a knowledge of the Indian language, but do not really have it—men who claim to know something they know nothing about. I ask the Clerk to read the following extract from the report of the superintendent of Indian affairs in New Mexico:

The Clerk read as follows:

The sum allowed for the salary of interpreters, $500 per annum, is entirely inadequate to secure the services of men who can speak any language with even the slightest degree of accuracy. I believe more troubles have arisen from misinterpretation of the language of officers than from any other cause. When General O. O. Howard was at Tularosa, the Indians received an impression through the interpreter of which General Howard was entirely ignorant, and which has caused much of the trouble at that agency from then until the present. I would recommend that interpreters be paid $1,000 per annum, and that all agents be required to employ only such men as can read and write both languages correctly, saving in instances where interpreters of Indian languages are required.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think, Mr. Chairman, this is the judgment of all who have had to do with Indian negotiations. I might multiply instances which have come to my knowledge where the gravest mistakes have been made and where the greatest injustice has been done from misunderstanding through ignorant interpreters, through interpreters not at all familiar with the language which they profess to know. Men who are familiar with the Indian tongue are few and far between and difficult to find, and when we do find those who are conversant with that language we should be willing to pay them sufficient to make it an object with them to interest themselves in behalf of the Government.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I should like to ask the gentleman whether in Arizona the Indians do not speak the Spanish language?

Mr. McCORMICK. Not all. The Pueblo or village Indians do speak the Spanish language, but the wild Indians, like the Apaches, speak but little Spanish.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Have they a written language?

Mr. McCORMICK. They have not as a rule.

Mr. SPEER. If this amendment prevails it will increase the appropriation $43,800.

Mr. McCORMICK. I know it will increase the amount, but it will increase the amount in the right direction and save a great deal of misunderstanding and injustice.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Six for the tribes in New Mexico, namely, one for the Navajo agency, and one each for Abiquiu, Cimaron, Mescalero Apache, Southern Apache, and Pueblo agencies, at $400 per annum each.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move at the end of line 106 to add the following:

Provided, The Abiquiu agency shall be abolished after December 1, 1874.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Five for the tribes in Nebraska, to be assigned to such agencies as the Secretary of the Interior shall direct, at $400 per annum each.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to strike out "five" in line 110 and insert "seven;" so that it will read "seven for the tribes in Nebraska," &c. We reduced this from what it has been heretofore, but, upon hearing in relation to the matter further, the committee concluded they ought to have these interpreters.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Seven for the tribes in the Indian Territory, to be assigned as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, at $400 per annum each.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out "seven" and insert "twelve."

There have hitherto been eleven interpreters for the tribes in the Indian Territory, and we have recently brought in from Mexico the Kickapoos, who do not understand the language of the others. We have therefore to add an interpreter for them; and in other respects we leave the paragraph the same as in the bill of last year.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. The Committee on Appropriations having reported to the House that seven interpreters were sufficient for these tribes, what information has the gentleman received, or what information has the committee received since that justifies them now in asking the House to increase the number from seven to twelve?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I will answer the gentleman. If the gentleman were on the Committee on Appropriations and had charge of preparing the Indian bill, he would find out by experience that it took a man a good while to learn very much about it. It is the hardest bill reported to the House to frame. We set out with the idea of bringing down everything to the very lowest point, and we reduced too much at the start. The gentleman from Missouri on my right [Mr. PARKER] and the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK]—all of us indeed—worked to get everything down to the lowest possible notch. The result was that we cut some down too low, and among other things——

Mr. SPEER. Have you any information now which you had not at the time you drew the bill and reported it?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Let me get through with my answer. When we first took hold of the bill we reduced this number, and I answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we have had other information furnished us by delegation after delegation from that country.

Mr. SPEER. What is the present number?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Eleven. And, as I have already stated, we have brought in from Mexico a new tribe that does not understand the language of the others.

Mr. SPEER. I submit that increasing the number is a change of existing law. The existing law provides for eleven. I make that point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair understands that there is no law about it. The appropriation last year provided for eleven interpreters. The appropriation this year may provide for more or less.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say just a word on this matter. The policy of the Government is to gather as far as possible all the wandering tribes of Indians into agencies. It is necessary to have as many interpreters as there are different languages. It is almost impossible to find one man who can interpret for more than one tribe. And as one new tribe has been brought in, namely, the Kickapoos, of Texas, there are now twelve different languages, while we have only eleven interpreters.

Mr. SPEER. If you have reduced the number of Texas tribes by one, I would ask, have you also reduced the number of interpreters in Texas?

Mr. MILLS. This tribe has come in from Mexico.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should have said Mexico.

Mr. LOWE. I have listened with the greatest interest to the debates which have been progressing on this bill in the Committee of the Whole during the last two or three days. I have learned from those debates that the tribes in the Indian Territory are civilized, educated, intelligent citizens who have schools, and newspapers, and churches, and preachers, who are competent, it would seem to me to send missionaries to the other tribes, instead of demanding missionaries from us. If that be so, it occurs to me to inquire why it is that we need to furnish them with twelve interpreters? I know, as a matter of observation, myself, that some half-dozen of these tribes, or at least a large proportion of them, talk English. These Cherokees, Seminoles, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Quapaws, and Sacs and Foxes have most of them lived in contact with whites so long that a large number of them readily communicate in the English language; and it seems to me that the reason that the gentleman who has charge of this bill has given is not sufficient for enlarging the number from seven to twelve. The reason he has given is, that they have brought in one additional tribe from Mexico, the Kickapoo Indians. According to that statement there is a difference of one tribe, and yet he proposes to give an increase over the bill as reported of five interpreters. Now, I can scarcely imagine that five interpreters would be required for that one tribe.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The civilized tribes require interpreters.

Mr. LOWE. If required for all, there should be some twenty of them. If only for the civilized tribes, there should not be more than six or eight. So that we have either too many of these interpreters or not enough of them. I do not wish to antagonize the motion which the gentleman makes to increase the number of interpreters, but it seems to me the reason given is not satisfactory.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. LOWE] makes a great mistake here. It is true that in the discussion of the last two or three days he has heard that there are civilized Indians in the Territory. But my friend thinks that a man cannot be civilized unless he speaks the English language. Nobody has ever asserted that any or all of these tribes can speak the English language. There are many Germans, Italians, and Frenchmen who come from the Old World to our country who cannot speak our language. Yet they are about as highly civilized as we are. But the main necessity for these interpreters is that outside of these civilized tribes, so called, in that Territory, there are thirteen other tribes, or fourteen with this Kickapoo tribe, recently brought in from Mexico. They are the Arapahoes, the Cheyennes, the Witchitas, the Wacoes, the Kadies, the Tawacarroes, the Caddoes, the Iowas, the Delawares, the Apaches, the Kiowas, and the Comanches.

Now I know my friend will not object to twelve interpreters for all those tribes. It is not too large a number. Of course the Committee on Appropriations desired to get along with as few as possible, but we found it necessary on investigating all the facts that twelve should be allowed.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have sought opportunity to say a few words upon this bill, and as this is an important amendment, to strike out the last word, I may as well say them now as at any other time. I have made some figures since I came in this evening which strike me as a little funny. I think it will not be contended that according to any statistics there are more than one hundred and thirty-six thousand Indians, and there are one hundred and thirty-six interpreters provided for in this bill, which gives one interpreter for every one thousand red-skins. Not counting the civilized Indians and the wild Indians who are not under any control, and that you have not taken charge of, there are not more than one hundred and thirty-six thousand. I thought I knew some little about Indians, although not a great deal; but I find I do not know anything about them in fact, because I discover from the discussion which has taken place here that they are the most peaceful, innocent, quiet, velvet-clawed, gentle rascals on the face of the earth, and I am therefore reluctant to do anything to elevate them, which might make them rough, violent, savage barbarians, like the border-men who have provoked all these wars and troubles on the frontier.

Sir, I have been shocked at the idea that the only men who have been committing wrongs and outrages upon the border have been our own white men rather than the red-skins, of whom we have heard such glowing descriptions during the last few days. There was provided for one hundred and thirty-six interpreters for one hundred and thirty-six thousand Indians at the outside, and I do not believe there are half that number from what I can gather, at an expense of $64,000 for interpreting. It seems to me that we are spending a great deal of money for the purpose of taking care of these gentle savages, these peaceful, quiet, velvet-clawed gentlemen I have spoken of, and elevating them to a possible condition in which they may become such marauders and murderers as our boys are who go out to the West to carry our civilization abroad across the continent.

One word more, and I am entirely done with the Indian bill. I sought this opportunity to enter my protest against the sentimentality which prevails in regard to these Indians, and to enter my protest against the abuse heaped upon the brave men who have borne our banner abroad to the frontier Territories of the West, and against the charge that they have been responsible for all the Indian wars for the last forty years. Sir, I do not believe it. That has not been my observation among the Indians. I do not believe it is true or just. Of all the thieves I ever saw, of all the men who would provoke and create just such rows as these, the Indians that I have seen are just the kind. I am, therefore, disposed to oppose this bill so far as it gives so many of these interpreters for the purpose of elevating the Indians to civilization and making it possible for them to become the rascals they will become when they get civilized, as compared with the peaceable, beautiful, Christian condition in which they were when they owned this entire continent and roamed over it with no man to molest them or make them afraid.

Sir, I am not going to antagonize further the policy of these gentlemen, but for one I protest against this pretense that the only men who have done wrong in the frontier country in reference to these wars which have been going on with the savages and barbarians have been the white men.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment; and there were—ayes 46, noes 31; no quorum voting.

Mr. SPEER. I must insist on a quorum when we are increasing salaries.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will not insist on a quorum; we can have a vote in the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can have a vote on the amendment in the House.

Mr. SPEER. Not desiring to arrest business this evening, and with the assurance that we can have a vote in the House, I withdraw the demand for a further count.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Four for the tribes in Wisconsin, namely, Green Bay, Lac Court Oreilles, Lac Flambeau, and La Pointe agencies, at $400 each.

Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out the word "four" and inserting the word "five;" and also inserting after the words "Green Bay" the word "Menomonee."

I will state briefly the reason for offering that amendment. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has stated that there is a necessity for an interpreter at each agency. The committee in preparing this bill have left out the Menomenees, the largest tribe of Indians in Wisconsin, and for which, upon page 32 of this bill, there is an appropriation of $16,179, as an installment of annuity upon $242,686. Besides they have a large amount of property there, and there is an absolute necessity that an interpreter should be employed for this tribe. In connection with this tribe and located near them is a remnant of the old Stockbridge and Munsee Indians; but they are so far advanced in civilization and so many of them speak the English language that an interpreter is not needed for them. But there is necessity for an interpreter for the Menomonees, a separate and distinct tribe from any mentioned in this paragraph. The Green Bay Indians are the Oneidas.

The question was upon the amendment moved by Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin; and upon a division—ayes 26, noes 46—it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Three for the tribes in Minnesota, namely, Chippewa agency and Red Lake and Pillager and Lake Winnebagoshish special agencies, at $400 each.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will not move an amendment, but I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. AVERILL] if this paragraph is all right?

Mr. AVERILL. My only answer is that I am perfectly ignorant personally in regard to the necessity for interpreters in Minnesota, but am satisfied they are necessary.

Mr. DUNNELL. It has been suggested to me that there are more interpreters provided for here than are needed.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Is that possible?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. If the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] desires to have this paragraph stricken out——

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not move any amendment.

Mr. SPEER. Does the gentleman say there are more interpreters provided for in this paragraph than are needed?

Mr. DUNNELL. I have been told so.

Mr. SPEER. Is not this in the gentleman's own State?

Mr. DUNNELL. It is.

Mr. SPEER. I move to strike out "three" and insert "two."

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The department estimated for five interpreters, the number they have heretofore had. We have, after an investigation, cut down the number to three; and I think there should be three there.

Mr. SPEER. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] to inform the committee of the exact truth in the case.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have no information at all in relation to it.

Mr. SPEER. I thought the gentleman had information, as it was in his own State.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have not.

Mr. SPEER. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following:

Three for the tribes in Michigan, namely, Mackinac agency.

Mr. STONE. What are these agents to be paid? There is no sum mentioned.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. It should be $400 each.

Mr. STONE. I move to insert the words "at $400 each."

Mr. SPEER. Why do you want three interpreters at one agency?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. There are three tribes of Indians at that one agency, speaking different languages; different bands, not exactly tribes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For transportation of goods, $4,000: Provided, That the foregoing stated appropriations for the Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches shall be expended only in behalf of those Indians who go and remain upon reservations and refrain from hostilities.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Will the gentleman in charge of this bill inform us what portion of these Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches, about whom I have some tender recollections——

A MEMBER. Tender about the head?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. What portion have gone on the reservation?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I understand that fifty-four hundred and ninety have gone on the reservation.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by adding the following:

And provided further, That said appropriations shall not be paid to said Kiowas or Comanches until said tribes shall arrest and deliver Satanta and Big Tree to the governor of Texas, to be confined in the penitentiary of said State according to the sentence of the district court of Jack County, Texas, for murder; or in lieu of said chiefs five other murderers or marauders belonging to said tribe and who have been committing like depredations on the frontiers of Texas.

It will be remembered by members of this committee that in 1869 the General of the Army of the United States, General Sherman, made his rounds of Texas posts inspecting the military condition of that frontier, on account of reports being brought to Army headquarters of the depredations of the savages. As he was approaching Fort Richardson, and was a few miles from the fort, a hundred armed Comanches and Kiowas attacked his train, killed seven of his twelve drivers, who had been soldiers in General Sherman's Army in the last great civil strife of ours. One of the seven who was wounded was lashed to the wheels of one of the wagons and burned to a cinder by these savages.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Is not that a mistake? Was it not white men who did that?

Mr. MILLS. No; they were Indians. I have General Sherman's testimony to rely upon. The drivers were all white men, not citizens of Texas, but in the employ of the United States, driving the teams hauling the transportation of General Sherman. He sent out the commanding officer from the fort, and one of the five who escaped came in and reported the facts, and the officer who visited the scene of the massacre verified them.

He went on to Fort Sill, and these Indians came into the Fort Sill reservation while he was there. He arrested Satanta and Big Tree and Satank, and attempted to arrest the fourth man, who was, however, killed, refusing to be arrested. Satank attempted to make his escape after he was arrested, and was killed. In the presence of the General of the Army of the United States these two Indians defiantly claimed the honor of that victory, and said that if any other Indian dared to claim the glory that clustered around that achievement he was a liar. This was said in the presence of the Indian agent—the Christian peace-maker. General Sherman asked him what he now proposed to do with his peace policy, and Mr. Tatem told him: "These Indians are unruly, and I cannot do anything with them; I turn them over to you, to do with them as you please."

This is General Sherman's testimony taken before the Committee on Military Affairs. General Sherman then sent these two Indian chiefs to Jacksborough, to be tried by the civil authorities of Texas for murder. They plead guilty, according to my understanding, because they were confronted with a cloud of witnesses; and they were sentenced to be executed. The governor of the State, however, commuted their punishment to confinement in the penitentiary, instead of having them hanged. As soon as this was done, the peace commission—the advocates of the peace policy who have never taken any interest in the protection of the people of Texas against these marauders and savages who have made that frontier red with the blood of our innocent women and children—commenced their efforts to get these two Indian chiefs out of the penitentiary of Texas and to bring them to their reservations, where they could again enter upon the war-path. They induced the governor of Texas to bring these two chiefs to the Fort Sill reservation. The Indian Commissioner, Mr. E. P. Smith, met Governor Davis there with these two chiefs. When Governor Davis offered to stipulate with the Kiowas and Comanches that he would turn loose their chiefs to them, provided they would agree to be peaceful and not maraud upon Texas, and would surrender some of their marauders and murderers to be punished, they scouted the idea; they defied him to his teeth; they defied the authority of the Government of the United States and would make no terms at all. They said they wanted their chiefs, but they would make no terms. The Indian Commissioner, Mr. Smith, did, however, make a treaty with the governor of Texas. He agreed that if Governor Davis would surrender those two prisoners to that tribe he would stipulate that the Government should protect the people of Texas against further incursions of these savages, and, in addition, that five of these marauders should be arrested in lieu of their chiefs, and turned over to the governor to be punished; and that in case this treaty was not carried out in good faith Satanta and Big Tree should be rearrested and surrendered to the governor of Texas.

[Here the hammer fell.]

I ask for a few minutes more time; I do not often trouble the House.

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, obtained the floor and said: I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I yield my time to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. MILLS. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Now, sir, there is a regular treaty signed by Mr. Commissioner Smith and by Edmund J. Davis, governor of Texas, with these stipulations: that if the Government of the United States refuses to carry out the obligations of that treaty, both parties shall be put in statu quo, and that these two savages shall be remanded to the penitentiary of Texas, to the keeping of the governor. Why was such a stipulation made? Not that Governor Davis or our people have any cruel feeling toward the Indians.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I want to understand from the gentleman what treaty it is he wants carried out.

Mr. MILLS. It is the treaty signed in October, 1873—the agreement signed by Mr. Smith, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and Edmund J. Davis, governor of Texas; and the chairman of the committee ought to be posted in this matter. The article is in writing in the Indian Bureau, and the gentleman can see it by going there. I went to Mr. Smith and asked him whether he intended to carry out that treaty in good faith, whether he intended to redeem the plighted faith of the Government to the governor of Texas. He said he could not do that; that when he talked about arresting Indians and turning them over to be punished, there was an outside pressure upon him that he could not resist; that therefore he could not carry out the treaty. I then asked whether he intended to rearrest these two chiefs and surrender them to the governor of Texas, as he was pledged by that treaty to do. He replied, "No."

Now, gentlemen, we in Texas have no cruel feelings toward the Indians. There is no man there who wants to butcher Indians just for the love of the thing. We have no revenge to gratify. But while those chiefs were in confinement in our penitentiary, their tribes felt there was a power that could hold them responsible for their crimes; and then we had some feeling of protection. But when, although the Indians defied the Government to its teeth, their chiefs were turned loose to them in response to their bravado, they felt that the Government of the United States had no power to coerce them, and that the government of Texas was no government at all. Those chiefs had not been turned loose one revolving moon before they came down upon the frontiers of Texas, and with torch and scalping-knife left desolation in their path.

General Sherman tells you what the "peace policy" has done on the frontier of Texas; that under such a policy the line of peaceful settlement has been driven back one hundred miles. What we want is to have these chiefs given back to the government of Texas, not that we want to keep them for life in prison, but that we may enter into convention, if possible, to compel these savages to leave our people on the frontier unmolested, and to make them feel there is a power which can hold them responsible for their crimes.

It is perfect nonsense, Mr. Chairman, to talk about governing anybody by moral suasion. There has to be an element of force in all governments, It is idle to say this shall be the law or that shall be the law, without saying at the same time this shall be the consequence if you violate the law. Not the severity either, but the certainty, of punishment is what deters evil-doers from committing crimes.

That is the reason I ask this appropriation shall be withheld from these savages until they are made to feel that the strong arm of the Government of the United States will put these chiefs back into the keeping of the government of Texas, so they may be held there until they shall enter into terms of peace and show a firm intention to keep them with our people.

Mr. SHANKS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman complains of the peace policy of the Government, and says the strong arm of the Government ought to be raised to protect the people of Texas against these Indians. I ask, in all good faith, when there has been a time during the existence of the peace policy under this Administration when the Army has not been ready and active to put down marauding and raiding everywhere? What has weakened the power of the Army by saying we shall do justice to the Indians? What has weakened the power of the Army? Why is not that Army as powerful to-day? Was it not brought against the Modocs? Was it not brought against the Indians of Arizona? Is not the very Army he is now calling for down at Fort Sill? Are they tied down by any peace policy? Does not the President direct and the Secretary urge all these Indians shall be put down by the power of the Army? I bid defiance now and here to any man living on God's green earth who can bring a word from the Secretary of the Interior or the President, in any speech, in any writing, in any statement, by which they have withheld the Army from the protection to the full power of that Army against Indian invasion and depredation.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SHANKS. I will.

Mr. MILLS. I agree with the gentleman, the Army are always on the alert whenever they get information. They have always been so in our State and always earnest in the protection of our people. About the balance of the Indians I have nothing to say, but about the Indians on the frontier of Texas I do know. The gentleman knows, too, that the troops there are stationed in the heart of the reservation. The Indians have a right to go as far south as the Red River. Of course when they go into Texas the first the troops know about the Indians committing depredations is when the alarm is given by the people. By that time they have returned and you cannot catch them until they have got back upon the reservation. The gentleman well knows when they do get back upon the reservation the jurisdiction of the Army ceases.

Mr. SHANKS. That is all right; but he attacks the peace policy. General Sherman has said that he would put his lines far enough south to protect the frontiers. We have assisted in passing through this House a proposition to establish a telegraph line so as to protect the people of Texas by giving them every means to get the earliest information to the Army in order to protect the people against the Indians. General Sherman was before our committee.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Let me ask the gentleman a question. He has referred to the convention entered into by Mr. Smith, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, a high official in this Government, on the one side, and Governor Davis, of the State of Texas, on the other, contracting in behalf of the Government of the United States to return these Indian chiefs, under certain conditions, to the custody of the authorities in that State. Let me ask the gentleman whether this Government ought not to enforce that convention whereby Satanta and Big Tree should be surrendered up?

Mr. SHANKS. Where have they violated that convention? Show me a violation and I will answer your question.

Mr. MILLS. I will give you a violation of it. General Sherman in his testimony has already told you the Kiowas and Comanches have gone from their reservation since we have been in session here and butchered twenty-four of our citizens. Captain Hudson followed them and killed some eight or ten of them and drove the rest back to the reservation. Lone Wolf, a Kiowa chief, went into mourning because of the killing of his son, and, having sworn eternal enmity to the people of that frontier, is now upon the war-path.

Mr. SHANKS. Yes, Mr. Chairman, and there is an agreement by every one of us and every citizen of this country that we will obey the law; and if we violate that law it is no fault of the law. Now, I want to say to the committee that these men, Satanta and Big Tree, have faithfully lived up to their agreement, and have gone personally to bring back their men—their young men who have been led astray by whites who have been dealing in cattle and inducing the Indians to commit acts of violence and to steal cattle, which they get from them and sell to the Government. Satanta and Big Tree are as faithfully doing their duty to the Government as any men in the country. They have not violated their contract, but have been using every effort to being back their people who have been led astray by white men.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Will the gentleman answer me this question: Is it not the duty of the Government to enforce that convention between Mr. Smith and Governor Davis?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SHANKS. I renew it for the purpose of answering the question put to me by the gentleman from Kansas. The gentleman asks me why the Government does not enforce——

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. No, I asked the gentleman from Indiana, knowing his acquaintance with Indian affairs and respecting his judgment, to state to the committee if it was not the duty, the moral duty of the Government of the United States to enforce that convention and to see that it is carried out.

Mr. SHANKS. I said that unless it was violated it was not necessary to talk of its enforcement. And when I asked when it was violated gentlemen referred me to another gentleman, and that gentleman told me that the Indians killed twenty-four of his people. Then I put the question, Why should you attack the peace policy? What has that to do with it? How does it weaken the power of the Government to enforce that agreement? When Indians come and murder twenty-four people in violation of law the Government can only punish those persons who commit that offense. I am in favor of punishing them. But to punish Indians who killed twenty-four people is one thing, and to denounce the peace policy is quite a different thing.

Mr. MILLS. I will state to the gentleman that an agreement is violated by its absolute non-enforcement. One part of the agreement was that five of the marauders were to be surrendered to the governor to be punished, and then absolute peace and protection to the people were to be guaranteed by the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHANKS. If five innocent men are to be surrendered because two men have done mischief, I trust in God that any agreement that requires such a thing as that will not be enforced.

Mr. MILLS. They were marauders and murderers who are to be surrendered.

I wish to modify my amendment by striking out all after the words which provide for the surrender to the governor of Texas.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I would suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that while his idea may be proper enough, I do not see how it can be carried out as a provision attached to this appropriation bill. Here is an old Indian treaty that gives certain annuities to those tribes of Indians, and now the gentleman undertakes to make these annuities to all these tribes conditional on what has nothing in the world to do with the treaty.

Mr. MILLS. The Indian treaties with nearly every tribe require it to answer for depredations committed by that tribe in deductions from its annuities.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we will now have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.] The Clerk will read the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph these words:

